CONTRACTS AND OTHER OBLIGATIONS

CHAPTER 1
OBLIGATIONS IN GENERAL

Part 1
General Provisions

Case Notes

Restaurant Did Not Breach Lease — Prohibition of Music and Cooking Odors Not Reasonable — Anticipatory Breach by Landlord: The plaintiff, a restaurant that leased space from the defendant, initiated a declaratory action after receiving a notice of default of the lease for not abiding by rules that had been added to the lease that required the restaurant to eliminate cooking odors and prohibited music. The District Court found that the plaintiff did not breach the lease and the defendant anticipatorily breached the lease because it violated the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing and interfered with the plaintiff's right to quiet use and enjoyment of the premises. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the defendant's rules prohibiting music or cooking odors were not reasonable or fair to the plaintiff restaurant. As such, the defendant's actions interfered with the plaintiff's quiet enjoyment of the premises, the defendant anticipatorily breached the contract, and the plaintiff did not default on the lease. Bridger Del Sol, Inc. v. VincentView, LLC, 2017 MT 293, 389 Mont. 415, 406 P.3d 460.

Oral Notice Held Sufficient When Written Notice Required: The plaintiff argued that the defendant had breached the contract by giving oral notice of cancellation when the contract required written notice. The Supreme Court, while distinguishing this decision from its ruling in Tomsheck v. Doran, 126 M 598, 256 P2d 538 (1953), held that the notice given by the defendant substantially complied with the contract terms and that the plaintiff was not prejudiced by the action. Comphealth, Inc. v. Highland View Outpatient Surgical Center, 240 M 366, 783 P2d 1385, 46 St. Rep. 2198 (1989).

Oral Lease as Contract Establishing Obligations: An oral farm lease under which both parties recognized and fulfilled responsibilities relating to crop sharing, farming methods, and farm subsidy programs for 15 years was a sufficient contract through which each party acquired its respective obligations and breach of which formed a proper basis for award of damages and costs of suit. Albers v. Bar ZF Ranch, Inc., 229 M 396, 747 P2d 1347, 44 St. Rep. 2081 (1987).

Where Payment Alone Does Not Constitute Performance: Performance of a contract is the doing of the things promised to be done, and while the obligation may be for the delivery of money only, in which event performance is called "payment", where the contract calls for the doing of various things (as did the contract in the instant case, payment being one of them), payment alone would not constitute performance. Hardenburgh v. Hardenburgh, 115 M 469, 146 P2d 151 (1944).

"Payment" — Promissory Note: In absence of agreement, either express or implied, providing otherwise, "payment" means the discharge of a debt or obligation in money; hence mere delivery and acceptance of promissory note for amount of an account, whether it be note of debtor or of another, do not operate to discharge debt. Gallaher v. Theilbar Realties, 93 M 421, 18 P2d 1101 (1933).

Tort Liability: Statutory definition of an obligation includes the liability for actionable tortious conduct. Barbarich v. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pac. Ry., 92 M 1, 9 P2d 797 (1932).

Payment by Way of Credits — Pleading: A plea of payment by defendant in an action for money due means payment in money. Therefore, where payment under an agreement to accept something other than money in satisfaction of an obligation is asserted, it must be specially pleaded; when not so pleaded, evidence of payment made by way of credits other than cash is inadmissible. Billings v. Missoula White Pine Sash Co., 88 M 322, 292 P 714 (1930), overruled on another point by Caird Eng'r Works v. Seven-Up Gold Min. Co., 111 M 471, 111 P2d 267 (1941).

Quasi-Contract: Where one has received money which, though not bound to do so by express contract, he in equity and good conscience ought to turn over to him from whom he received it, the law implies a promise on his part to that effect, and the obligation thus created or implied by law is termed a "quasi-contract", as distinguished from a contract as defined in 28-2-101 and 28-2-102. Schaeffer v. Miller, 41 M 417, 109 P 970 (1910), distinguished in Keith v. Kottas, 119 M 98, 172 P2d 306 (1946).

28-1-102. How obligations arise.

Case Notes

Oral Lease as Contract Establishing Obligations: An oral farm lease under which both parties recognized and fulfilled responsibilities relating to crop sharing, farming methods, and farm subsidy programs for 15 years was a sufficient contract through which each party acquired its respective obligations and breach of which formed a proper basis for award of damages and costs of suit. Albers v. Bar ZF Ranch, Inc., 229 M 396, 747 P2d 1347, 44 St. Rep. 2081 (1987).

Lack of Appeal of Federal Agency Decision Not to Affect Contract Rights: Popp had an oral agreement to plant and harvest land owned by Frank and Gountanis. Popp attempted to enroll the land in the federal payment in kind program (PIK) but was informed by the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) that he must have a written lease to be eligible. He never appealed the ASCS decision. Frank later contended that the failure to appeal precluded Popp from collaterally attacking that determination in District Court. The Supreme Court held that Popp's filing of a lawsuit was not a collateral attack on the ASCS decision but rather that the amended complaint showed it was a breach of contract action. The court supported the finding that the PIK program could not be used to destroy Popp's contract rights. Popp v. Gountanis, 221 M 267, 718 P2d 340, 43 St. Rep. 801 (1986).

Proper Quantum for Architect's Services: Under a contract with a landowner who wished to build housing units on the land, an architect prepared plans and specifications that were approved by landowner. Under the contract, the architect was to receive 5% of the construction cost. Following abandonment of the project, he was entitled to a fee based on quantum meruit. The proper recovery was the number of hours of service, 600, times the architect's hourly rate, $30, or $18,000. It was improper for the court to hold that the architect was entitled to only $10,000 based on the value of his services. Kenneth D. Collins Agency v. Hagerott, 211 M 303, 684 P2d 487, 41 St. Rep. 1375 (1984).

Obligation to Third Party Where No Privity Exists: A prime contractor contracted separately with a steel supplier to supply steel and with a subcontractor to erect the steel. Because the supplier was delayed in delivering the steel, the subcontractor suffered financial losses. By entering into the contract with the prime contractor, the supplier placed itself in such a relation with the subcontractor that the law will impose upon the supplier an obligation, sounding in tort, to act in a way so as not to injure the subcontractor. Privity of contract is not required. Hawthorne v. Kober Constr. Co., 196 M 519, 640 P2d 467, 39 St. Rep. 294 (1982), followed in Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115, 43 St. Rep. 2243 (1986), and in Jim's Excavating Serv., Inc. v. HKM Associates, 265 M 494, 878 P2d 248, 51 St. Rep. 623 (1994), in which it was held that a third-party contractor may successfully recover for purely economic loss against a project engineer or architect when the design professional knew or should have foreseen that the particular plaintiff or an identifiable class of plaintiffs was at risk in relying on the information supplied.

Account Stated — What Constitutes: The basic ingredients of an account stated are an agreement that the items of the account and the balance struck are correct and an express or implied agreement for the payment of the balance. Implied agreement for the payment of the balance may be presumed where there are a course of dealings, an antecedent indebtedness, and retention of a statement of the account for an unreasonable length of time without objection. Johnson v. Tindall, 195 M 165, 635 P2d 266 (1981), followed in Mattson v. Julian, 209 M 48, 678 P2d 654, 41 St. Rep. 544 (1984), and in Able, Inc. v. Kuzara, 241 M 155, 785 P2d 1021, 47 St. Rep. 158 (1990).

Where Contractual Obligation Not Assumed by Defendant, Suit for Breach Wrong Remedy: Where receiver of vendor company assigned contract of sale to another company without assumption by the latter of the vendor's obligation thereunder and assignee sold the property to a third person subject to the rights of the deceased owner's estate, in a suit for breach of contract against the assignee company by the personal representatives of the deceased purchaser, judgment for plaintiff was erroneous in absence of proof that defendant had assumed the obligations of the vendor. Under the facts, the assignee became a trustee for the original vendee by operation of law. Thompson v. Lincoln Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 114 M 521, 138 P2d 951 (1943), followed, with regard to lack of implied assumption of contractual obligations absent assignment of contractual rights, in Davey v. Nessan, 252 M 397, 830 P2d 92, 49 St. Rep. 294 (1992).

28-1-103. What rules govern interpretation of contracts and other obligations.

Case Notes

Application of Banking Standards, Not Livestock Industry Standards, to Loan Transaction Involving Cattle — Bank-Customer Relationship Not Giving Rise to Fiduciary Responsibilities: A bank loaned money to a couple to fund their cattle breeding operation. When the couple failed to make loan payments, the bank brought an action to collect and foreclose, and the couple brought a counterclaim that the bank's actions breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing and the bank's fiduciary duty toward the couple. After the couple paid the amount owing, they became the plaintiffs and the case proceeded on the breach of covenant and fiduciary duty claim. The District Court granted the bank summary judgment on the claim, and on appeal, plaintiffs asserted that the court improperly applied banking standards to the case rather than livestock industry standards, constituting a breach of good faith. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Montana, the relationship between a bank and its customer is generally described as that of debtor and creditor and does not give rise to fiduciary duties except when special circumstances place a bank into the role of adviser. In this case, the bank acted as a creditor and not an adviser, and did not force the cattle sale but simply sought to enforce the repayment provisions of its contract with plaintiffs, so no special circumstances existed. The bank acted in accordance with the contract provisions and comported with prudent banking policy and reasonable commercial standards. It was appropriate for the District Court to apply commercial banking standards to the analysis of the bank's relationship with plaintiffs and plaintiffs' ability to service their loans. Summary judgment for the bank was proper. McCoy v. First Citizens Bank, 2006 MT 307, 335 M 1, 148 P3d 677 (2006).

Defendant Not Allowed to Characterize Damages: Shilhaneks were injured in a vehicle accident, and defendants were ordered to pay more than $3 million in damages, including punitive damages. Defendants requested that the $750,000 tendered to Shilhaneks to date be allocated toward payment of the punitive award and that Shilhaneks be required to file a corresponding satisfaction of judgment with respect to the punitive damages award, in essence asserting that a defendant has the power to specifically designate payment toward a particular award. Defendants cited 25-9-311 for the rule that a satisfaction of judgment must be provided by the party in whose favor judgment is entered and contended that under 28-1-1106 and 28-1-1225, the power lies with the debtor, not the creditor, when it comes to designating to which particular obligation a payment should be credited. The District Court denied the request, noting that Title 28 applies only to contractual obligations and that Title 25 governs obligations arising from judgments. The District Court did not abuse its discretion, given defendants' failure to provide a legal basis that would allow them to dictate how damages owed are characterized, the fact that defendants owed more than double the available insurance coverage and were obligated to pay the policy limits to satisfy the verdict, and that allocating 22% of the available insurance proceeds to the punitive damage award would have harsh tax consequences on Shilhaneks. Shilhanek v. D-2 Trucking, Inc., 2000 MT 16, 298 M 101, 994 P2d 1105, 57 St. Rep. 89 (2000).

Real Property 7
Procedure 8

GENERAL

Doctrine of Election of Remedies Inapplicable — Position of Blameless Party After Contractual Breach — Making Whole but No More: The plaintiff brought a suit for damages 6 years after the defendants breached a contract to buy the plaintiff's interests in Dealerspan, LLC, a software company, resulting in the defendants' forfeiture of their interests in Dealerspan. Defendants argued that the doctrine of election of remedies barred damages because the plaintiff elected to pursue forfeiture and thus had rescinded the contract. However, the subject of the contract was the sale of the plaintiff's interests, and the forfeiture of the defendants' interests in Dealerspan did not return the parties to their original positions before executing the contract, so the forfeiture and contractual damages were not inconsistent. Nevertheless, the contract was not designed to place the plaintiff in a better position under the defendants' breach than under the defendants' performance, so the plaintiff could recover only damages covering the difference between the contract purchase price and the value of the forfeited interests, subsequent profits from the business, and profits from selling Dealerspan's physical assets. Bottrell Family Investments Ltd. Partnership v. Diversified Financial, Inc., 2015 MT 185, 379 Mont. 504, 352 P.3d 620.

Notice-Prejudice Rule Applicable in First Party Insurance Coverage: The notice-prejudice rule applies to first party insurance coverage disputes. Under this rule, an insurer may deny coverage based on an insured's failure to comply with a policy notice provision only if the insurer can demonstrate that it was prejudiced by the late notice. Estate of Gleason v. Cent. United Life Ins. Co., 2015 MT 140, 379 Mont. 219, 350 P.3d 349.

Forfeiture on Deed to Purchase Property: Good faith efforts to raise money for installment payments excuse element of grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty. Parrott v. Heller, 171 M 212, 557 P2d 819 (1976).

Repurchase of Stock: Forced sale of shareholder's stock pursuant to repurchase agreement and board of directors' resolution to exercise option to repurchase stock at 50% of book value was not a harsh forfeiture within meaning of this section where the shareholder was allowed, as a fringe benefit, to encourage participation in corporate affairs and to purchase the stock for less than one-half of book value and where he had agreed to the terms of the repurchase agreement whereby the corporation could buy back the stock at 50% of book value in the event of termination of his employment. State ex rel. Howeth v. D. A. Davidson & Co., 163 M 355, 517 P2d 722 (1973), overruled, with regard to elements of collateral estoppel, in Dagel v. Great Falls, 250 M 224, 819 P2d 186, 48 St. Rep. 919 (1991).

Unjust Enrichment: Under this section, when there is a forfeiture the vendee has a cause of action against the vendor for unjust enrichment. Greenup v. U.S., 239 F. Supp. 330 (D.C. Mont. 1965).

Inability to Pay Caused by Strike: Conditional buyers were not entitled to relief from forfeiture of conditional sales contract because of their inability to make payments required by contract due to a widespread strike. Kovacich v. Metals Bank & Trust Co., 139 M 449, 365 P2d 639 (1961).

Willful Breach: This section explicitly points out that if the breach is willful there will be no relief from forfeiture, and no common-law principle can override this exacting statutory provision. Joy v. Little, 138 M 110, 354 P2d 1035 (1960).

Full Compensation Required: Under a lease arrangement the tenant agreed to pay a percentage of the sales over $270,000, in addition to a stipulated monthly rent, and the lease provided for a forfeiture in the event of a breach. The court could give relief against forfeiture under this special statute upon the tenant making full compensation. The forfeiture was claimed on the fact that the tenant did not pay a percentage of the sales of farm implements which were kept in a separate building, although all the sales were made and money received at the leased premises and a controversy arose as to whether such sales should be included in that amount upon which a percentage was paid as rent. Gamble-Skogmo, Inc. v. McNair Realty Co., 98 F. Supp. 440 (D.C. Mont. 1951), affirmed in Moyer v. Comm'r of Internal Revenue, 193 F2d 876 (9th Cir. 1952).

Application of Section — Option: This section was inapplicable where option to purchase did not create an obligation on part of holder of option and option had been terminated at time of commencement of action involving option. N. Min. Corp. v. Cooke Min. Co., 123 F2d 9 (9th Cir. 1941).

Forgetfulness No Excuse: In an action against a corporation to enforce the immediate forfeiture of a contract of purchase for the vendee's failure to make any deferred payment, the corporation is not entitled to any relief on the ground that its officers were so engrossed with other business that they forgot that a payment was due on the contract, especially where time has been made of the essence in the contract. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913).

EQUITY

Affirmative Action in Curing Default — Relief From Forfeiture Warranted: After missing a payment when purchasing property from the Ackers, the Quigleys took affirmative steps to cure the default and eventually tendered full compensation for their obligation. These actions showed that the default was not a grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty. In light of other financial factors beyond the Quigleys' control and the fact that forfeiture could have resulted in unjust enrichment for the Ackers, the District Court did not err by applying this section in granting the Quigleys relief from forfeiture. Quigley v. Acker, 1998 MT 72, 288 M 190, 955 P2d 1377, 55 St. Rep. 295 (1998), distinguishing Kovacich v. Metals Bank & Trust Co., 139 M 449, 365 P2d 639 (1961), and Aveco Properties, Inc. v. Nicholson, 229 M 417, 747 P2d 1358 (1987).

Grant of Equitable Relief From Forfeiture — Conditions: Defendant defaulted on a contract to operate a coal mine. The District Court granted summary judgment, finding no genuine issue of material fact regarding defendant's unlawful detainer. Defendant sought equitable relief pursuant to this section. The Supreme Court may, under appropriate circumstances, equitably relieve a party from the harsh effects of a forfeiture. Circumstances warranting equitable relief must not only meet the statutory requirements of tendering full compensation within a reasonable time after service of notice of default and not acting in a grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent manner, but the party seeking relief must also assert facts that appeal to the conscience of the court of equity. Mere financial inability is not sufficient to appeal to the court's conscience. In this case, defendant's request for equitable relief was deficient because it did not meet statutory and common-law criteria, so the grant of summary judgment was affirmed. Glacier Park Co. v. Mtn., Inc., 285 M 420, 949 P2d 229, 54 St. Rep. 1222 (1997), following Kovacich v. Metals Bank & Trust Co., 139 M 449, 365 P2d 639 (1961), distinguishing Parrott v. Heller, 171 M 212, 557 P2d 819 (1976), and followed in Weter v. Archambault, 2002 MT 336, 313 M 284, 61 P3d 771 (2002).

Appeal to Equity: Under this section a person may be relieved against a forfeiture in any case where he sets forth facts which appeal to the conscience of a court of equity. Blakely v. Kelstrup, 267 M 274, 883 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 991 (1994); Greenup v. U.S., 239 F. Supp. 330 (D.C. Mont. 1965); Kovacich v. Metals Bank & Trust Co., 139 M 449, 365 P2d 639 (1961); Estabrook v. Sonstelie, 86 M 435, 284 P 147 (1930).

Forfeiture — Affirmative Defense: Forfeiture is an affirmative defense and must be pleaded in the defendant's answer to a complaint. It will not be considered for the first time on appeal. Massar Cattle Co. v. Reese, 216 M 22, 699 P2d 87, 42 St. Rep. 609 (1985).

Gross Negligence in Failure to Perform — No Relief From Forfeiture: The seller of real property is entitled to cancellation of a contract for deed. The purchasers are not entitled to any equitable relief from forfeiture because they were grossly negligent in failing to perform in accordance with the terms and provisions of the contract. Redinger v. French, 216 M 16, 699 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 604 (1985).

Full Compensation to Be Shown: This section cannot be applied where there is nothing to show that one claiming the benefit of it made full compensation. Hares v. Nelson, 195 M 463, 637 P2d 19, 38 St. Rep. 2036 (1981). See also Burgess v. Shiplet, 230 M 387, 750 P2d 460, 45 St. Rep. 293 (1988).

Deposit in Court — Right to Relief: In action to prohibit defendant from canceling an agreement for sale of lands, even though the deposit in court might be legally insufficient as a tender to defendant, plaintiff might be relieved from forfeiture upon a showing of facts sufficient to appeal to the conscience of a court of equity. Blackfeet Tribe of the Blackfeet Indian Reservation v. Klies Livestock Co., 160 F. Supp. 131 (D.C. Mont. 1958).

Free From Blame: Lessors of an oil and gas lease sought to have the lease set aside for failure of lessees to drill more wells. Lessors, however, had refused to allow lessees to enter the land. The court held that one who seeks to enforce a forfeiture must be free from blame even though oil and gas leases are generally construed against the lessee. Fey v. A.A. Oil Co., 129 M 300, 285 P2d 578 (1955).

Mistake: Where a purchaser of realty on deferred payments relied on a supposed breach of a contract of sale by the vendor, based on a fairly debatable point, and mistakenly refused to make further payments, in an action by the vendor to terminate the contract with forfeiture of payments, equity properly relieved purchaser from such forfeiture. Huston v. Vollenweider, 101 M 156, 53 P2d 112 (1935).

Seeker of Equity — to Do Equity: This section is based upon the principle that he who seeks equity must do or offer to do equity; to obtain relief he must, by his allegations and proof, bring himself within its purview. Clifton v. Willson, 47 M 305, 132 P 424 (1913). See Donlan v. Arnold, 48 M 416, 138 P 775 (1914).

Sale of Personalty: One who, after making advance payments on a contract of sale of personalty, refuses to complete the transaction, the seller being ready and willing to fulfill its stipulations, cannot recover them unless he can bring himself within the exception provided by this section by alleging and proving facts and circumstances upon which, in equity and good conscience, he should have relief from the forfeiture and which excuse him from the imputation of gross negligence or willful or fraudulent breach of duty. Clifton v. Willson, 47 M 305, 132 P 424 (1913). See Donlan v. Arnold, 48 M 416, 138 P 775 (1914).

Showing of Entitlement: A party may be relieved from a forfeiture under this section upon a showing that he is equitably entitled to such relief, if his breach of duty was not grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913), distinguished in Roberts v. Morin, 198 M 233, 645 P2d 423, 39 St. Rep. 892 (1982); Cook-Reynolds Co. v. Chipman, 47 M 289, 133 P 694 (1913).

PAYMENTS — RECOVERY AND TENDER

Waiver of Contract Rights — Late Payments Not Considered Breach Based on Prior Acceptance: The uninsured employers' fund (UEF) sought indemnity from an employer that did not have workers' compensation insurance using a monthly payment arrangement that was agreed to by the parties. The UEF accepted four late payments before turning the employer over to collections, at which point the employer sued UEF for breach of contract. The Supreme Court held that UEF waived its right to terminate the contract based on late payment when it accepted late payments without objection. Consequently, it was a breach of contract for the UEF to turn the employer over to collections and the employer was entitled to damages. Elk Mtn. Motor Sports, Inc. v. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2012 MT 261, 367 Mont. 36, 289 P.3d 165.

Offer of Full Consideration Required: Restitution on the grounds of relief from forfeiture was not appropriate absent an offer of full consideration. Schweigert v. Fowler, 240 M 424, 784 P2d 405, 47 St. Rep. 1 (1990).

Forfeiture to Land in Which No Right Exists — Tender of Full Compensation — Affirmative Defense: Sun Dial purchased land and under an agreement turned possession of the land over to Gold Creek. Gold Creek intended to divide the land into 20-acre parcels for sale as homesites. The planned homesite sale did not materialize, and Sun Dial filed suit to regain possession of the land. A settlement was reached on the day set for trial that required Gold Creek to pay Sun Dial $1.3 million within 1 year of the settlement. Payment was not made, and the court ordered judgment for Sun Dial's immediate possession of the property. The Supreme Court held that this was not a forfeiture. Sun Dial purchased the land and held equitable title. Defendants never had title to the land and therefore cannot forfeit something they never had. In addition, 28-1-104 requires that Gold Creek tender full compensation. The only amount tendered was $50,000, a far cry from $1.3 million. Moreover, a forfeiture is an affirmative defense, which was not affirmatively pleaded by Gold Creek. Sun Dial Land Co., Inc. v. Gold Creek Ranches, Inc., 198 M 247, 645 P2d 936, 39 St. Rep. 908 (1982), followed in Eigeman v. Miller, 229 M 28, 745 P2d 320, 44 St. Rep. 1752 (1987).

Contract for Deed — Payment Offered — Forfeiture Denied: Roberts purchased real property from Morin on a contract for deed. Roberts then sold the property to Iverson on another contract but retained an interest in the original contract until Iverson's obligation to him was satisfied. Iverson failed to make payment to Morin, and Morin sent him a notice of default. No notice was sent to Roberts, but when he learned of the default, he offered to cure. Morin refused the offer, seeking instead to enforce the forfeiture provision of the contract to regain the property, which had greatly increased in value. On appeal, the Supreme Court directed the District Court to deny the forfeiture and allow Roberts to make full payment of the balance due on the Morin contract. Roberts v. Morin, 198 M 233, 645 P2d 423, 39 St. Rep. 892 (1982).

Relief From Forfeiture of Equity Under Contract for Deed: The buyers and sellers entered into a contract for deed under which the buyers made a downpayment and monthly payments and agreed to make a balloon payment at the end of the contract term. The buyers failed to obtain financing of the balloon payment due to no fault of their own and thereby defaulted on the contract but entered into settlement negotiations with the plaintiffs and later tendered payment of amounts due to the plaintiffs, plus the plaintiffs' personal expenses and attorney's fees. Under these circumstances, the antiforfeiture statute would prevent the forfeiture of the defendants' downpayment and monthly payments. The defendants' actions were not intentional, willful, or fraudulent. These facts present a clear case for the application of the antiforfeiture statute. Sharp v. Holthusen, 189 M 469, 616 P2d 374, 37 St. Rep. 1651 (1980), followed in Daugherty Cattle Co. v. Gen. Constr. Co., 254 M 479, 839 P2d 562, 49 St. Rep. 820 (1992), Blakely v. Kelstrup, 267 M 274, 883 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 991 (1994), and Club Buffet Bar, Inc. v. Lilienthal, 268 M 164, 885 P2d 526, 51 St. Rep. 1231 (1994).

Competing Policy Considerations Balanced — Oral Real Property Agreement:

Section 28-1-104 strikes a balance between the competing policy considerations of encouraging enforcement of agreements though technically deficient (Statutes of Fraud in this case) and the tendency not to favor needless forfeitures. The lower court's balancing in the direction of the former consideration was supported by the evidence. Fraser v. Edmisten, 189 M 443, 616 P2d 360, 37 St. Rep. 1607 (1980).

A purchaser of real property under an oral agreement who voluntarily terminates the contract cannot recover partial payments on the purchase price so long as the seller is willing and able to perform his part of the agreement. Perkins v. Allnut, 47 M 13, 130 P 1 (1913).

Downpayment: Where a $500 downpayment was made on the purchase of land and the balance of $700 was to be paid under the terms of an escrow agreement by a specified date and purchaser failed to pay balance by such date, after which seller sold to another, such first purchaser was entitled to the return of the $500 downpayment. Herman v. Herman, 123 M 39, 207 P2d 1155 (1949).

Tender of Delinquent Payments: Where the vendee of county-owned property was in default in payments on principal and taxes under his contract of purchase dated November 1934, making time of its essence, the county, in 1940, after notice and declaration of forfeiture, brought suit to quiet title. In view of defendant's tender of the full amount of delinquent payments, interest, and taxes at the trial, and of the difficulty for the average person to make loans due to economic conditions, and in the absence of circumstances which would have rendered relief inequitable, the trial court erred in denying relief from forfeiture under this section. Yellowstone County v. Wight, 115 M 411, 145 P2d 516 (1943).

Time of the Essence Clause: A defaulting purchaser of land, under a contract which made time of the essence and under which the vendor exercised his option to declare it ended upon breach, who had made no downpayment and had paid only the first year's interest during his 2 years' possession, was not entitled to recover what he had expended on the premises, under this section. Edwards v. Muri, 73 M 339, 237 P 209 (1925).

When Payments May Be Recovered: Where a purchaser has failed to make payments according to the terms of his contract but has made some partial payments before his breach of the contract, he cannot ordinarily recover the payments made before the breach, nor can he under any circumstances recover them without alleging and proving that the default was not the result of his "grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty". Suburban Homes Co. v. North, 50 M 108, 145 P 2 (1914). See Mont. Williams Double Diamond v. Royal Village, Inc., 186 M 359, 607 P2d 1120 (1980).

REAL PROPERTY

Default Notice in Compliance With Contract for Deed — No Mention of Fees and Costs: A provision in a contract for deed set out additional fees to be paid to the escrow agent in case of default, but when the default notice was sent, there was no mention of the additional fees. Plaintiffs contended that failure to mention the fees rendered the default notice defective. The Supreme Court disagreed. The notice sufficiently complied with the provisions of the contract. Defendants properly followed the default procedure set out in the contract, and excluding the fee information did not render the default notice defective. Danelson v. Robinson, 2003 MT 271, 317 M 462, 77 P3d 1010 (2003).

Enforcement of Acceleration Clause: Defendant purchased real property from the plaintiff for $1.4 million, with $350,000 as a downpayment and the balance payable in nine equal annual payments at 8¼%. The downpayment was made, but the first annual payment was missed. Plaintiff sent two notices of default and notice of an intent to accelerate the entire unpaid balance. The District Court concluded that the acceleration may be tantamount to forfeiture, and courts look with disfavor on forfeitures. On appeal, the court held that the plaintiff was seeking specific performance, not forfeiture. Even if a forfeiture were involved, 28-1-104 could not help because the statute relieves a party from a forfeiture upon "making full compensation to the other party". SAS Partnership v. Schafer, 200 M 478, 653 P2d 834, 39 St. Rep. 1883 (1982), followed in Aveco Properties, Inc. v. Nicholson, 229 M 417, 747 P2d 1358, 44 St. Rep. 2098 (1987).

Showing Required for Relief From Forfeiture of Real Estate Contract: Plaintiff seller sought cancellation of a contract for sale of real property and eviction of defendant buyer upon buyer's default. Upon tender of full payment by defendant, the lower court dismissed the complaint. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that under this section it is only when the defaulting purchaser can make a showing that he is equitably entitled to relief from forfeiture and that his default was not grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent that the courts will relieve purchaser from forfeiture. Case remanded for further proceedings. Ponderosa Pines Ranch, Inc. v. McBride, 197 M 301, 642 P2d 1050, 39 St. Rep. 577 (1982), followed in Blakely v. Kelstrup, 267 M 274, 883 P2d 814, 51 St. Rep. 991 (1994). See also Stuart v. U.S., 109 F3d 1380 (9th Cir. 1997), for preemption by federal law.

Tax Liens: Any federal tax lien on property that accrues because of the vendee's delinquency attaches to the amount of unjust enrichment if the mortgagee's claim is prior in right. Greenup v. U.S., 239 F. Supp. 330 (D.C. Mont. 1965).

Farm Lease — Hardship Considered: Plaintiffs brought an action to terminate a farm lease for failure to perform according to its terms. The court held that although tenant had not plowed all the acreage required and had plowed some land which plaintiffs had wanted intact, he had substantially complied with the lease. The court relieved the tenant from forfeiture of the lease and restored him to his former estate in order to avoid hardship. Table Mtn. Farms v. Burton, 128 M 434, 278 P2d 213 (1955). See also Smith & Satterfield v. Zepp, Farner & Knowles, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977).

Questionable Title to Real Estate: In an action in ejectment by the vendors of a tract of land against the vendee for refusal to complete the contract of purchase, the questions raised by the latter regarding the title offered were fairly debatable but found not meritorious, and as the time for making final payment had expired, the case was one justifying application of the rule for relief against forfeiture under this section. Williams v. Hefner, 89 M 361, 297 P 492 (1931).

Gross Negligence or Willful Breach: Notwithstanding the provision in a contract of sale of ranch land that on default of deferred payments all prior payments should be deemed forfeited as rental, the party in default may obtain relief from forfeiture if not guilty of grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty, on presentation of such grounds therefor as appeal to the conscience of a court of equity. Fontaine v. Lyng, 61 M 590, 202 P 1112 (1921). See also Christensen v. Hunt, 147 M 484, 414 P2d 648 (1966).

Retention of Title by Vendor: Where a vendor retains the legal title to property sold to a purchaser, who defaults in meeting deferred payments, and an action is brought to enforce a forfeiture caused by such default, 71-3-109 and 71-3-1301 are not pertinent. There is no lien, and therefore there is no basis for denying a forfeiture of the contract of sale. Cook-Reynolds Co. v. Chipman, 47 M 289, 133 P 694 (1913).

PROCEDURE

No Factual Issue of Waiver Under Contractual Consent to Assignment Clause — Summary Judgment Proper: The Nicholsons entered a contract option with J.G.L. Distributing (JGL) that gave JGL 5 years to purchase the Nicholsons' property. The option contained a consent to assignment clause that required JGL to obtain the Nicholsons' written consent before assignment to a third party. JGL subsequently assigned an interest in the property to plaintiff but did not notify the Nicholsons. Plaintiff spent money improving the property but missed a payment. The Nicholsons then notified JGL that the option expired and that they intended to sell the property to someone else. Plaintiff sued JGL and the Nicholsons, JGL counterclaimed against plaintiff and filed cross-claims against the Nicholsons, the Nicholsons counterclaimed against JGL, and all three parties moved for summary judgment. The District Court dismissed plaintiff's claim because plaintiff was not a party to the contract. The court also held that the consent to assignment clause was valid and enforceable, but that even though JGL breached the agreement by not notifying the Nicholsons of the assignment and by missing a payment, the breach was not material and did not serve to terminate JGL's right to exercise the option. The court then concluded that forfeiture would be too harsh a remedy, excused the forfeiture, and granted JGL 20 days to pay the Nicholsons the full purchase price. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiff failed to show a genuine issue of material fact that the Nicholsons waived their rights under the consent to assignment clause. The breach of contract by JGL was incidental rather than material, so the District Court's holding that forfeiture would be too harsh was not erroneous. Thus, the District Court correctly applied the antiforfeiture statute when it granted JGL equitable relief under this section because JGL's breach was not grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent. It was only when the Nicholsons discovered that they could sell the property at a greater profit that they acted to strictly enforce the timely payment provision of the contract, so application of the antiforfeiture statute was appropriate to avoid an unjust result. R.C. Hobbs Enterprises, LLC v. J.G.L. Distrib., Inc., 2004 MT 396, 325 M 277, 104 P3d 503 (2004). See also Erban v. Monforton, 227 M 531, 740 P2d 677 (1987), Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25 (2000), and VanDyke Constr. Co., Inc. v. Stillwater Min. Co., 2003 MT 279, 317 M 519, 78 P3d 844 (2003).

Appeal Raising Section's Application for First Time: Appellant against whom forfeiture of a contract for deed was granted for failure to make payments could not have Supreme Court review of the application of this section where he did not raise applicability of the section at trial. Hares

v. Nelson, 195 M 463, 637 P2d 19, 38 St. Rep. 2036 (1981). See also Massar Cattle Co. v. Reese, 216 M 22, 699 P2d 87, 42 St. Rep. 604 (1985).

Ambiguous Notice: Where vendor brought action to recover possession of realty and the notice of forfeiture was ambiguous and attempted to accelerate payment to an amount almost twice that which could be rightfully demanded and the total amount of the forfeiture was twice the rental value of the property, the vendor's notice did not terminate the vendee's rights under the contract and the District Court should have granted vendee's motion to dismiss under former Rule 41(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). Shuey v. Hamilton, 142 M 83, 381 P2d 482 (1963).

Judgment of Forfeiture Not Sought: Where, in an action for the cancellation of a land contract for breach of its conditions by the vendee, the vendor does not seek a judgment of forfeiture but waives any claim to damages and prays only for possession after default and notice, giving ample opportunity to repair the default as provided in the contract, the provision of this section that where a party incurs a forfeiture by reason of his failure to comply with the provisions of his contract he may be relieved therefrom upon making full compensation to other party has no application. Huffine v. Lincoln, 87 M 267, 287 P 629 (1930).

Insufficient Statement of Facts: While courts are reluctant to enforce forfeitures and conditions involving them must be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit they are created, where a purchaser of farmland, under a contract which made time of its essence and provided that in case of default in the stipulated payments the purchaser should forfeit his right to possession and all payments made as liquidated damages, remained in possession for 10 years without any complaint, and then finding himself unable by reason of conditions beyond his control to meet the final payment notified the vendor of his inability to make payment and of his desire to surrender the land, the contract was declared forfeited. Furthermore, his complaint in his action to be relieved of the forfeiture, asking recovery of the difference between the payments made by him under the contract, with taxes, insurance, cost of improvements made by him, and the value of the rental of the property, was held insufficient to state facts which appeal to the conscience of a court of equity and therefore insufficient to state a cause of action under this section. Estabrook v. Sonstelie, 86 M 435, 284 P 147 (1930).

Improper Complaint: To entitle a defaulting purchaser to relief from forfeiture under the provisions of this section, he must set forth facts which will appeal to the conscience of a court of equity. Hence, a complaint intermingling allegations appropriate to an action for rescission of contract and one for breach of it was properly held insufficient as one for relief from a forfeiture, for failure to allege willingness by plaintiff to do equity even by payment of rent for 7 years of occupancy of farmlands. He on the contrary demanded recovery of the whole amount paid defendant, including taxes paid during that time. Friedrichsen v. Cobb, 84 M 238, 275 P 267 (1929).

Essential Allegations: Where a purchaser of property seeks to avoid forfeiture of an advance payment incurred by reason of his failure to complete his contract, he must, under this section, allege and prove that his default was not the result of his grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent breach of duty, and failure to do so deprives him of the right to invoke the rule. Ellinghouse v. Hansen Packing Co., 66 M 444, 213 P 1087 (1923).

GENERAL

Public Duty Doctrine Inapplicable: The plaintiff sued the city of Columbia Falls for negligence, premises liability, breach of professional duties, and wrongful death after her husband died following a skateboarding accident on a subdivision walking path, the design of which the city had monitored and approved. The District Court applied the public duty doctrine and granted the city summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The public duty doctrine does not apply when a governmental defendant has a specific duty to a plaintiff arising from generally applicable principles of law that would support a tort claim, i.e., if a private person would be liable to the plaintiff for the acts that were committed by the government, then the governmental entity would be similarly liable. Because the city was actively involved in the design of the walking path and exercised its statutory and contractual authority to approve it, the city could be held liable for violation of a statutory duty and the voluntary assumption of a duty to act with ordinary care; therefore, the District Court erred in applying the public duty doctrine. Kent v. Columbia Falls, 2015 MT 139, 379 Mont. 190, 350 P.3d 9.

No Evidence to Support Malicious Prosecution or Abuse of Process Claim — District Court Dismissal of Attorney Deceit Claim Improper: In a suit for malicious prosecution, abuse of process, and attorney deceit, the District Court did not err by granting judgment in favor of the defendant on the malicious prosecution claim or by awarding summary judgment to the defendant on the abuse of process claim when the plaintiff failed to prove the elements necessary to establish the claims. The plaintiff failed to prove malicious prosecution when, for purposes of establishing probable cause, all of the parties reasonably believed the facts gave rise to a valid claim. The plaintiff also failed to prove abuse of process despite his allegations that the ulterior purpose of the suit was to coerce him into paying damages. Payment of damages is a legitimate purpose for a civil action, and no facts existed to demonstrate that the defendant acted with an improper ulterior purpose. However, the District Court erred by granting summary judgment to the defendant on the attorney deceit claim when a trier of fact could find that the defendant acted deceitfully with the intent to deceive opposing counsel. Spoja v. White, 2014 MT 9, 373 Mont. 269, 317 P.3d 153, following Plouffe v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2002 MT 64, 309 Mont. 184, 45 P.3d 10, Hughes v. Lynch, 2007 MT 177, 338 Mont. 214, 164 P.3d 913, and Judd v. Burlington N. & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 2008 MT 181, 343 Mont. 416, 186 P.3d 214.

Causation in Legal Malpractice Claim — Summary Judgment Not Proper — Plaintiffs Not Required to Show Claim Would Have Been Successful: An attorney missed a statute of limitations deadline in a medical malpractice case by failing to file an application with the Montana Medical Legal Panel before filing a complaint in District Court, as required under 27-6-301 and 27-6-701. After the medical malpractice claim was dismissed, the plaintiffs filed a legal malpractice case against the attorney, but the District Court dismissed the legal malpractice case during summary judgment on the grounds that the plaintiffs did not carry the burden of showing that the underlying medical malpractice claim would have been successful. On appeal, the Supreme Court revisited Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 Mont. 342, 916 P.2d 122 (1996), Babcock Place Ltd. Partnership v. Berg, Lilly, Andriolo, & Tollefsen, P.C., 2003 MT 111, 315 Mont. 364, 69 P.3d 1145, and Fisher v. Swift Transp. Co., Inc., 2008 MT 105, 342 Mont. 335, 181 P.3d 601, and determined that it was error for the District Court to require the plaintiffs to prove that the medical malpractice case would have been successful given that there was no independent intervening cause after the plaintiffs' injury. All that was required was a showing that the plaintiffs' injury (not being able to pursue the case) would not have occurred but for the attorney's negligent conduct. Labair v. Carey, 2012 MT 312, 367 Mont. 453, 291 P.3d 1160. On remand in Labair v. Carey, 2016 MT 272, 385 Mont. 233, 383 P.3d 226, the Supreme Court determined that the plaintiffs more probably than not would have recovered a settlement. Thus, the plaintiffs were entitled to judgment as a matter of law on this first element of settlement damages.

Public Duty Doctrine Inapplicable for City Playground Injury: The public duty doctrine did not apply in a negligence claim against a city for the failure to maintain a playground area given the applicability of clear and established rules of premises liability. Based on an analysis of foreseeability, it was reasonable and proper to hold the city to a duty to exercise reasonable care in maintaining its public parks. Gatlin-Johnson v. Miles City, 2012 MT 302, 367 Mont. 414, 291 P.3d 1129, followed in Kent v. Columbia Falls, 2015 MT 139, 379 Mont. 190, 350 P.3d 9.

Proper Venue for Malicious Prosecution Claim Considered County Where Breach of Duty and Damages Occur: Plaintiff filed a malicious prosecution claim in Missoula County, alleging that defendant intentionally and maliciously filed and prosecuted an unsupportable federal cause of action in that county. Defendant moved for a change of venue, but the District Court concluded that Missoula County was a proper venue and denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Defendant's purported breach of duty occurred upon filing the claim in Missoula County, and plaintiff incurred damages in that county, so the concurrence of breach and damages in Missoula County supported the District Court's conclusion that Missoula County was a proper venue for the malicious prosecution claim. Deist v. Thornton, 2009 MT 21, 349 M 94, 201 P3d 800 (2009). See also Carter v. Nye, 266 M 226, 879 P2d 729 (1994).

No Special Relationship Between City and Residents to Protect Residents in Vicinity of Proposed Building Modification Based on Public Duty Doctrine: The city of Hamilton passed zoning ordinances that included a master plan for providing services and the orderly development of property. When the city approved a casino that bordered a residential zone, neighbors eventually complained about the noise and general nuisances surrounding the casino business. When the city did not respond to the neighbors' satisfaction, the neighbors sued the city on grounds that the ordinances imposed a special duty on the city to protect the residents pursuant to the public duty doctrine expressed in Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972 (1999). The District Court determined that under the doctrine, neither the city nor its officials owed any special duty to the neighbors when passing the master plan or when deciding whether to take action to abate the alleged nuisance, and summary judgment was granted to the city. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The court noted that the doctrine generally provides that when a municipality owes a duty to the general public, that duty is not owed to any particular individual unless a special relationship exists, under an exception set out in Nelson, thus giving rise to a special duty that is more particular than that owed to the public. A special relationship is established: (1) by a statute intended to protect a specific class of persons, of which the plaintiff is a member, from a particular type of harm; (2) when a government agent undertakes specific action to protect a person or property; (3) by governmental actions that reasonably induce detrimental reliance by a member of the public; and (4) under certain circumstances when the agency has actual custody of the plaintiff or of a third person who harms the plaintiff. In this case, the master plan was clearly adopted for the benefit of the general public and did not create a special relationship between the city and the neighbors, so the city had no special duty to protect the neighbors from any harm that might result from the city's adoption of the plan. Because no genuine issue of material fact existed regarding a special duty required of the city, summary judgment was proper. Prosser v. Kennedy Enterprises, Inc., 2008 MT 87, 342 M 209, 179 P3d 1178 (2008), distinguished in Kent v. Columbia Falls, 2015 MT 139, 379 Mont. 190, 350 P.3d 9.

No Finding of Malicious Prosecution, Abuse of Process, or Tortious Interference in Employment Discrimination Claim — Judgment as Matter of Law Proper: Lynch filed an employment discrimination claim against doctor Hughes for sexual harassment actions that Hughes took in a hospital in which Lynch was employed. The Commission for Human Rights determined that Hughes was not an employer or agent of an employer, so Hughes did not bear an employer's liability for sexual harassment. Hughes' behavior after Lynch filed the claim was determined to constitute illegal retaliation, but because Lynch did not claim retaliation, the claim was dismissed. Hughes then filed an action in District Court alleging malicious prosecution, abuse of process, and tortious interference. The court found that the claims could not be proved and granted Lynch judgment as a matter of law. Hughes appealed, but the Supreme Court examined each claim and affirmed. First, Hughes could not prove that there was a lack of probable cause for Lynch's action or that the proceeding favored Lynch, so the malicious prosecution claim failed. Second, nothing in the record showed that Lynch used abuse of process to coerce Hughes to do some collateral thing that Hughes could not be legally and regularly compelled to do, so the abuse of process claim also failed. Third, there was no evidence to suggest that Lynch's acts were calculated to damage Hughes, and Lynch was entitled to seek redress and damages for the alleged discrimination, so the tortious interference claim failed as well. Thus, the District Court correctly determined that no genuine issue of material fact existed and that Lynch was entitled to judgment as a matter of law. Hughes v. Lynch, 2007 MT 177, 338 M 214, 164 P3d 913 (2007), following Plouffe v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2002 MT 64, 309 M 184, 45 P3d 10 (2002), and Comm'n on Unauthorized Practice of Law v. O'Neil, 2006 MT 284, 334 M 311, 147 P3d 200 (2006), and followed in Judd v. Burlington N. & Santa Fe Ry. Co., 2008 MT 181, 343 M 416, 186 P3d 214 (2008), with regard to applicability of the probable cause standard for a malicious prosecution claim.

Application of Improper Paint to Water Treatment Center Pipes — Definition of Physical Injury in Context of Commercial General Liability Insurance Contract: Plaintiff entered a contract with the city of Libby for construction of a water treatment plant. Plaintiff then entered a subcontract with defendant to paint the filter tanks and pipes at the plant. Plaintiff was listed as an additional insured on defendant's commercial general liability insurance policy. Defendant used an improper paint, and the city sued plaintiff as the general contractor for repainting costs. The insurer refused to defend or indemnify plaintiff, claiming that policy exclusions precluded coverage for the city's claim. Plaintiff successfully argued in District Court that the exclusions applied only to defendant as the named insured. On appeal, the Supreme Court considered whether the policy language referring to physical injury to tangible property covered the application of improper paint, concluding that the policy applied. Physical injury refers to a physical and material alteration resulting in a detriment. The policy covered property damage, including loss of use, and application of the improper paint physically and materially altered the tanks and pipes, resulting in a detriment to the city. The District Court was affirmed. Swank Enterprises, Inc. v. All Purpose Serv., Ltd., 2007 MT 57, 336 M 197, 154 P3d 52 (2007), following Lindsay Drilling v. USF&G, 208 M 91, 676 P2d 203 (1984).

Summary Judgment on Negligence Claim Affirmed Absent Showing of Breach of Duty of Care: Bonilla claimed that the University of Montana was negligent in providing a chair at a concert that Bonilla attended when the chair broke and Bonilla was injured. Ordinarily, the determination of whether a defendant breached a legal duty is not susceptible to summary judgment unless the evidence is undisputed or susceptible to only one conclusion by reasonable people. However, Bonilla failed to produce any evidence explaining how or why the chair broke and whether it was due to the breach of any duty by the University. Bonilla never reported the incident, so the University had no record of the incident. The only evidence offered to support a negligence claim was Bonilla's own testimony that the chair would not have broken unless there was a problem with it. University officials explained their policy of assuring the safety of their chairs and of selecting chairs for durability and quality. The University met its burden of demonstrating the absence of material fact regarding any breach of a duty of care, while Bonilla did not meet the burden of showing that the University breached a duty of care. Summary judgment for the University was affirmed. Bonilla v. Univ. of Mont., 2005 MT 183, 328 M 41, 116 P3d 823 (2005).

Summary Judgment on Breach of Contract Affirmed — Wrongful Discharge Claim Reversed for Determination of Whether Claimant Was Employee or Independent Contractor: Tvedt brought a claim for breach of contract, wrongful termination, and indemnification of expenses, alleging that defendant group had breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, waived the at-will clauses in their employment agreement, and mischaracterized Tvedt as an independent contractor, rather than an employee. Defendant group moved for summary judgment and filed a contingent counterclaim stating that in the event that Tvedt was found to be defendant group's employee, then defendant group's obligation to pay Tvedt the contract value should cease and all payments made to Tvedt should be returned. The District Court determined that Tvedt was not an employee and granted summary judgment to defendant group on all claims, and Tvedt appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed summary judgment on the breach of covenant issue because Tvedt was given adequate notice of termination, defendant group was exercising the specific language of the at-will termination provision of the contract, and Tvedt did not demonstrate that defendant group had waived the right to enforce that provision. However, the court reversed summary judgment on the wrongful discharge claim because the District Court incorrectly applied defendant group's novation argument and because genuine issues of fact remained whether Tvedt was an employee or independent contractor and whether a manager's agreement that recognized Tvedt individually was in effect at the time of termination. Remand was ordered because the District Court never considered whether Tvedt was entitled to relief for wrongful discharge as a matter of law and, if so, whether the claim for indemnification was appropriate. Tvedt v. Farmers Ins. Group of Co., 2004 MT 125, 321 M 263, 91 P3d 1 (2004).

Legal Duty of Sheriff to Protect Domestic Violence Victim — Exception to Public Duty Doctrine Immunity Created Between Sheriff and Victim: Plaintiffs' mother was a domestic violence victim who was killed by her husband. Plaintiffs sued the County Sheriff for negligently failing to take action to protect the victim. A jury found the Sheriff negligent and awarded plaintiffs $358,000. The Sheriff moved for judgment as a matter of law, and the District Court granted the motion and vacated the jury verdict, finding that no special relationship existed between the victim and the Sheriff under the domestic violence statutes that would trigger a legal duty upon the Sheriff to protect the victim. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted an exception to the public duty doctrine's immunity provision in cases when a special relationship between the victim and an officer has been created. The domestic violence statutes created such a special relationship, which gave rise to a special duty by virtue of the victim's status as a member of a protected class. The Sheriff had a statutory duty to protect the victim with a notice of her rights under 46-6-602, and by failing to give the victim the required notice, the jury could conclude that the Sheriff was negligent and, arguably, negligent per se. Although arrest of the husband was discretionary, the Sheriff also had a mandatory duty under 46-6-603 to seize the husband's weapon, which had been displayed during a prior domestic dispute, but failed to do so. Thus, the jury had sufficient evidence to conclude that the Sheriff's negligence or negligent per se conduct led to the victim's death, and the District Court committed reversible error in granting judgment to the contrary. Massee v. Thompson, 2004 MT 121, 321 M 210, 90 P3d 394 (2004), following Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972 (1999).

Duty of Contractor to Adhere to Building Code — Liability for Radon Damage Properly Submitted to Jury: A contractor built an indoor tennis facility, and the facility developed water leakage and radon damage. The District Court submitted the question of radon mitigation damages to the jury, which the contractor contended was error because neither the construction contract nor building codes required radon mitigation. However, the building code did require installation of a subsurface vapor barrier and proper sized gravel, which the contractor did not install, and breach of the duty to install the barrier and proper gravel resulted in damages, including radon damages. Thus, submission of radon damages to the jury was proper. Glacier Tennis Club at the Summit, LLC v. Treweek Constr. Co., Inc., 2004 MT 70, 320 M 351, 87 P3d 431 (2004).

No Negligence by Architect if Professional Information Not Communicated in Absence of Contract: A tennis club filed a negligence and breach of contract action against a contractor who constructed a tennis facility for the club. The contractor in turn filed a third-party negligence action against the architect who had provided preliminary design parameters and building specifications for the facility. The District Court summarily dismissed the third-party claim, and the contractor appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Applying Jim's Excavating Serv., Inc. v. HKM Associates, 265 M 494, 878 P2d 248 (1994), and Restatement (Second) of Torts 552 (1976), the court held that the architect owed no duty of care to the contractor because the contractor had no contract for the architect's services and failed to prove that the architect communicated professional information with the intention that the information be relied upon by the contractor. Absent a duty of care, there was no breach, so the third-party action failed as a matter of law, and summary judgment was proper. Glacier Tennis Club at the Summit, LLC v. Treweek Constr. Co., Inc., 2004 MT 70, 320 M 351, 87 P3d 431 (2004). Jim's Excavating was followed in W. Sec. Bank v. Eide Bailly, LLP, 2010 MT 291, 359 Mont. 34, 249 P.3d 35.

No Attorney Negligence Given Reasonable Representation — Jury Verdict Affirmed: Plaintiffs contended that defendant, their attorney, was negligent by failing to obtain and review all relevant documents in order to explain the nature of a business transaction in order for plaintiffs to make an informed decision and that by failing in this duty, the attorney negligently allowed plaintiffs to make a binding commitment to sell the business. After 5 days of trial, which included conflicting testimony from experts for both parties, a jury found that the attorney was not negligent. After reviewing the record, the Supreme Court affirmed. When viewed in the light most favorable to the attorney, there was sufficient credible evidence to support the jury's conclusion that the attorney met the duty of care to plaintiffs. Moreover, it was within the standard of care for the attorney to rely on the opinion of a financial consultant as to the reasonableness of the financial tests contained in the sale agreement. The court declined to reverse a jury verdict that was supported by substantial credible evidence. Byers v. Cummings, 2004 MT 69, 320 M 339, 87 P3d 465 (2004).

No Duty of Care Absent Relationship Between Plaintiff and Insurance Agent: Seal sold saddles and tack to Hart. Hart was to procure insurance on the goods to protect against casualty loss and theft, so Hart contracted with a South Dakota insurance agent for property insurance. Seal was not named in the policy as a loss payee. The goods were subsequently stolen, but the insurer refused to pay on grounds that Hart was not a common carrier and, as owner of the property, was not hauling the property of another. Seal sued the insurance agent for breach of contract and failure to procure insurance on Seal's behalf. The District Court concluded that Seal did not contract with the agent to insure any person, property, or risk in Montana, so no relationship existed between the parties to establish a duty on the agent's behalf to procure insurance for Seal. The Supreme Court affirmed. The question of duty is a problem of the relationship between individuals that imposes upon one a legal obligation for the benefit of the other. Here, the only conversations regarding the procurement of insurance occurred between Hart and the agent. Seal never contacted the agent, so no relationship existed between Seal and the agent that gave rise to a corresponding duty to allow Seal to recover on the claim. The certificate of insurance alone did not constitute a contract to procure insurance or impose a duty on the certificate issuer to procure insurance. Seal v. Hart, 2002 MT 149, 310 M 307, 50 P3d 522 (2002). See also Lu-An-Do, Inc. v. Kloots, 721 NE 2d 507 (Ohio Ct. App. 1999).

Permanent Injunction Inappropriate Limitation of Lawful Irrigation Practices: The Wellses built a home on property adjacent to land that had been flood irrigated by the Youngs for generations. Between 1994 and 1998, the Youngs' land was irrigated three times, and on each occasion, the Wellses experienced flooding in the crawl space of their home. The Wellses sought damages in excess of $80,000 based on tort theories of negligence, nuisance, and trespass. The District Court reasoned that because the irrigation practices predated the construction of the Wellses' home, they could not recover damages or recover on their trespass claim under 85-7-2212. The court also concluded that the nuisance claim was barred by 27-30-101. The court held that the Youngs breached the general obligation imposed by this section because their irrigation practices caused immediate, irreparable, and substantial harm to the Wellses' home, but the negligence claim was disposed of because the Wellses failed to establish that the irrigation practiced breached the standard of care of a reasonable farm irrigator engaged in flood irrigation. Nevertheless, the District Court permanently enjoined the Youngs from irrigating their property because future irrigation without modification of the head ditch would result in an unreasonable and substantial risk of continuing harm and irreparable injury to the Wellses' property. The Youngs moved to vacate the injunction based on the determination that their irrigation practices were lawful, but the motion was denied, so the Youngs appealed. The Supreme Court examined the record for abuse of discretion, noting that a District Court must find a breach of an obligation by the party sought to be enjoined before imposing a permanent injunction. The District Court's general finding that the Youngs breached the duty imposed under this section conflicted with the specific findings that the Youngs did not trespass or create a nuisance and conformed to the applicable standard of care. Absent a specific breach of obligation, the District Court abused its discretion in issuing a permanent injunction enjoining the Youngs from engaging in lawful flood irrigation practices. Wells v. Young, 2002 MT 102, 309 M 419, 47 P3d 809 (2002), distinguishing Madison Fork Ranch v. L&B Lodge Pole Timber Prod., 189 M 292, 615 P2d 900 (1980).

Erroneous Conclusion That Elements of Malicious Prosecution by State Not Established — Judgment as Matter of Law Improper: Plaintiffs were cited by the state for various water quality violations related to their public swimming pools, drinking water, and discharge from a sewage lagoon. The charges were ultimately dropped, and both plaintiffs filed separate actions that were settled, except for plaintiffs' malicious prosecution claims against the state, which were joined for trial by jury. At the close of plaintiffs' case, the state's motion for judgment as a matter of law was granted, so plaintiffs appealed. As set out in Orser v. St., 178 M 126, 582 P2d 1227 (1978), in a civil action for malicious prosecution, plaintiff must introduce sufficient proof of the following elements: (1) a judicial proceeding has been commenced and prosecuted against the plaintiff; (2) the defendant was responsible for litigating, prosecuting, or continuing the proceeding; (3) there is lack of probable cause for the defendant's acts; (4) the defendant was actuated by malice; (5) the proceeding terminated in favor of the plaintiff; and (6) the plaintiff suffered damages. Here, the District Court found that plaintiffs had not met their burden of proof regarding elements three, four, and five. The Supreme Court examined each of those elements—lack of probable cause, malice, and favorable termination of the underlying suit—and concluded that the elements were met, warranting reversal for trial on the merits. Judgment as a matter of law averts trial by jury and is proper only in rare cases when undisputed evidence admits of only one conclusion. Although the proceedings to date in this case did not demonstrate guilt or innocence, plaintiffs nevertheless made out a prima facie case that warranted jury determination. Plouffe v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2002 MT 64, 309 M 184, 45 P3d 10 (2002), following McGuire v. Armitage, 184 M 407, 603 P2d 253 (1979), Miller v. Watkins, 200 M 455, 653 P2d 126 (1982), and Sacco v. High Country Independent Press, Inc., 271 M 209, 896 P2d 411 (1995), and followed in Seipel v. Olympic Coast Investments, 2008 MT 237, 344 M 415, 188 P3d 1027 (2008).

No Negligence by Irrigation District for Failure to Warn of Unforeseeable Flood: Plaintiffs' property was damaged by an unprecedented flood caused by an ice jam on the Clark Fork River. Plaintiffs alleged that the local irrigation district was liable for breaching its duty to construct and maintain an irrigation system that would protect the property and for failing to warn of the flooding conditions to allow plaintiffs the opportunity to protect their property. The District Court held that the irrigation district had no duty to prevent the flood or to warn of the impending natural disaster, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The first element that plaintiffs must establish in a negligence action is the existence of a duty of care, and the measure of a duty of care owed is the scope of the risk that the negligent conduct foreseeably entails. Thus, the primary factor in determining whether the irrigation district owed a duty of care was whether it was foreseeable, as a matter of law, that the district's acts or omissions would pose a risk of injury to plaintiffs. Here, substantial evidence supported the conclusion that the risk that flooding would damage plaintiffs' property was unforeseeable, so the district had no duty to erect or maintain flood control structures to prevent the unforeseeable event. The district also exercised reasonable care in the maintenance of the irrigation system that was in place. Further, plaintiffs failed to advance any applicable authority that would impose upon the district a duty to warn of the unforeseeable flood because mere knowledge of the dangerous situation, of which plaintiffs themselves had become aware the night of the flood, did not impose a legal duty to warn. Gaudreau v. Clinton Irrigation District, 2001 MT 164, 306 M 121, 30 P3d 1070 (2001), following Estate of Strever v. Cline, 278 M 165, 924 P2d 666 (1996).

Lack of Justification in Relying on Allegedly False Information — Claim of Negligent Misrepresentation Properly Dismissed: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds of negligent misrepresentation, alleging that Bitterroot relied on Knutson's allegedly false information regarding the value of stock acquired through purchase of another company. However, the definition of negligent misrepresentation set out in St. Bank of Townsend v. Maryann's, Inc., 204 M 21, 664 P2d 295 (1983), requires that the party asserting that defense was justified in relying on the allegedly false information. In this case, Spencer, majority shareholder and president of both Bitterroot and the company that was acquired, knew the respective values of both companies and their stocks and knew that the book values were disparate at the time of the transaction. Thus, Spencer's assertion that he was misled by Knutson was neither credible nor supported by the record, and the District Court correctly dismissed Spencer's claim of negligent misrepresentation. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Misvaluation of Corporate Stock Not Constituting Breach of Fiduciary Duty: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds that Knutson breached his fiduciary duty to Bitterroot, arguing that Knutson's mistaken valuation of stock acquired during the purchase of another business constituted a breach of that duty. Bitterroot did not contend that Knutson acted in bad faith, but only that he was wrong about the stock value. Applying the standard in 35-1-443 (now repealed), the Supreme Court found that Knutson's inaccurate stock valuation did not constitute a breach of fiduciary duty and that the District Court did not err in dismissing Bitterroot's claim that Knutson breached his fiduciary obligation. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000). See also 18A Am. Jur. 2d Corporations §451 and 18B Am. Jur. 2d Corporations §1705.

Duty of City to Inspect City Property for Hazards: Plaintiff was injured after tripping on a fence wire while walking her dog at night in an unmaintained grassy area on city right-of-way next to a city street. Plaintiff contended that the city was negligent in allowing a dangerous and hazardous condition to exist on a public right-of-way and guilty of negligence per se under 81-4-105 for allowing a public nuisance. The District Court granted summary judgment, determining as a matter of law that the city owed plaintiff no duty of care because: (1) she was not walking on a sidewalk, street, or path of any kind; (2) the city did not invite her to travel in that area; and (3) there were no city lights or signs in the vicinity. On appeal, plaintiff cited Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748 (1997), contending that the city ignored its duty to maintain the public streets, sidewalks, and rights-of-way within corporate limits in a reasonably safe condition for public travel by never going onto the premises, mowing it, raking it, or removing debris and that if routine maintenance had been done, the wire would have been found and removed. The Supreme Court agreed. The city's contention that it did not owe a duty of care in this case, because there was nothing in the area suggesting that it was a walkway or inviting the public to use it as such, failed under the Richardson test because of the city's neglect in exercising ordinary care or skill in the management of its property. Reasonable minds could differ on whether the city should have taken some action to inspect or maintain the property, so summary judgment was improper and thus reversed for a jury determination of negligence, including possible contributory negligence. Dobrocke v. Columbia Falls, 2000 MT 179, 300 M 348, 8 P3d 71, 57 St. Rep. 718 (2000).

Determination of Whether Publication of "Most-Wanted" List Considered Privileged — Abuse of Conditional Privilege as Jury Question: Hale brought defamation and negligence claims against the Billings Police Department for publishing Hale's photograph and personal information and broadcasting the information on a cable television most-wanted fugitive program. The District Court summarily dismissed Hale's claims on grounds that the communication between the police and the media was privileged, either as a proper discharge of an official duty or as part of a judicial proceeding pursuant to 27-1-804. However, the court neglected to determine as a matter of law whether the privilege was an absolute or conditional privilege. Absent a mandate by law that the police provide information regarding arrest warrants to crime prevention programs, the privilege was, at best, conditional. Thus, it was a matter for the jury to determine whether the discharge of the official duty exercised by the police in providing criminal information was proper to the extent that the police did not abuse the privilege. Further, under Sacco v. High Country Independent Press, Inc., 271 M 209, 896 P2d 411, 52 St. Rep. 407 (1995), statements made by the police as to the facts of the case or the evidence expected to be given are not yet part of the judicial proceeding and are not privileged. Summary judgment was improper. Hale v. Billings Police Dept., 1999 MT 213, 295 M 495, 986 P2d 413, 56 St. Rep. 830 (1999), distinguishing Cox v. Lee Enterprises, Inc., 222 M 527, 723 P2d 238, 43 St. Rep. 1476 (1986).

Public Airing of County's Most-Wanted Fugitive List — Material Facts as to Falsity of Statements Precluding Summary Judgment: Hale brought defamation and negligence claims against the Billings Police Department for publishing Hale's photograph and personal information and broadcasting the information on a cable television most-wanted fugitive program and for failing to pull the information from the program after Hale's arrest. The District Court summarily dismissed Hale's claims on grounds that the information was truthful or, if not truthful, then constitutionally protected and therefore not defamatory. Hale was depicted on the program as a potentially armed and dangerous fugitive. However, Hale's warrant for domestic abuse was chosen randomly from 3,000 to 5,000 outstanding warrants on file, and his whereabouts was known at all times by the police, suggesting that under the plain meaning of the terms, Hale was not accused of using a weapon and thus could not be considered "armed and dangerous", and was not a "most-wanted" suspect or a "fugitive" from justice. Clarifying Roots v. Mont. Human Rights Network, 275 M 408, 913 P2d 638, 53 St. Rep. 205 (1996), the Supreme Court held that it was improper for the District Court to create an artificial dichotomy by distinguishing statements of opinion from statements of fact, thereby granting unqualified immunity to the former. Citing Restatement (Second) of Torts 617 (1965), the court held that if an opinion is not based on disclosed facts and, as a result, creates the reasonable inference that the opinion is based on undisclosed defamatory facts, that opinion is not afforded constitutional protection. Without that protection, genuine issues of fact regarding the falsity of the statements made during the broadcast remained, making summary judgment improper. Further, the issue remained as to what constituted timely notification of Hale's arrest to the media by the police to avoid breach of their duty not to infringe on Hale's rights. Summary judgment was reversed, and the case was remanded. Hale v. Billings Police Dept., 1999 MT 213, 295 M 495, 986 P2d 413, 56 St. Rep. 830 (1999), following Milkovich v. Lorain Journal Co., 497 US 1, 111 L Ed 2d 1, 100 S Ct 2695 (1990).

Special Relationship of Custody or Control by Prerelease Center — Responsibility for Public Safety Within Zone of Risk — Foreseeability: A prerelease center entered a contract with the Department of Corrections to supervise residents like Gardipee, who walked away from the center and subsequently injured Lopez. The District Court granted summary judgment for the center on grounds that the attack on Lopez was unforeseeable. Generally, there is no duty to protect others against harm by third persons, but in this case, the contract created a special relationship of custody or control, in turn creating a special responsibility upon the center to protect those members of the public who would be placed within the foreseeable zone of risk created by negligent supervision of a prerelease resident. As a matter of law, the center owed a duty of reasonable care to all persons present within the zone of danger created by the center's failure to exercise reasonable care in supervising Gardipee. Here, reasonable minds could differ as to whether it was reasonably foreseeable by the center that a failure to supervise Gardipee could pose an unreasonable risk of harm to Lopez in particular. There was a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the center knew or should have known that there was enmity between Gardipee and Lopez and a possibility of violence if Gardipee escaped, as well as whether Gardipee's attack was a superseding cause of the harm to Lopez. Both questions were suitable for resolution by a trier of fact, precluding summary judgment. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a trial on the merits. Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Actionable Section 1983 Claim Under State-Created Danger Theory: A government official who, while acting under color of state law, deprives an individual of constitutionally protected rights may be subject to personal liability for civil damages pursuant to 42 U.S.C. 1983. Generally, a government official's failure to protect an individual from harm does not constitute a due process violation. Inaction by the state, even when a danger is known, does not trigger a due process obligation except under the "state-created danger" theory, derived from DeShaney v. Winnebago County Dept. of Social Services 489 US 189, 103 L Ed 2d 249, 109 S Ct 998 (1989), which provides that a constitutional duty to protect may be imposed when state actors have affirmatively acted to create plaintiff's danger or to render plaintiff more vulnerable to it. Adopting the test in Huffman v. County of Los Angeles, 147 F3d 1054 (9th Cir. 1998), the Supreme Court held that to assert an actionable 42 U.S.C. 1983 claim under the state-created danger theory, plaintiff must demonstrate that the state acted affirmatively, with deliberate indifference, in creating a foreseeable danger to plaintiff, leading to deprivation of plaintiff's constitutional rights. In the present case, material facts existed as to whether an officer affirmatively and with deliberate indifference placed a woman in danger, increased her vulnerability to danger, or deprived her of her right to life; thus, summary dismissal of her husband's personal liability claim against the officer was reversible error. Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972, 56 St. Rep. 744 (1999). See also Wood v. Ostrander, 879 F2d 583 (9th Cir. 1989), and Kneipp v. Tedder, 95 F3d 1199 (3rd Cir. 1996).

Public Duty Doctrine as Applied to Law Enforcement Personnel — Exception in Cases of Special Relationship: Trina admitted that she had been drinking when stopped in her vehicle by Officer Driscoll, who nevertheless believed that sufficient probable cause did not exist to arrest the woman. Instead, thinking Trina might be impaired, the officer suggested a ride home or that Trina walk the 2-mile distance and warned Trina about returning to the vehicle. Trina decided instead to walk to a phone and call for a ride and was killed in traffic. Trina's husband brought suit for civil damages under 42 U.S.C. 1983, claiming that the officer breached the duty to protect, in violation of Trina's due process rights. The District Court summarily dismissed the claim, holding that because no probable cause existed for Trina's arrest, the officer had no duty to protect Trina from harm and that without a duty, the action failed. The public duty doctrine provides that a police officer's duty to protect and preserve the peace is owed to the public at large rather than to a particular person, unless a special relationship exists, thus giving rise to a special duty that is more particular than that owed to the public. A special relationship is established: (1) by a statute intended to protect a specific class of persons, of which the plaintiff is a member, from a particular type of harm; (2) when a government agent undertakes specific action to protect a person or property; (3) by governmental actions that reasonably induce detrimental reliance by a member of the public; and (4) under certain circumstances when the agency has actual custody of the plaintiff or of a third person who harms the plaintiff. Relying on Stewart v. Standard Publishing Co., 102 M 43, 55 P2d 694 (1936), the Supreme Court agreed that although the officer may not have initially owed Trina a duty to protect, that duty was assumed as a matter of law when the officer prevented the woman from driving her car and ensured that she did not attempt to drive. The question of whether the duty to protect was breached is a question of fact for the jury, so summary dismissal was improper. Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972, 56 St. Rep. 744 (1999), clarifying and distinguishing Phillips v. Billings, 233 M 249, 758 P2d 772 (1988), and followed in Massee v. Agricultural Lease — No Error in Failure to Give Instruction on Implied Contract Covenant to Farm in Workmanlike Manner — Express Lease Terms Stricter Than Requested Instruction on Implied Term: The Schumachers leased property that they owned to Stephens through an agricultural lease. The lease required Stephens to farm with "diligence and care" and to do "all work necessary . . . and to the best interest of lessor, all in such time and manner as shall be to the best advantage and economy". The Schumachers sued Stephens, alleging that Stephens breached the implied contract covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The District Court refused to give the Schumachers' requested instruction on an implied covenant in the lease that would have required Stephens to farm the property in a "competent, skilled, workmanlike and husbandlike fashion". The Supreme Court noted that: (1) the District Court was correct in not giving an instruction on negligence because the Schumachers' complaint and evidence contained no such theory; (2) the District Court did instruct on the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing; (3) the standard of care required of Stephens was expressly stated in the lease itself; and (4) the Schumachers had not shown that they were prejudiced by the failure to give the requested instruction. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that it was not error for the District Court to refuse to give an instruction on an implied covenant to farm in a workmanlike manner. Schumacher v. Stephens, 1998 MT 58, 288 M 115, 956 P2d 76, 55 St. Rep. 247 (1998).

Agricultural Lease — No Error in Failure to Give Plaintiffs' Instruction on Effect of Material Participation Provisions — Instruction on Mutual Cooperation Held Sufficient: The Schumachers leased property that they owned to Stephens through an agricultural lease. Later, when the Schumachers sued Stephens over Stephens' failure to comply with the terms of the lease, Stephens claimed in defense that the Schumachers had breached the material participation agreements in the lease and that therefore he was excused from compliance. The Schumachers requested an instruction stating that if the jury found that Stephens failed to cooperate with the plaintiffs, then Stephens was not entitled to claim that he was excused from liability because of his contention that the Schumachers breached the material participation agreements in the lease. The District Court refused to give the instruction and instead gave an instruction stating that "the failure of a party to fully perform a contract is excused if his performance is prevented or delayed by the conduct of the other party". The Supreme Court noted that the Schumachers had not shown that they were prejudiced in any way by the failure of the District Court to give the requested instruction. Citing Fillinger v. NW. Agency, Inc., of Great Falls, 283 M 71, 938 P2d 1347 (1997), the Supreme Court held that: (1) a party assigning error to a refused instruction must show that the party was prejudiced by the refusal; and (2) the refused instruction must be reviewed in the context of the instructions that were given and the evidence produced at trial. Under these standards, the Supreme Court held that the instruction given by the District Court was sufficient. Schumacher v. Stephens, 1998 MT 58, 288 M 115, 956 P2d 76, 55 St. Rep. 247 (1998).

Foreseeability of Results of Practical Joke — Substantial Factor Test of Causation — Defense of Superseding Intervening Cause Unavailable: Codefendants Linda and David played an April Fools' Day joke on their friend Dennis by calling him at another friend's residence and feigning distress. In his rush to assist, Dennis was in a car accident and injured plaintiff Kolar. The District Court summarily dismissed Kolar's claim against Linda and David, holding that reasonable minds could not differ as to the issue of foreseeability and that although the results of the practical joke were tragic, they were not in any way foreseeable by Linda and David. The Supreme Court reversed the grant of summary judgment, holding that Dennis's state of mind when he left the friend's residence and the extent to which Kolar's injuries should have been foreseeable by Linda and David were questions of fact for the jury, not susceptible to summary judgment. Because the case involved allegations of contributory negligence, multiple causes, and multiple defendants, the use of the substantial factor test of causation was appropriate. The affirmative defense of superseding intervening cause was not available to defendants involved in a practical joke. Kolar v. Bergo, 280 M 262, 929 P2d 867, 53 St. Rep. 1395 (1996).

Duty of Care of Firearm Owner — Independent Intervening Criminal and Negligent Acts as Superseding Firearm Owner's Negligent Breach of Duty: An 11-year-old boy died as the result of a gunshot wound inflicted with a handgun stolen by the boy and three friends from under the seat of Susanj's vehicle. The boy's mother brought a negligence action against Susanj, claiming that his act of leaving the vehicle unattended and unlocked in a public thoroughfare contributed to the boy's death. The District Court summarily dismissed the action after determining that Susanj owed no legal duty to the boy because: (1) Susanj was unaware of previous thefts in the area that would compel him to lock his vehicle; (2) Susanj did not allow entry into the vehicle; (3) Susanj did not have an open display of the firearm that would lure the boys into the vehicle to steal the weapon; and (4) the boy was not an innocent party, but rather a participant in the burglary. However, the Supreme Court held that given the foreseeability of the risk involved in the improper and unsafe use and storage of a firearm and the strong policy considerations favoring safe and prudent use and storage, as a matter of law, a firearm owner has a duty to the general public to use and store a firearm in a safe and prudent manner, taking into consideration the type of firearm, whether it is loaded or unloaded, whether the ammunition is in close proximity or easily attainable, and the location and circumstances of its use and storage. Susanj's failure to exercise ordinary care in storing a dangerous instrumentality like a loaded handgun and ammunition under the seat of his unlocked vehicle constituted a breach of the duty of care. However, the boys' two intervening criminal acts of theft from the vehicle and the intervening grossly negligent act of one boy waving the gun around with his finger on the trigger and trying to unload the gun while high on marijuana were reasonably unforeseeable and cut off all liability on Susanj's part for the boy's death. Summary dismissal of the negligence action was proper based on the independent superseding criminal and grossly negligent acts. Estate of Strever v. St., 181 M 102, 592 P2d 493 (1979), to the extent that those cases hold that no recovery can be allowed for an injury that results from an intervening act of a third party, overruling that portion of King v. St., 259 M 393, 856 P2d 954 (1993), stating that if a plaintiff's injury is caused by the intervening acts of a third party, the defendant's actions cannot be viewed as the proximate cause of the injury, followed in Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997), and distinguished in Cusenbary v. Mortensen, 1999 MT 221, 296 M 25, 987 P2d 351, 56 St. Rep. 864 (1999). See also Gentry v. Malicious Prosecution Counterclaim — Allowed: The defendant in a personal injury case filed a counterclaim against the plaintiffs, alleging that their negligence was the cause of the automobile accident involving the parties. Subsequently, in his deposition, the defendant admitted that he had been intoxicated at the time of the accident, that he had been driving negligently, and that the plaintiffs had not been negligent. The plaintiffs sought summary judgment to dismiss the defendant's counterclaims, but prior to the hearing, the defendant voluntarily dismissed his counterclaims. The lower court ruled that the plaintiffs could not seek damages for malicious prosecution because the court believed that the defendant's dismissal of his counterclaims was part of the overall settlement and that therefore there had not been a termination of a proceeding in favor of the plaintiffs, one of the required elements of malicious prosecution claims. The Supreme Court, in a case of first impression, held that a claim resolved by settlement rather than by judgment did constitute a termination in favor of the plaintiffs. O'Fallon v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 260 M 233, 859 P2d 1008, 50 St. Rep. 1022 (1993).

Malpractice Action Against Veterinarians to Be Supported by Expert Testimony: Zimmerman argued that the lower court erred in dismissing his suit for malpractice against Robertson, a veterinarian, on the basis that Zimmerman had failed to produce any expert medical testimony supporting his claims. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court extended the requirement for expert testimony to malpractice suits against veterinarians. Zimmerman v. Robertson, 259 M 105, 854 P2d 338, 50 St. Rep. 703 (1993).

Limited Application of Nondelegable Duty Exception to Respondeat Superior Doctrine: Application of the nondelegable duty exception to the respondeat superior doctrine is limited to instances of safety in which the subject matter is inherently dangerous. The Supreme Court declined to modify the presently accepted version of the doctrine by adopting the exception, set out in section 214 of Restatement (Second) of Agency, that a master or other principal who is under a duty to provide protection for or to have care used to protect others or their property and who confides the performance or duty to a servant or other person is subject to liability to others for harm caused to them by the failure of the agent to perform the duty. Noting that there are several reasons for and against extending the liability of an employer when an intentional tort is committed only because or by virtue of the employment situation, the court opted to leave adoption of such a major doctrinal change to the Legislature. Maguire v. St., 254 M 178, 835 P2d 755, 49 St. Rep. 688 (1992), followed in Estate of Strever v. Cline, 278 M 165, 924 P2d 666, 53 St. Rep. 576 (1996).

Requested Coverage Provided — Malpractice Claim Unfounded: Insureds alleged insurance company malpractice based on a breach of the company's duty to sell insurance to properly cover the insureds' needs. Summary dismissal of the claim was proper in light of insured's admission that the company provided the coverage requested. Kaseta v. NW. Agency of Great Falls, 252 M 135, 827 P2d 804, 49 St. Rep. 183 (1992).

Near Privity Rule Applied to Accountants: The plaintiff brought an action against an accountant for negligent performance of an audit and negligent misrepresentation of financial information. The plaintiff had not retained the defendant but had relied on the audit in purchasing a business from the party that had requested the audit. The Supreme Court adopted the "near privity" rule, stating that an accountant may owe a duty to a third party but only if the accountant knows that a specific third party intends to rely on his work and only if the reliance is in connection to a particular transaction of which the accountant is aware. Thayer v. Hicks, 243 M 138, 793 P2d 784, 47 St. Rep. 1082 (1990).

Discharge From Employment — Injury to Be Expected — Intentional Conduct Exclusion Applied: Employee claimed he was intentionally fired for refusing to violate Montana law, resulting in emotional and mental injury. The employer tendered the suit to National Surety Corporation, which refused to defend on grounds that the policy did not provide coverage for an occurrence of this sort. The District Court agreed, and the Supreme Court affirmed on the basis that the claimed injury fell outside the definition of "occurrence". Although an intentional act may constitute an occurrence when the alleged injury was not the expected or intended result of the conduct, here there was no injury alleged that could not be expected to flow from the termination. Therefore, the intentional conduct exclusion was properly applied. Daly Ditches Irrigation District v. Nat'l Sur. Elements of Malicious Prosecution Claim: Plaintiffs may only recover damages on a malicious prosecution claim when each of the following six elements exists: (1) a judicial proceeding has been commenced and prosecuted against the plaintiff; (2) defendant was responsible for litigating, prosecuting, or continuing the proceeding; (3) there is lack of probable cause for the defendant's acts; (4) defendant was actuated by malice; (5) the proceeding terminated in favor of the plaintiff; and (6) the plaintiff suffered damages. Davis v. Sheriff, 234 M 126, 762 P2d 221, 45 St. Rep. 1783 (1988), citing Orser v. St., 178 M 126, 582 P2d 1227 (1978). These elements were applied in Plouffe v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2002 MT 64, 309 M 184, 45 P3d 10 (2002), Hughes v. Lynch, 2007 MT 177, 338 M 214, 164 P3d 913 (2007), and McLeod v. St., 2009 MT 130, 350 M 285, 206 P3d 956 (2009).

First-Party Insurance Bad Faith Claim — When Not Supported: Where plaintiff in making a first-party insurance bad faith claim failed to specify any violation of duty by defendant insurer and made no claimant contact with defendant, no request for defense, and no request for indemnity, the directed verdict for defendant was proper. Davis v. Sheriff, 234 M 126, 762 P2d 221, 45 St. Rep. 1783 (1988).

"Constructive Discharge" Construed: As outlined in Pittman v. Hattiesburg Municipal Separate School District, 644 F2d 1071 (5th Cir. 1981), constructive discharge occurs when an employer deliberately makes an employee's working conditions so intolerable that the employee is forced into an involuntary resignation. The federal District Court found that plaintiff could prove constructive discharge and breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing if it was shown that a supervisor's intentional conduct caused plaintiff's mental breakdown, leading to loss of plaintiff's job. Oedewaldt v. J.C. Penney Co., Inc., 687 F. Supp. 517, 45 St. Rep. 1366 (D.C. Mont. 1988). But see Frigon v. Morrison-Maierle, Inc., 233 M 113, 760 P2d 57, 45 St. Rep. 1344 (1988), wherein the Montana Supreme Court declined to recognize the doctrine of constructive discharge beyond discrimination cases and held that the covenant of good faith and fair dealing applied only in cases of employee termination.

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Applicable Only to Employee Termination: The assertion that breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing is a separate tort from wrongful discharge is correct. However, the covenant is applicable only in cases of employee termination. When there was no express termination and there were insufficient facts to establish constructive discharge, summary dismissal of a charge of breach of the covenant was affirmed. Frigon v. Morrison-Maierle, Inc., 233 M 113, 760 P2d 57, 45 St. Rep. 1344 (1988).

Attorney Not Negligent for Preparation of Fill-in-the-Blank Contracts: Defendant sought indemnification for damages from his former attorney, alleging that but for the attorney's negligence, he would not be in breach of contract. The attorney had prepared fill-in-the-blank contracts for defendant's use in land purchases. The attorney was absolved from liability for defendant's failure to perform under the contract terms because the attorney drafted the contracts with a reasonable degree of care for defendant's purposes, he based the contract on information supplied by defendant, and he made no guarantee of the validity of the instrument. Schilke v. Bean, 232 M 125, 755 P2d 565, 45 St. Rep. 930 (1988).

FELA, Not State Statutory Law, as Providing Remedy for Common Law Claims: Claimant sought compensation from a Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) self-insurer for an alleged breach of the common law duty of good faith and fair dealing. Claimant argued that because FELA did not specifically address the problem of unfair claims settlement practices, the duties imposed by Montana statutory and common law were not preempted by FELA and should apply. The federal District Court found no authority for this novel proposition in holding that the rights and duties of an employee and employer subject to FELA depend on the terms of the Act itself and on common law as interpreted by the federal courts; therefore, FELA presents the exclusive remedy in all actions falling within the ambit of the Act to the exclusion of state statutory and common law. Toscano v. Burlington N. RR Co., 678 F. Supp. 1477, 45 St. Rep. 367 (D.C. Mont. 1987).

Summary Judgment Proper Upon Failure to Show Evidence of Due Care: When a fire, caused by a floating power line, burned plaintiff's house and property, the District Court granted partial summary judgment, ruling that Montana Power Company (MPC) negligently failed to exercise the proper duty of care in the inspection and maintenance of its utility lines. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the grant of summary judgment, ruling that when the defendant has a high standard of care and the plaintiff provides clear evidence of negligence, it becomes incumbent upon the defendant to provide evidence to show due care was exercised. If the defendant fails to provide such evidence, summary judgment is proper. Ogden v. Mont. Power Co., 229 M 387, 747 P2d 201, 44 St. Rep. 2068 (1987); on reconsideration, opinion withdrawn and replaced by Ogden v. Mont. Power Co., 229 M 387, 747 P2d 201, 44 St. Rep. 2068 (1987).

Failure of Alter Ego and Principal/Agency Theories in Proving Duty of Parent Company to Provide Safe Workplace — No Separate Liability for Injury Covered by Subsidiary's Workers' Compensation: Plaintiff was an employee of a subsidiary company and argued that the subsidiary was so controlled by the parent company that the corporate cloak should be cast aside allowing suit against the parent company. The Supreme Court found no suggestion that the parent company was engaged directly in the business of the subsidiary or that the parent company was an operating entity engaged in operating its business at the place of injury. There was no indication that the subsidiary was used as a subterfuge to defeat public convenience, justify wrong, or perpetuate fraud; therefore, summary judgment was not precluded by the alter ego or principal/agency theory. Further, the subsidiary had discharged its responsibility for plaintiff by securing workers' compensation insurance, with the result that neither the parent company nor its subsidiary would be separately subject to liability for the injury which was covered by workers' compensation. Thornock v. Pack River Management Co., 227 M 524, 740 P2d 1119, 44 St. Rep. 1284 (1987).

Unlawful Conduct Not Necessarily Bar to Negligence Action: Plaintiff and defendant were engaged in the illegal activity of hunting coyotes from defendant's airplane without a proper permit when the plane crashed. The pari delicto doctrine, found in 1-3-215, does not bar plaintiff's negligence action against the defendant as pilot. Conduct prohibited by law that is not strongly condemned by public policy as a matter of serious criminal conduct or delinquency may not be sufficient to bar recovery. The hunting statute in issue is not of a type involving conduct of which the law so strongly disapproves as a matter of public policy that access to the courts should be denied for tort purposes. In light of this holding, the court overrules two prior Montana cases that relied on the pari delicto doctrine to bar lawsuits. The two are Melville v. Butte-Balaklava Copper Co., 47 M 1, 130 P 441 (1913), and Jackson v. Lomas, 60 M 8, 198 P 434 (1921). Waller v. Engelke, 227 M 470, 741 P2d 385, 44 St. Rep. 1241 (1987). However, see Patten v. Raddatz, 271 M 276, 895 P2d 633, 52 St. Rep. 439 (1995), in which the court applied the doctrine of in pari delicto to bar recovery when prostitution and drug consumption constituted the primary purpose of the contract.

Alleged Violations of Collective Bargaining Agreement Preempted by Federal Labor Law: Although a collective bargaining agreement did not specifically address standards to be applied in a situation where an employee was discharged, tort claims alleging negligence and breach of good faith were substantially dependent on terms in the contract establishing wage schedules, union representation, and adherence to a grievance and arbitration procedure. In determining that summary judgment was proper, the Supreme Court cited Allis-Chalmers v. Lueck, 471 US 202, 85 L Ed 2d 206, 105 S Ct 1904 (1985), and reasoned that preemption of the tort claims by federal law was necessary to ensure a unified body of labor contract law and to preserve the central role of arbitration in labor disputes. Smith v. Mont. Power Co., 225 M 166, 731 P2d 924, 44 St. Rep. 124 (1987). See also Anderson v. TW Corp., 228 M 1, 741 P2d 397, 44 St. Rep. 1293 (1987), where it was held that a party may not avoid the preemptive effect of federal labor law when a dispute involves an interpretation of a union contract by pleading in tort and that vacation pay is one item preempted by operation of federal law.

Duty of Care Owed by General Contractor to Subcontractor's Employee — Inherent Danger Exception: Montana follows the general rule that absent reserved control over the subcontractor's operations, the general contractor and owner are not liable for injuries to subcontractor's employees. However, the duty of care is not delegable by the general contractor or owner to the subcontractor if the work is "inherently dangerous" or involves "peculiar risks", in which case the general contractor or owner must exercise reasonable care to ensure measures are taken to mitigate the risk. In this case, a subcontractor's employee was injured when a ditch he was digging caved in. Standard safety measures had not been employed by the subcontractor although required by the contract. The court found that ditchdigging is not inherently dangerous when done with the standard precautions, and therefore there was no nondelegable duty under the inherent danger exception. A strongly worded dissent joined by three justices would have applied the exception and remanded for a determination by a jury whether there was inherent danger and, if so, whether the general contractor exercised reasonable care to mitigate the danger. Kemp v. Bechtel Constr. Co., 221 M 519, 720 P2d 270, 43 St. Rep. 1022 (1986), overruled in Beckman v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 2000 MT 112, 299 M 389, 1 P3d 348, 57 St. Rep. 466 (2000).

Evidence of Wrongful Discharge — Submission to Jury: The Supreme Court, following its decision in Dare v. Mont. Petroleum Marketing Co., 212 M 274, 687 P2d 1015, 41 St. Rep. 1735 (1984), found that respondent's 28 years of employment gave her a secure and objective basis for believing that if her work was satisfactorily performed, her employment would continue. The court noted that, from evidence presented, the jury could have found that appellants had no fair and honest cause for discharge and in fact had ulterior motives. A case for jury deliberation was presented on the issue of wrongful termination. Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L Ass'n, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986).

No Reference to Unfair Claim Settlement Practices Statute — Remand — Suspension of Proceedings Pending Determination of Liability: Appellant Fode asked the Supreme Court to recognize the common-law duty of good faith and fair dealing imposed by 28-1-201 and 28-1-203 without reference to 33-18-201, the unfair claim settlement practices statute. In remanding the case, the court found that Fode's allegations contained in his complaint should be presented to the District Court to determine whether a cause of action existed under 33-18-201; however, all proceedings were suspended until liability was determined in the underlying case. Fode v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 221 M 282, 719 P2d 414, 43 St. Rep. 814 (1986), distinguished in Peris v. Safeco Ins. Co., 276 M 486, 916 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 481 (1996).

Insurer Exemption for Intentional Bodily Injury: Insurer was properly granted a summary judgment on its claims that it had no obligation to defend or pay a judgment against the insured, who had struck a coworker in the face twice. The policy excluded bodily injury either expected or intended from the standpoint of the insured. Whether insured intended the specific injuries (left cheek bone broken in three places) was not a question of fact precluding summary judgment. When an assailant strikes another in the face, it is irrelevant for purposes of such an insurance exclusion that the assailant causes a different injury than he subjectively intended. The court will not impose upon the insurer the impossible task of proving that the insured specifically intended to break the victim's cheek bone in three places by striking him with his fist. Mut. Serv. Cas. Ins. Co. v. McGehee, 219 M 304, 711 P2d 826, 42 St. Rep. 2038 (1985), followed in Burns v. Underwriters Adjusting Co., 234 M 508, 765 P2d 712, 45 St. Rep. 2089 (1988), and in Am. St. Ins. Co. v. Willoughby, 254 M 218, 836 P2d 37, 49 St. Rep. 708 (1992).

Attractive Nuisance Not Applicable to Certain Artificial Streams or Bodies of Water: The degree of care of one who maintains on his land an artificial stream or body of water for a useful purpose, where the stream or body of water has natural characteristics, is no greater than the degree of care required of one through whose land flows a natural stream or whose land contains a natural body of water. The owner or user of an artificial stream or body of water having natural characteristics is bound to no special duty of care or precaution for the protection of children who may enter therein, unless there is in or about the artificial stream or body of water some peculiar danger, in the nature of a hidden peril or trap for the unwary, of which the owner or user has or ought to have notice. The doctrine of attractive nuisance as such does not apply to such artificial streams or bodies of water any more than it applies to natural streams or bodies of water. Limberhand v. Big Ditch Co., 218 M 132, 706 P2d 491, 42 St. Rep. 1460 (1985).

Duty of Care Not Dependent on Status of Injured Party: The duty of care of a property owner does not depend on the status of a party injured on the property, whether tenant, social guest, invitee, or trespasser. The question is always whether the landowner exercised ordinary care in the circumstances. Limberhand v. Big Ditch Co., 218 M 132, 706 P2d 491, 42 St. Rep. 1460 (1985), followed in Kaiser v. Whitehall, 221 M 322, 718 P2d 1341, 43 St. Rep. 846 (1986), Estate of Strever v. Cline, 278 M 165, 924 P2d 666, 53 St. Rep. 576 (1996), Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748, 54 St. Rep. 1422 (1997), and Dobrocke v. Columbia Falls, 2000 MT 179, 300 M 348, 8 P3d 71, 57 St. Rep. 718 (2000), overruling Cereck v. Albertson's Inc., 195 M 409, 637 P2d 509 (1981), and following Corrigan v. Janney, 192 M 99, 626 P2d 838 (1981). However, see Yager v. Deane, 258 M 453, 853 P2d 1214, 50 St. Rep. 610 (1993).

Negligent Hiring and Negligent Entrustment: Insurer's agent participated in a Dillon rodeo, went to a barbecue at his Dillon home, and then went drinking in Dillon bars. While driving home in a vehicle he leased from a service company that was a wholly owned subsidiary of and had a common board of directors with insurer, he struck plaintiff, who sued insurer for negligent hiring and service company for negligent entrustment of the vehicle to agent. Insurer and service company sought summary judgment. That one to whom a vehicle is entrusted is licensed does not alone negate a finding of negligent entrustment. Since the record showed agent had at least once before been in an accident while intoxicated and it was alleged service company knew or should have known the agent had a propensity to drive while intoxicated, there was a material question of fact whether service company breached the duty not to entrust a vehicle to an incompetent driver, and summary judgment as to the service company was denied. Insurer's motion for summary judgment on the negligent hiring issue was denied, the court stating that it could find no Montana case on the negligent hiring doctrine. The questions of whether insurer should have foreseen that it was hiring a dangerous driver, that it was negligent in hiring the agent, and that the negligence proximately caused plaintiff's injuries were considered to be questions of fact not properly disposed of on summary judgment. The court also indicated that whether agent was acting within the scope of his employment at the time of the accident was not an issue. Vollmer v. Bramlette, 594 F. Supp. 243, 41 St. Rep. 1964 (D.C. Mont. 1984).

Malicious Prosecution of State Employee — Elements Not Shown: Employer brought suit for malicious prosecution against university employee who initiated an investigation against him; the university counsel, who conducted the investigation; and the president of the university. Summary judgment for defendants and dismissal of the suit were proper because two of the prima facie elements of malicious prosecution were not established. The County Attorney, not defendants, initiated and continued the prosecution, and plaintiff's bald assertion that defendants caused the prosecution did not raise a genuine issue as to who initiated it. In addition, the defendants were fulfilling a statutory duty. A second unestablished prima facie element was that the prosecution must have terminated favorably for plaintiff. Here, three charges were brought; plaintiff was acquitted of one, and two were dismissed pursuant to a bargained plea of guilty to a substituted charge arising from the investigation. Vehrs v. Piquette, 210 M 386, 684 P2d 476, 41 St. Rep. 1110 (1984).

Motor Vehicle Accident — Sudden Emergency Instruction Usually Improper: As defendant passed codefendant driving downhill, codefendant speeded up and defendant cut in front of him while only 20 feet from an oncoming vehicle. Codefendant overturned in the other lane, and the next two oncoming vehicles were involved in a collision with him. Defendant's proposed sudden emergency doctrine instruction was properly refused. The instruction should not be given in an ordinary motor vehicle accident case. It is unnecessary and confusing, and the ordinary rules of negligence are applicable and sufficient. Further, a test for giving the instruction is that the perilous situation was not created by the person confronted by it and whom the instruction favors; in this case, whether defendant was negligent was very much in dispute, and the instruction was a comment on the evidence as it implied no negligence on his part. Ewing v. Esterholt, 210 M 367, 684 P2d 1053, 41 St. Rep. 1095 (1984), followed in Cline v. Durden, 246 M 154, 803 P2d 1077, 47 St. Rep. 2306 (1990).

Dual Capacity Doctrine — Products Liability Suit by Employee Against Employer — Employer Not a Manufacturer or Seller of the Product: A workman injured on an oil rig sued his employer, the owner of the rig, for products liability, claiming the rig was defective. The dual capacity doctrine is invoked in workers' compensation cases when the employer may be said to owe some duty to an injured employee distinct from his duties as an employer, commonly, when an employee is injured by a piece of equipment manufactured by the employer. Whether this doctrine exists in Montana is not clear; but the question need not be answered because, even assuming that the doctrine applies in Montana, the facts do not support products liability as to the employer. The employer did not manufacture oil rigs to sell to the public and did not place in the stream of commerce the rig involved or any other rig. Montana law requires one held liable for products liability to have been a seller of the defective product. Mitchell v. Shell Oil Co., 579 F. Supp. 1326, 41 St. Rep. 278 (D.C. Mont. 1984).

Trailer Swinging Into Wrong Lane When Driver Swerves to Avoid Collision — No Negligence — No New Trial: Undisputed evidence showed plaintiff was partly in defendant's lane on two-lane road while driving through a curve and that the approaching defendant responded by swerving to the right to avoid a head-on collision. The swerve caused a trailer that defendant was hauling behind his tractor-trailer truck to swing into plaintiff's lane and collide with plaintiff. There was no evidence that defendant was driving unsafely prior to that or that he was in any way negligent. Defendant acted reasonably and prudently, and plaintiff's actions supported a finding that he was the proximate cause of his injuries. The jury verdict found defendant was not negligent. It was an abuse of discretion and reversible error for the court to grant plaintiff a new trial, for there was sufficient evidence to support the verdict. Shannon v. Hulett, 205 M 345, 668 P2d 228, 40 St. Rep. 1349 (1983).

Insurers' Duty to Act in Good Faith Toward Insured: Insurance companies have a duty, independent of contract and statutes, to act in good faith with their insureds. Any statements in Montana Supreme Court cases that may be or appear to be in conflict with this rule are to that extent expressly overruled. Lipinski v. Title Ins. Co., 202 M 1, 655 P2d 970, 39 St. Rep. 2283 (1982), followed in Stephens v. Safeco Ins. Co. of America, 258 M 142, 852 P2d 565, 50 St. Rep. 467 (1993).

Negligence in Performing Contractual Duty — No Privity Required: A prime contractor contracted separately with a steel supplier to supply steel and with a subcontractor to erect the steel. Because the supplier was delayed in delivering the steel, the subcontractor suffered financial losses. The subcontractor could properly maintain an action against the supplier for negligence in the performance of its duties arising out of the steel supply contract with the prime contractor. Privity of contract was not required. Hawthorne v. Kober Constr. Co., 196 M 519, 640 P2d 467, 39 St. Rep. 294 (1982), followed in Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115, 43 St. Rep. 2243 (1986), and in Jim's Excavating Serv., Inc. v. HKM Associates, 265 M 494, 878 P2d 248, 51 St. Rep. 623 (1994), in which it was held that a third-party contractor may successfully recover for purely economic loss against a project engineer or architect when the design professional knew or should have foreseen that the particular plaintiff or an identifiable class of plaintiffs was at risk in relying on the information supplied.

Property Owner's Duty Dependent on Status of One on Premises: A property owner's duty toward one on the premises depends upon the status of the person on the premises. Cereck v. Albertson's, Inc., 195 M 409, 637 P2d 509, 38 St. Rep. 1986 (1981), overruled in Limberhand v. Big Ditch Co., 218 M 132, 706 P2d 491, 42 St. Rep. 1460 (1985), and Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748, 54 St. Rep. 1422 (1997).

Snowbanks From Plowing Parking Lot — Business Invitees: Customer walking from a snowplowed shopping center parking lot toward entrance to a supermarket was a business invitee for purpose of determining the duty owed her by supermarket while she was on the premises. Cereck v. Albertson's, Inc., 195 M 409, 637 P2d 509, 38 St. Rep. 1986 (1981), partially overruled in Limberhand v. Big Ditch Co., 218 M 132, 706 P2d 491, 42 St. Rep. 1460 (1985), and overruled, as to the distinction between liability based upon natural versus altered accumulations of ice or snow that are open and obvious and as to the standard that a property owner is absolved of liability because a dangerous condition upon the premises is open and obvious, in Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748, 54 St. Rep. 1422 (1997).

Promise to Hold Hearing — Requirement of Independent Consideration: Plaintiff, a custodian at the Yellowstone County Courthouse for 18 years, was discharged. His employment was "at will". After discharge, he was told by the County Commissioners that he would be given a grievance hearing. A letter was later sent to plaintiff, informing him that no hearing would be held. The promise to hold a hearing was not supported by independent consideration. Therefore, it was not an enforceable promise under contract law. Section 39-2-503 (now repealed) was, in effect, a part of the employment contract between plaintiff and the county. A promise to hold a hearing, given at a later date, could not modify that part of the contract without independent consideration unless consented to by both parties in writing. Reiter v. Yellowstone County, 192 M 194, 627 P2d 845, 38 St. Rep. 686 (1981), distinguished in Boreen v. Christensen, 267 M 405, 884 P2d 761, 51 St. Rep. 1014 (1994).

Grounds for Denial of Proposed Jury Instruction — Primary Duty of Avoiding Collision: The appellant claimed error in the trial court's denial of his proposed jury instruction stating that the primary duty of avoiding an accident is on a vehicle approaching from the rear when the vehicle in front has signaled for 100 feet. This was an inaccurate statement of the law, and as given, the jury instructions adequately explained the duties of the passing motorist and the left-turning motorist. Even if it had been a correct statement of the law, the proposed statement would have added nothing to the jury's understanding of the applicable law. Burns v. U&R Express, 191 M 343, 624 P2d 487, 38 St. Rep. 302 (1981). See also Wheeler v. Bozeman, 232 M 433, 757 P2d 345, 45 St. Rep. 1173 (1988).

Tort of Contract Interference: In a case in which a former state employee sued the state for violations of his civil rights, the federal District Court indicated that Montana law recognizes that it is a legal wrong for a person to break up or interfere with any contract relationship between other persons. This tort of contract interference, however, lies only against a third person and not against a party to the contract. In this case the court did not find a tort remedy lying in one party to the contract against another. Holladay v. St., 506 F. Supp. 1317, 38 St. Rep. 285 (D.C. Mont. 1981), followed in King v. St., 259 M 393, 856 P2d 954, 50 St. Rep. 848 (1993).

Evidence of Alteration of Accident Scene After the Accident Excluded: Evidence of subsequent repairs or improvements by a defendant altering the scene of an accident may not be admitted in evidence to show negligence on the part of the defendant. The evidence erroneously admitted here put before the jury the idea that the State, by constructing an additional guardrail at the scene of the accident after the accident, admitted to antecedent negligence. Cech v. St., 183 M 75, 598 P2d 584 (1979), affirmed on rehearing, 184 M 522, 604 P2d 97 (1979).

Breach Induced by Third Party:

Parties to contract cannot impose any liability upon stranger to contract under the terms of the contract, but "every person is bound, without contract, to abstain from injuring the person or property of another, or infringing upon any of his rights" and every person who suffers detriment from the unlawful act or omission of another may recover from the person in fault a compensation therefor in money which is called damages. Thus the law, independent of the contract, imposes upon a stranger the duty not to interfere with performance. Violation of that duty is a tort, the remedy for which is by action in tort, and therefore statutory provisions respecting the pleading of breach of contract have no application. Burden v. Elling St. Bank, 76 M 24, 245 P 958 (1926).

A stranger to a contract who unjustifiably induces a party thereto to break it is responsible in damages to the other party. Simonsen v. Barth, 64 M 95, 208 P 938 (1922).

IMPLIED COVENANT OF GOOD FAITH

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — No Application When Terminated Policy Not Part of Employment Contract: A hospital discontinued a policy whereby it paid employees for their sick leave after 25 years of service. Employees with less than 25 years of service sued the hospital for breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The District Court granted the hospital summary judgment, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the policy at issue was not a part of the employment contract, the courts concluded that the covenant of good faith and fair dealing did not apply. Chipman v. NW. Healthcare Corp., 2014 MT 15, 373 Mont. 360, 317 P.3d 182.

Application of Banking Standards, Not Livestock Industry Standards, to Loan Transaction Involving Cattle — Bank-Customer Relationship Not Giving Rise to Fiduciary Responsibilities: A bank loaned money to a couple to fund their cattle breeding operation. When the couple failed to make loan payments, the bank brought an action to collect and foreclose, and the couple brought a counterclaim that the bank's actions breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing and the bank's fiduciary duty toward the couple. After the couple paid the amount owing, they became the plaintiffs and the case proceeded on the breach of covenant and fiduciary duty claim. The District Court granted the bank summary judgment on the claim, and on appeal, plaintiffs asserted that the court improperly applied banking standards to the case rather than livestock industry standards, constituting a breach of good faith. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Montana, the relationship between a bank and its customer is generally described as that of debtor and creditor and does not give rise to fiduciary duties except when special circumstances place a bank into the role of adviser. In this case, the bank acted as a creditor and not an adviser, and did not force the cattle sale but simply sought to enforce the repayment provisions of its contract with plaintiffs, so no special circumstances existed. The bank acted in accordance with the contract provisions and comported with prudent banking policy and reasonable commercial standards. It was appropriate for the District Court to apply commercial banking standards to the analysis of the bank's relationship with plaintiffs and plaintiffs' ability to service their loans. Summary judgment for the bank was proper. McCoy v. First Citizens Bank, 2006 MT 307, 335 M 1, 148 P3d 677 (2006). See also Pederson v. Rocky Mtn. Bank, 2012 MT 48, 364 Mont. 258, 272 P.3d 663.

Material Misrepresentation on Application for Credit Life and Disability Insurance — Denial of Coverage Warranted: Schlemmer applied to the North Central Life Insurance Company (North Central) for credit life and disability insurance but misrepresented his health history. If he had answered correctly on the application, he would have been ineligible for the insurance. Nevertheless, he averred by his signature that he understood the form and that his application statements were true, so the policy was issued. Schlemmer later filed a claim for disability payments. North Central investigated, found that Schlemmer had been treated within the previous 2 years for hypertension, chronic obstructive lung disease, and disease or disorder of the kidneys, contrary to his statements in the application, and denied the claim and refunded Schlemmer's premiums. Schlemmer sued for damages, claiming that the application and underwriting procedures used by North Central violated 33-18-201, commonly known as the unfair claims settlement practices law, breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and constituted fraud. Schlemmer also maintained that the District Court erred in failing to rule on whether North Central's agent had knowledge of Schlemmer's condition, which might have created a question of material fact. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's rulings that: (1) Schlemmer's claim of ignorance of the contents of the written application could not prevail because the application language was clear and unambiguous and Schlemmer did not deny signing it; (2) Schlemmer materially misrepresented his health on the application; (3) the material misrepresentation was legally sufficient to allow North Central to deny coverage under the policy; and (4) Schlemmer's argument that North Central's agent knew or should have known about Schlemmer's health was mere speculation insufficient to create an issue of fact to defeat North Central's properly supported motion for summary judgment. Further, the Supreme Court declined to consider Schlemmer's argument that the misrepresentation could not serve as a basis to rescind the policy because he did not apply for benefits until more than 2 years after applying for the insurance, pursuant to 33-22-205, because Schlemmer never raised the issue at the District Court level. Schlemmer v. N. Cent. Life Ins. Co., 2001 MT 256, 307 M 203, 37 P3d 63 (2001).

Absence of Genuine Issue of Material Fact Regarding Negligent Installation of Septic System — Summary Judgment Proper: Prior to the Sherrards' purchase of property for building a home and horse arena, they had the county sanitarian issue a resite evaluation that addressed ground water levels and designated appropriate septic systems to service each building. The sanitarian approved a permit for a shallow cap system for the horse arena. The system was subject to state regulations requiring minimum 12-inch trenches and prohibiting installation where the water table reached within 5 feet of the natural ground surface. The Sherrards contracted with Prewett to install the system. Prewett dug a hole for the septic tank, dug 36-inch deep trenches for lateral pipes in the drain field, placed washed gravel and pipes in the trenches, and prepared the system for inspection. The next day, the new county sanitarian inspected the system, found standing ground water in the septic tank and observed water in the lateral trenches, fixed the ground water level at 27 inches below the natural surface, and because the ground water level was too high to meet county and state requirements, revoked the Sherrards' permit. The Sherrards then sued Prewett for negligent installation of the system. The District Court determined that because the ground water depth was less than 5 feet and the shallow cap system could not meet regulations, the object of the contract between the parties was illegal and the Sherrards could not proceed with their contract-based claim. Therefore, the court concluded that no genuine issue of material fact existed and granted summary judgment for Prewett, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Sherrards' bare denial of the 27-inch ground water level and their speculation about the ground water level at the time that the original permit was issued, were insufficient to raise a genuine issue of material fact because they constituted mere denial, speculation, or conclusory statements. The material fact was not whether the ground water level was precisely 27 inches below the surface, but whether it was 5 feet or more below the surface as required by state regulations. To prevail, the Sherrards needed to come forward with substantial and material evidence with regard to the ground water level at the horse arena, but they failed to do so, so summary judgment was proper. Sherrard v. Prewett, 2001 MT 228, 306 M 511, 36 P3d 378 (2001).

Breach of Fiduciary Duty in Conversion of Corporate Property Without Requisite Notice and Shareholder Approval — Punitive Damages Unavailable Absent Showing of Actual Malice or Fraud: Phil was two-thirds majority shareholder in Trifad Entertainment, Inc. (Trifad), and Brad was one-third minority shareholder and Trifad director. Following Phil's extradition to Florida on racketeering charges, Brad secured a loan for $15,000, deposited the money in the Trifad account, and then sold virtually all of Trifad's assets to himself for $15,000. In addition, Brad wrote checks on Trifad's account for taxes owed and for estimated tax payments and withdrew one-third of the remaining balance and left two-thirds in the account, all without attempting to contact Phil. Phil later sued Brad for breach of contract, breach of fiduciary duty, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and conversion and requested punitive damages, contending that Brad's actions were performed with actual malice and constituted actual fraud. At trial, Brad contended that the actions were reasonable considering Phil was in jail facing criminal charges, and Brad cross-claimed for indemnification from Trifad for litigation expenses and liabilities incurred in his capacity as Trifad director. The District Court found for Brad on all counts, but denied corporate indemnification. Both Phil and Brad appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, finding that Brad failed to comply with 35-1-823 (now repealed) by selling corporate property without the requisite notice and shareholder approval. Although contacting Phil would have been difficult, it was not impossible. However, even if Phil had been unavailable for consultation, 35-1-823 (now repealed) does not contain any exceptions to the notice and approval requirements governing the sale of corporate assets. Further, the sale constituted conversion because Brad exercised unauthorized dominion over Trifad property by transferring ownership to himself. The case was remanded for a determination of damages, including possible damages other than those provided in 27-1-320 if peculiar circumstances warranted compensation for future lost income and profits. The District Court erred in concluding that Brad did not breach his fiduciary duties to Trifad; however, absent proof of actual malice or actual fraud, punitive damages were not warranted. Because a breach of fiduciary duty occurred, Brad could not claim to be wholly successful in the action, so Brad's claim for corporate indemnification also failed under 35-1-453 (now repealed). Trifad Entertainment, Inc. v. Anderson, 2001 MT 227, 306 M 499, 36 P3d 363 (2001).

Lawsuit by Shareholder Causing Damages Considered Breach of Fiduciary Duty of Care: Sletteland brought a suit against two other corporate shareholders for charging excessive attorney fees and seeking their removal as corporate directors. The District Court held that the fees were excessive, but found no grounds for removal. The other shareholders filed a counterclaim against Sletteland, alleging that he breached his fiduciary duty in bringing the lawsuit because the timing of the suit caused refinancing of a project to fail, resulting in damage to the corporation and to other shareholders. The District Court agreed, and both parties appealed their respective issues. The Supreme Court reversed on the issue of excessive fees, but affirmed on the issue of breach of fiduciary duty. The fiduciary duty between shareholders of a close corporation is one of utmost good faith and loyalty. Sletteland admittedly knew of the refinancing and, as an attorney and investment banker, also knew the effect that a lawsuit alleging misconduct by board members would have on a refinancing effort. In fact, it appeared that the suit was brought to specifically derail the refinancing. Sletteland was the person who determined the timing of the suit, which was filed immediately before the individuals involved in the refinancing were to meet for discussions, and when asked to withdraw the suit so refinancing could conclude, he refused to do so. Sletteland did not use the care that an ordinarily prudent person would use in a similar situation, resulting in the breach of fiduciary duty. The Supreme Court also affirmed the award of damages. Although future damages could not be calculated exactly in this case, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in basing its calculations on expert testimony of a well-known regional economist. Sletteland v. Roberts, 2000 MT 382, 304 M 21, 16 P3d 1062, 57 St. Rep. 1639 (2000).

Federal Law Applying to Collective Bargaining Agreement Preempts Claim of Violation of Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — Common-Law Claim for Retaliatory Discharge Not Preempted: Winslow was fired from his job with Montana Rail Link, where he had been employed under a collective bargaining agreement, and brought an action in District Court. In his complaint, Winslow included claims for violation of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing and common-law retaliatory discharge. The District Court dismissed both claims. The Supreme Court affirmed the dismissal of the claim for violation of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, citing Foster v. Albertsons, Inc., 254 M 117, 835 P2d 720 (1992), for the proposition that such a claim is preempted by federal law because the covenant arises out of the employment contract and that that contract, in the case of a collective bargaining agreement, is governed by federal law. However, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court on dismissal of the common-law wrongful discharge claim, citing Foster for the proposition that a common-law claim, because it does not depend upon interpretation of the employment contract, is an independent claim and is not preempted by the federal Railway Labor Act. Winslow v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2000 MT 292, 302 M 289, 16 P3d 992, 57 St. Rep. 1238 (2000).

Agricultural Lease — No Error in Failure to Give Instruction on Implied Contract Covenant to Farm in Workmanlike Manner — Express Lease Terms Stricter Than Requested Instruction on Implied Term: The Schumachers leased property that they owned to Stephens through an agricultural lease. The lease required Stephens to farm with "diligence and care" and to do "all work necessary . . . and to the best interest of lessor, all in such time and manner as shall be to the best advantage and economy". The Schumachers sued Stephens, alleging that Stephens breached the implied contract covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The District Court refused to give the Schumachers' requested instruction on an implied covenant in the lease that would have required Stephens to farm the property in a "competent, skilled, workmanlike and husbandlike fashion". The Supreme Court noted that: (1) the District Court was correct in not giving an instruction on negligence because the Schumachers' complaint and evidence contained no such theory; (2) the District Court did instruct on the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing; (3) the standard of care required of Stephens was expressly stated in the lease itself; and (4) the Schumachers had not shown that they were prejudiced by the failure to give the requested instruction. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that it was not error for the District Court to refuse to give an instruction on an implied covenant to farm in a workmanlike manner. Schumacher v. Stephens, 1998 MT 58, 288 M 115, 956 P2d 76, 55 St. Rep. 247 (1998).

Agricultural Lease — No Error in Failure to Give Plaintiffs' Instruction on Effect of Material Participation Provisions — Instruction on Mutual Cooperation Held Sufficient: The Schumachers leased property that they owned to Stephens through an agricultural lease. Later, when the Schumachers sued Stephens over Stephens' failure to comply with the terms of the lease, Stephens claimed in defense that the Schumachers had breached the material participation agreements in the lease and that therefore he was excused from compliance. The Schumachers requested an instruction stating that if the jury found that Stephens failed to cooperate with the plaintiffs, then Stephens was not entitled to claim that he was excused from liability because of his contention that the Schumachers breached the material participation agreements in the lease. The District Court refused to give the instruction and instead gave an instruction stating that "the failure of a party to fully perform a contract is excused if his performance is prevented or delayed by the conduct of the other party". The Supreme Court noted that the Schumachers had not shown that they were prejudiced in any way by the failure of the District Court to give the requested instruction. Citing Fillinger v. NW. Agency, Inc., of Great Falls, 283 M 71, 938 P2d 1347 (1997), the Supreme Court held that: (1) a party assigning error to a refused instruction must show that the party was prejudiced by the refusal; and (2) the refused instruction must be reviewed in the context of the instructions that were given and the evidence produced at trial. Under these standards, the Supreme Court held that the instruction given by the District Court was sufficient. Schumacher v. Stephens, 1998 MT 58, 288 M 115, 956 P2d 76, 55 St. Rep. 247 (1998).

Questionable Basis for Denial of Claim — Directed Verdict Inappropriate: Under common law and 33-18-242, an insurer cannot be held liable for bad faith in denying a claim if the insurer had a reasonable basis for contesting the claim or the claim amount. As determined in St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Cumiskey, 204 M 350, 665 P2d 223 (1983), an insurer may file a declaratory judgment action to obtain a determination of the validity, continuance, or coverage of the policy, the extent of liability, or the insurer's duty under the policy. However, a directed verdict is not required simply because a reasonable basis may exist to deny coverage. If reasonable people could draw different conclusions about whether an insurer had a reasonable basis for contesting a claim, the issue becomes more than a question of law and a directed verdict is inappropriate. Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 261 M 91, 861 P2d 895, 50 St. Rep. 1210 (1993). However, see Landa v. Assurance Co. of America, 2013 MT 217, 371 Mont. 202, 307 P.3d 284 (holding summary judgment proper when a reasonable basis in law for denying coverage existed).

Extent of Obligation of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Measured by Justifiable Expectations of Parties: Talley argued that because the covenant of good faith and fair dealing is implied into every contract, the community college that employed him as a part-time instructor breached the covenant by not hiring him back after his term contract expired. However, the nature and extent of the obligation of good faith and fair dealing is measured by the justifiable expectations of the parties. Because Talley's contract had a "no-tenure" clause that precluded any justifiable expectation of continued employment, allegations of breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing were not reasonable. Talley v. Flathead Valley Community College, 259 M 479, 857 P2d 701, 50 St. Rep. 889 (1993).

Good Faith Required in Exercise of General Right to Assign Debts Under Restructuring Agreement — Summary Judgment Inappropriate: The District Court relied on Carma Developers v. Marathon Dev. Calif., Inc., 826 P2d 710 (Calif. 1992), in granting summary judgment to defendants who contended that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing could not be used to override the specific provisions of a restructuring agreement allowing the assignment of plaintiff's debts. The Supreme Court distinguished Carma in holding that summary judgment was improper when a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the covenant was breached by defendant's discretionary use of the power of assignment to assign the notes to plaintiff's partner. Simmons Oil Corp. v. Holly Corp., 258 M 79, 852 P2d 523, 50 St. Rep. 433 (1993).

Breach of Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Based on Collective Bargaining Agreement as Preempted by Federal Law: Any implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing in the employment context arises from the underlying contract of employment. An underlying contract based on a collective bargaining agreement is subject to the application of federal rather than state law on questions involving the existence and breach of the implied covenant. Foster v. Albertsons, Inc., 254 M 117, 835 P2d 720, 49 St. Rep. 638 (1992), followed in Miller v. Glacier County, 257 M 422, 851 P2d 401, 50 St. Rep. 339 (1993), and Winslow v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2000 MT 292, 302 M 289, 16 P3d 992, 57 St. Rep. 1238 (2000). See also Teamsters Union v. Lucas Flour Co., 369 US 95, 7 L Ed 2d 593, 82 S Ct 571 (1962), and Paige v. Henry J. Kaiser Co., 826 F2d 857 (9th Cir. 1987).

Fiduciary Duty Between Shareholders in Close Corporation When No Other Type of Relationship Exists: The fiduciary duty between stockholders of a close corporation is one of utmost good faith and loyalty. However, the controlling group should not be stymied by a minority stockholder's grievances if the controlling group can demonstrate a legitimate business purpose and the minority stockholder cannot demonstrate a less harmful alternative. If called on to settle a dispute between the stockholders, the court must weigh the legitimate business purpose, if any, against the practicability of a less harmful alternative. Daniels v. Thomas, Dean & Hoskins, Inc., 246 M 125, 804 P2d 359, 47 St. Rep. 2293 (1990), citing Donahue v. Rodd Electrotype Co. of New England, Inc., 328 NE 2d 505 (Mass. 1975), and Wilkes v. Springside Nursing Home, Inc., 353 NE 2d 657 (Mass. 1976), and distinguishing Skierka v. Skierka Bros., Inc., 192 M 505, 629 P2d 214 (1981), Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188 (1984), and Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148 (1986).

In Warren v. Campbell Farming Corp., 2011 MT 324, 363 Mont. 190, 271 P.3d 36, the Montana Supreme Court, in answering a certified question from the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, revisited the Daniels test and concluded that the Daniels test does not apply to claims involving director conflict of interest transactions. However, the Daniels test does apply to minority shareholders' claims of breach of fiduciary duties against majority shareholders.

No Evidence Alleged Fraud Benefit to Defendant: The plaintiff argued that the defendant bank's failure to disclose that certain escrow payments had not been applied by the bank as the plaintiff had been led to believe they would be applied constituted constructive fraud. The Supreme Court ruled that the evidence did not support the claim because the bank did not gain any advantage by the nondisclosure. Kitchen Krafters, Inc. v. Eastside Bank of Mont., 242 M 155, 789 P2d 567, 47 St. Rep. 602 (1990).

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Inapplicable to Lateral Transfer: Following the rationale set out in Frigon v. Morrison-Maierle, Inc., 233 M 113, 760 P2d 57, 45 St. Rep. 1344 (1988), the Supreme Court found it inappropriate to apply the covenant of good faith and fair dealing to a termination following the refusal of an employee to accept a lateral transfer of employment. Finstad v. Mont. Power Co., 241 M 10, 785 P2d 1372, 47 St. Rep. 39 (1990).

Occasional Compliments From Employer — No Expectation of Job Security: During her year-long employment, plaintiff received compliments on her work from persons other than her employer and occasional compliments from her employer, but her immediate supervisor was continually critical of her performance. The implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing did not arise in this situation because the employer gave plaintiff no reasonable expectation of job security. Objective manifestations of job security must come from the employer, not from persons outside the work place, in order to establish an expectation of job security. Karell v. Am. Cancer Soc'y, 239 M 168, 779 P2d 506, 46 St. Rep. 1593 (1989).

Discharge From Employment — Injury to Be Expected — Intentional Conduct Exclusion Applied: Employee claimed he was intentionally fired for refusing to violate Montana law, resulting in emotional and mental injury. The employer tendered the suit to National Surety Corporation, which refused to defend on grounds that the policy did not provide coverage for an occurrence of this sort. The District Court agreed, and the Supreme Court affirmed on the basis that the claimed injury fell outside the definition of "occurrence". Although an intentional act may constitute an occurrence when the alleged injury was not the expected or intended result of the conduct, here there was no injury alleged that could not be expected to flow from the termination. Therefore, the intentional conduct exclusion was properly applied. Daly Ditches Irrigation District v. Nat'l Sur. Corp., 234 M 537, 764 P2d 1276, 45 St. Rep. 2112 (1988), distinguishing Lindsay Drilling v. USF&G, 208 M 91, 676 P2d 203 (1984); Millers Mut. Ins. Co. v. Reciprocal Duty of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Between Employer and Employee — Character of Employee Relevant to Expectation of Job Security: The Supreme Court applied the holding in Los Angeles Mem. Coliseum Comm'n v. NFL, 791 F2d 1356 (9th Cir. 1986), in finding that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing mandated a reciprocal duty in the employment relationship, applicable to both employer and employee. Breach by one party served to negate any breach by the other party, so that neither party was entitled to recovery. This rule applied only narrowly to factual contexts where both breaches concerned the same issue and occurred during one episode of the relationship. In the present case, an employee who breached the covenant could not then complain of unfair dealing by the employer. The District Court improperly excluded evidence of specific misconduct related to the employee's character because the alleged misconduct was relevant to whether the employee had a reasonable expectation of job security and could thus claim protection under the covenant. Barrett v. ASARCO Inc., 234 M 229, 763 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 1865 (1988). See also Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986), Dare v. Mont. Petroleum Mkting. Co., 212 M 274, 687 P2d 1015, 41 St. Rep. 1735 (1984), and Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993).

Firing Not Due to Economic Necessity: There was sufficient evidence presented to rebut the employer's claim that the employee plaintiff was discharged because of economic necessity, thus supporting submission of the case to the jury based on breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Kerr v. Gibson's Prod. Co. of Bozeman, Inc., 226 M 69, 733 P2d 1292, 44 St. Rep. 462 (1987).

Failure to Promptly Investigate Claims and Coverage — Bad Faith: A jury found no debatable question of insurance coverage. Liability for exercising bad faith was proper when evidence indicated the insurance company failed to promptly investigate insured's claims and coverage by taking 9 months for an investigation that could have been done professionally in 2 weeks, failed to inform insured of potential coverage under an extended benefits policy provision, and failed to provide coverage for large claims after accepting premiums and paying smaller previous claims. Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115, 43 St. Rep. 2243 (1986).

Explicit Contractual Provision Giving Greater Protection Than Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — No Application of Covenant: Where a collective bargaining agreement provided explicitly that employees could be discharged "only for just cause", the Supreme Court declined to imply the covenant of good faith and fair dealing to the employment relationship since the contractual agreement provided greater protection than the implied covenant. Such a covenant generally applies to "at will" employment contracts. Brinkman v. St., 224 M 238, 729 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 2163 (1986). See also Riley v. Warm Springs St. Hosp., 229 M 518, 748 P2d 455, 44 St. Rep. 2183 (1987).

Franchisor's Right to Determine Franchise Location — Duty to Reasonably Consider Relocation: Appellant franchisor had the sole contractual right to determine location of the franchise; however, the law imposed a duty to reasonably consider facts regarding relocation. The Supreme Court found evidence that vital information was withheld from respondents and from the vice president in charge of authorizing relocation which, if believed, would provide a basis for finding appellant acted unreasonably, thereby breaching its duty to exercise good faith. The evidence was sufficient to warrant submission to the jury on the question of good faith. Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, Inc., 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 964 (1986).

No Question of Fiduciary Duty When Judgment Based Only on Good Faith and Fair Dealing: Appellant argued that District Court prejudiced its interests by improperly instructing the jury that, as franchisor, appellant owed a fiduciary duty to respondents as franchisees. The Supreme Court noted that a franchise relationship is inherently a business relationship rather than a fiduciary relationship. However, the questioned jury instruction was found to be primarily definitional; therefore, the Supreme Court found it unnecessary to rule on whether the special facts of the case gave rise to a fiduciary duty since the District Court only held appellant to the responsibility of acting in good faith and fair dealing with respondents. Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, Inc., 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 964 (1986).

Evidence of Wrongful Discharge — Submission to Jury: The Supreme Court, following its decision in Dare v. Mont. Petroleum Marketing Co., 212 M 274, 687 P2d 1015, 41 St. Rep. 1735 (1984), found that respondent's 28 years of employment gave her a secure and objective basis for believing that if her work was satisfactorily performed, her employment would continue. The court noted that, from evidence presented, the jury could have found that appellants had no fair and honest cause for discharge and in fact had ulterior motives. A case for jury deliberation was presented on the issue of wrongful termination. Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L Ass'n, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986).

Negligence as Proper Basis for Recovery — Wrongful Discharge: A negligence claim and a claim for breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing may arise out of the same occurrence, include the same facts, and only involve different theories of law; therefore, negligence is a proper basis for recovery in wrongful termination cases. Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L Ass'n, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986), following Crenshaw v. Bozeman Deaconess Hosp., 213 M 488, 693 P2d 487, 41 St. Rep. 2251 (1984).

Instruction Given on Constructive Fraud — Instruction on Bad Faith Superfluous: The District Court instructed the jury on constructive fraud but not on breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which plaintiff contended was error. The Supreme Court noted that the jury found no breach of duty under the instruction on constructive fraud, which does not require a showing of fraudulent intent. An instruction on bad faith would require plaintiff to prove intentional concealment. The court held that if plaintiff could not meet the burden of proof on constructive fraud, she could not meet the higher burden of proof on bad faith; thus, the instruction would have been superfluous. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986), partially overruled in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995).

No Bad Faith Instruction in Absence of Actual Knowledge of Defects — Knowledge Not Imputed: Plaintiff contended that District Court erred in not instructing the jury on breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, arguing that the covenant should have been applied to a real estate partnership and to a development partnership. The Supreme Court found no error in refusing to instruct as against the real estate partnership because it was not shown at trial that the partnership had actual knowledge of claimed defects in the land necessary to constitute bad faith. The court further held that while knowledge may be imputed to a real estate partnership as a member of a development partnership, it cannot be imputed from the development partnership to the real estate partnership. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986).

Inadequate Jury Instruction — Implied Covenant of Good Faith: The District Court instructed the jury on the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, stating that good faith means honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned and then equating the implied covenant to an obligation imposed by law on defendants to do nothing to deprive plaintiffs of the benefits of their commercial transaction. On appeal, defendants argued that the implied covenant had no application in a case involving an arms-length contract. The Supreme Court, relying on its decision in Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 1822 (1985), held that a breach of the implied covenant which results in damages can give rise to an action in tort, but that in order to recover additional punitive damages, plaintiffs must prove that defendants' actions in breaching the implied covenant met the requirements of 27-1-221. The tort of breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing requires more than a lack of honesty in fact. The instruction given to the jury on this issue inadequately defined the tort. McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986), followed in Noonan v. First Bank Butte, 227 M 329, 740 P2d 631, 44 St. Rep. 1124 (1987). See also Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, Inc., 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 964 (1986).

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — General Test for Contracts Covered: Plaintiff, who owned a building and two construction companies, and defendant insurance company signed a lease for office space in a building. Plaintiff was to renovate the space, and the two were to confer on and mutually approve the renovation plans. Disagreements arose on the plans. Plaintiff claimed he had difficulties contacting defendant. Defendant rescinded the lease on the ground that it had continually invested more time and money than plaintiff and that from a business standpoint the lease was no longer feasible. After failing in an attempt to contact defendant's president, plaintiff sent a notice of default and sued. The court affirmed an award of punitive damages to plaintiff. The court declined to extend the tort of breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing to all contracts of any type, including arms-length and substantially equal bargaining power contracts, but stated that: (1) whether breach of a contract constitutes the tort depends on whether there has been some impermissible activity; (2) the nature and extent of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is measured in a particular contract by the justifiable expectations of the parties and, whether performing or breaching, each party has a justifiable expectation that the other will act as a reasonable person; (3) a party who acts arbitrarily, capriciously, or unreasonably exceeds the justifiable expectations of the other party, and the other party should be compensated for damages resulting from the culpable conduct; and (4) for punitive damages to be awarded for breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing in a contract breach situation, the breach must amount to oppression, fraud, or malice. Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 1822 (1985), followed in Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988), and in McJunkin v. Commission of Bad Faith Tort Against Depositor by Bank: The District Court did not err in instructing the jury to consider recovery by bank depositor against the bank under bad faith tort principles and to accordingly consider punitive damages. The depositor and his nephew opened a checking account with a card requiring the signatures of both on checks. They then formed a partnership. The nephew induced the bank to change the card so that he could issue checks without the depositor's signature. The bank did not notify the depositor of the change or obtain his authorization for it. The bank told depositor his signature was not needed but did not tell him about the new card, and depositor disagreed. Later the bank told him it would not change its policy of honoring checks signed only by the nephew. When depositor's attorney told bank not to do so, the bank stated the card required only one signature and the bank would not change the card unless both the nephew and the depositor requested it. The bank then told depositor the card was lost but later that day produced both cards. Depositor sued, and the bank subsequently took various negative and detrimental actions against his credit status, refused loans of a type formerly granted, canceled his ready reserve account, and refused to pay several items presented before he was notified that the account had been canceled. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985).

INJURY TO PERSON

Duty Not to Injure Others — Application to Law Enforcement Officers: A law enforcement officer responded to a neighborhood disturbance and observed the suspect running into a driveway, over a retaining wall, and into the plaintiff's yard. The plaintiff came out of his house to investigate the commotion. The officer heard the plaintiff approaching, turned around to see the plaintiff, and tackled the plaintiff due to self-protection instinct. The plaintiff later reported a torn rotator cuff and sued the officer, alleging state law negligence and a 42 U.S.C. 1983 violation. The case was removed to federal court and appealed to the Ninth Circuit Court. The Ninth Circuit Court certified the following state law question, as reformulated by the Montana Supreme Court: "Under Montana law, when a plaintiff claims he was injured directly by an officer's affirmative acts, does the public-duty doctrine exclude all duties that may arise pursuant to generally applicable principles of negligence?" The Supreme Court found that the public duty doctrine is not so broad as to provide an exemption from the statutory duty imposed by 27-1-701 and 28-1-201 to not injure others as a result of lack of ordinary care. In other words, although the public duty doctrine provides that an officer does not owe a legal duty to an individual plaintiff when the plaintiff alleges harm suffered from the officer's breach of the general duty to protect and preserve the peace, a law enforcement officer is not exempt from owing a duty of care to a plaintiff directly injured by the officer's affirmative acts. Bassett v. Lamantia, 2018 MT 119, 391 Mont. 309, 417 P.3d 299.

Student Not Subject to Restraint on Liberty — No Custodial or Special Relationship: A high school student was caught on campus with a tin of chewing tobacco and was disciplined by being suspended from all extracurricular activities. The student became distraught upon realizing the suspension would bar him from the state wrestling tournament; he went home and committed suicide that afternoon. The student's mother sued the school board and the superintendent, alleging that her son's death was the direct and proximate result of the school board's negligence. The District Court granted summary judgment to the board. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that because suicide is generally considered a deliberate intervening act, the board was entitled to summary judgment. Because the student had no history of mental health problems, the suicide was unforeseeable, and therefore the board owed no legal duty to the student. Additionally, the mother could not show a special relationship between the student and the school board because the board had no obligation to exercise custodial care over the student, who was not in the custody of the board and was in his own home when he committed suicide. Gourneau v. Hamill, 2013 MT 300, 372 Mont. 182, 311 P.3d 760.

Premises Liability — Duty of Care to Independent Contractor — Status Irrelevant: After the plaintiff slipped and fell while working and sustained personal injuries, the plaintiff sued the defendant who owned the building and leased space to the third party for whom the plaintiff contracted to provide cleaning services. The District Court, relying on construction law cases, granted summary judgment to the defendant, concluding that the defendant owed no duty of care to the plaintiff because the plaintiff was an independent contractor working for a third party. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the plaintiff's status as an independent contractor was not relevant in an ordinary premises liability case and that the status of an injured party does not affect a property owner's general duty of care, which depends on the degree of ordinary care that a reasonable person would use under the same or similar circumstances. Steichen v. Talcott Properties, LLC, 2013 MT 2, 368 Mont. 169, 292 P.3d 458.

Admissibility of Infectious Disease Specialist Testimony — Qualified to Testify on Standard of Care and Causation for Radiologist's Procedure: Plaintiffs, as representatives of the estate of a deceased patient, filed a medical malpractice claim against a radiologist and a hospital based on allegations that the defendants departed from the applicable standard of care by failing to adhere to proper infection control measures, which negligently caused the patient's death. On a summary judgment motion, the District Court excluded the testimony of the plaintiffs' proposed expert witness, an infectious disease specialist, on the grounds that he was not qualified to testify as an expert under 26-2-601 because he is not a radiologist and does not perform the procedure at issue. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the infectious disease specialist satisfied the requirements of 26-2-601 based on his qualifications and that the District Court's holding to the contrary was an abuse of discretion. The proposed expert was qualified to give testimony regarding the standard of care for the radiologist and the hospital as well as an opinion regarding causation. Beehler v. E. Radiological Associates, P.C., 2012 MT 260, 367 Mont. 21, 289 P.3d 131, distinguishing Butler v. Domin, 2000 MT 312, 302 Mont. 452, 15 P.3d 1189.

No Duty of Care Owed by School District for Student's Unforeseeable Conduct: A student handed in a typing assignment that contained violent themes and unspecified threats. The student was counseled, but no subsequent actions were taken. About 17 months later, the student ran over a woman in an incident that resembled one of the themes in the typing assignment. The victim sued the school district for negligence, but summary judgment was granted for the school district on grounds that no duty was owed to the victim. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, based on the facts known to the school district at the time of its allegedly negligent conduct, it was not foreseeable that 17 months later the student would intentionally run over a pedestrian off school grounds after school hours. The school district therefore had no duty to protect the victim from the student, so summary judgment for the school district was proper. Emanuel v. Great Falls School District, 2009 MT 185, 351 M 56, 209 P3d 244 (2009), distinguishing Prindel v. Ravalli County, 2006 MT 62, 331 M 338, 133 P3d 165 (2006), Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081 (1999), and LaTray v. Havre, 2000 MT 119, 299 M 449, 999 P2d 1010 (2000).

Reasonable Foreseeability of Intentional or Reactive Striking Between Boys With Sticks: During a lacrosse game in gym class between 14-year-old high school freshman boys, one student struck another in the eye with a lacrosse stick. The District Court found that the striking was foreseeable as a matter of law and was not an intervening cause that severed the causal chain. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed. It was clearly foreseeable that intentional or reactive striking would occur under these circumstances, and the striking was not an intervening cause sufficient to break the causal chain. Partial summary judgment for plaintiff on the issue was proper. Larchick v. Diocese of Gt. Falls-Billings, 2009 MT 175, 350 M 538, 208 P3d 836 (2009), following Fisher v. Swift Transp. Co., Inc., 2008 MT 105, 342 M 335, 181 P3d 601 (2008). See also Prindel v. Ravalli County, 2006 MT 62, 331 M 338, 133 P3d 165 (2006).

Nondelegable Duty to Provide Safe Workplace — Availability of Contributory Negligence Defense: The District Court held that defendant employer owed plaintiff employee a nondelegable duty of care to maintain a safe workplace and that employer's breach of that duty caused plaintiff's injuries as a matter of law. The District Court then allowed defendant to argue contributory negligence, which plaintiff asserted was an improper delegation of defendant's safe workplace duty. While recognizing the nondelegable duty under 50-71-201, the Supreme Court also noted that 27-1-702 imposes on a plaintiff the duty to conform to a standard of conduct for plaintiff's own protection so that plaintiff's conduct does not constitute a legally contributing cause that operates along with defendant's negligence in bringing about plaintiff's harm. Citing Edie v. Gray, 2005 MT 224, 328 M 354, 121 P3d 516 (2005), and Giambra v. Kelsey, 2007 MT 158, 338 M 19, 162 P3d 134 (2007), the court harmonized the two concepts by holding that establishing the existence of negligence per se settles only the questions of duty and breach, but a plaintiff must still prove causation before recovering damages, and a jury may weigh or compare evidence of negligence from a statutory violation that constitutes a proximate cause of the injury along with other evidence of negligence on the part of both parties. As provided in Shannon v. Howard S. Wright Constr. Co., 181 M 269, 593 P2d 438 (1979), and Stepanek v. Kober Constr., 191 M 430, 625 P2d 51, 38 St. Rep. 385 (1981), contributory negligence remains available as a defense to a defendant who has breached its nondelegable duty to provide a safe workplace if evidence demonstrates that: (1) the employee has some reasonable means or opportunity to avoid the hazard without endangering employment; or (2) the harm in question was not a reasonably foreseeable consequence of the employer's breach of the safety duty. In this case, the evidence created a genuine issue of material fact as to whether plaintiff had been contributorily negligent, so it was proper for the trial court to submit the issue to the jury and for the jury to apportion negligence between the parties in reaching a verdict. Olson v. Shumaker Trucking & Excavating Contractors, Inc., 2008 MT 378, 347 M 1, 196 P3d 1265 (2008).

No Exception Shown to Rule on Nonliability of Owner to Employee of Subcontractor — Summary Judgment Proper: Fabich filed for damages from an injury received after a fall from scaffolding while working as an employee of a subcontractor at defendant's power plant. The District Court found that defendant was not liable and granted summary judgment for defendant. Fabich appealed on grounds that the court incorrectly rejected Fabich's theories of liability. Generally, an owner, employer, or general contractor does not have a duty to prevent injuries to an independent contractor's employees, but Fabich asserted that defendant nevertheless had a duty under three recognized exceptions to the general rule, claiming that defendant negligently exercised retained control, that the activity was inherently dangerous, and that defendant had a nondelegable duty (see Umbs v. Sherrodd, Inc., 246 M 373, 805 P2d 519 (1991), and Beckman v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 2000 MT 112, 299 M 389, 1 P3d 348 (2000)). The Supreme Court examined each exception and affirmed summary judgment. First, Fabich's theory of negligence in exercising retained control failed because defendant did not retain control over the working circumstances. Second, the theory of inherently dangerous activity failed because the hazards associated with the job were normally encountered in the workplace and did not call for particular precautions. Third, there was nothing in the contract establishing that defendant assumed responsibility for initiating, maintaining, and supervising safety precautions, so defendant had no nondelegable duty. Absent a genuine issue of material fact regarding defendant's liability, summary judgment was proper. Fabich v. PPL Mont., LLC, 2007 MT 258, 339 M 289, 170 P3d 943 (2007).

Evidence of Driver's Conduct Allowed to Establish Passenger's Comparative Negligence: Elisha was killed while riding on Jason's motorcycle after Jason failed to negotiate a turn. Elisha's parents sued the state for negligence in constructing and maintaining the road. Although he was a nonparty, the state sought to introduce evidence of Jason's alleged intoxication, excessive speed, and misaimed headlight in an attempt to establish Elisha's alleged comparative negligence. The District Court disallowed the evidence, but on appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Under Buck v. St., 222 M 423, 723 P2d 210 (1986), a driver's negligence cannot be imputed to a passenger for purposes of comparative negligence. However, if sufficient evidence exists to show that in the exercise of ordinary care the passenger should have chosen not to ride with an intoxicated driver, the jury should be instructed on the separate issue of negligence involving the passenger and should decide the issue of the passenger's comparative negligence. Additionally, a finding that the passenger was subjectively aware of the driver's alleged negligence or intoxication is not required before the passenger may be found comparatively negligent. Faulconbridge v. St., 2006 MT 198, 333 M 186, 142 P3d 777 (2006).

Introduction by Defendant of Nonparty Conduct Allowed Only to Show That Conduct Was Superseding Intervening Cause of Plaintiff's Damages: Elisha was killed while riding on Jason's motorcycle after Jason failed to negotiate a turn. Elisha's parents sued the state for negligence in constructing and maintaining the road. Although he was a nonparty, the state sought to introduce evidence of Jason's alleged intoxication, excessive speed, and misaimed headlight. The state recognized that Montana law precludes a defendant from apportioning liability to a nonparty, but argued that evidence of Jason's conduct was admissible to negate causation pursuant to Pula v. St., 2002 MT 9, 308 M 122, 40 P3d 364 (2002), and to rebut breach of duty. The District Court disallowed the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. After revisiting Pula, the court concluded that a defendant may introduce nonparty conduct only to demonstrate that the conduct was a superseding intervening cause of plaintiff's damages, which means an unforeseeable event that occurs after the defendant's original act of negligence. The question then became whether Jason's conduct was foreseeable and whether the state, as the entity that designed and maintained the road, might reasonably have foreseen as probable that Jason might drive in a negligent manner. The court cited Buck v. St., 222 M 423, 723 P2d 210 (1986), for the holding that driver error is anticipated and that the fact that a driver was arguably negligent does not cut off the state's liability for negligence in the design and maintenance of a road. Faulconbridge v. St., 2006 MT 198, 333 M 186, 142 P3d 777 (2006), followed in Larchick v. Diocese of Gt. Falls-Billings, 2009 MT 175, 350 M 538, 208 P3d 836 (2009).

Failure to Admit Person to Jail When Committed by Competent Authority — Negligence Per Se Argument Not Considered for First Time on Appeal: Russell violated the terms of his suspended sentence and was ordered to report to the county jail no later than 8 a.m. on December 28, 1998. When Russell appeared at the jail, a written order of commitment could not be found, so Russell was turned away. When Prindel was subsequently injured by Russell, Prindel argued that failure to admit Russell to jail constituted negligence per se on the part of the county. However, Prindel did not allege any elements of negligence per se in the action, so the Supreme Court declined to address the issue on appeal. Prindel v. Ravalli County, 2006 MT 62, 331 M 338, 133 P3d 165 (2006).

Failure to Admit Person to Jail When Committed by Competent Authority Negligent Violation of Duty of Care: Russell violated the terms of his suspended sentence and was ordered to report to the county jail no later than 8 a.m. on December 28, 1998. When Russell appeared at the jail, a written order of commitment could not be found, so Russell was turned away. On December 30, Russell stabbed Prindel at a party, and Russell was sentenced to life in prison for attempted deliberate homicide. Prindel subsequently sued the county, alleging that the failure to incarcerate Russell on the 28th, despite a court order that Russell begin serving a sentence on that day, amounted to negligence that proximately caused Prindel's injury. The District Court granted summary judgment to the county, concluding that the county had no duty to prevent Russell from injuring Prindel and that the issue of causation need not be addressed. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The county's argument that it had no duty of care without a written order was without merit because the oral pronouncement of sentence constituted the competent authority to incarcerate Russell, and the jail's ignorance of the commitment order did not diminish the court order's status as a competent authority. The county had a special relationship of custody under 7-32-2205 to take Russell into custody for the protection of the public, and failure to do so was negligence as a matter of law. Russell posed a foreseeable risk, Prindel was a foreseeable plaintiff, and the county owed a duty to Prindel to exercise reasonable care to protect him against Russell. Reasonable minds could differ as to whether Russell's act of stabbing Prindel was so unforeseeable as to sever the chain of causation, so summary judgment for the county was error. Prindel v. Ravalli County, 2006 MT 62, 331 M 338, 133 P3d 165 (2006), following Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081 (1999), and LaTray v. No Showing That Defendants' Actions in School Bus Incident More Than Likely Caused Student's Physical and Mental Injuries — Factors in Judicial Determination of Duty of Care — Summary Dismissal of School District Liability Proper: A student returning home on a school bus from a performance with the school pep band asked the director to stop the bus so that the student could use the restroom, but the director refused. The student was subsequently disciplined by the school for various actions related to the incident and soon after became seriously ill. The student and his parents filed an action against the school district, the director, and the bus driver, alleging that various breaches of the duty of care triggered or accelerated the student's development of diabetes and caused his posttraumatic stress disorder. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendants, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The existence of a duty of care depends on the foreseeability of the risk and on a weighing of the policy considerations for and against the imposition of liability, including: (1) moral blame attributable to defendant's conduct; (2) prevention of future harm; (3) extent of the burden placed on defendant; (4) consequences to the public of imposing a duty; and (5) availability of insurance for the risk involved. Further, the law of torts holds a defendant liable only for injuries to others that were to the defendant at the time reasonably foreseeable. A defendant owes a duty with respect to risks and hazards whose likelihood made the conduct unreasonably dangerous and hence negligent in the first instance. The specific injury need not be foreseeable, rather the question is whether defendant could have foreseen that the conduct would result in injury to plaintiff. The District Court here concluded that defendants owed no duty of care because the student's injuries were not foreseeable, which was an erroneous focus on the particular injury rather than on the foreseeability that defendants' conduct could result in the injury. However, if a plaintiff fails to offer proof of any one of the elements of negligence—duty, breach, causation, and damages—then summary judgment in favor of defendant is proper. The question remained whether plaintiffs' experts adequately established causation, and the Supreme Court held that they did not. The experts testified that defendants' conduct could have caused or accelerated the student's injuries, but under Butler v. Domin, 2000 MT 312, 302 M 452, 15 P3d 1189 (2000), the testimony did not meet the threshold of establishing that defendants' actions more than likely caused the injuries. Absent a causal connection between defendants' actions and the student's injuries, summary judgment for defendants was proper. Hinkle v. Shepherd School District No. 37, 2004 MT 175, 322 M 80, 93 P3d 1239 (2004), distinguishing Kolar v. Bergo, 280 M 262, 929 P2d 867 (1996).

Duty of State to Maintain University Library in Safe Condition: Plaintiff's child fell through the second story railing at the Montana State University-Bozeman library and suffered brain injuries. Just weeks before, another child fell thorough the same stairway. In determining negligence, the District Court granted plaintiff partial summary judgment on the issue of duty of care and breach of the duty. The state appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the state had a duty of ordinary care to prevent children from falling through the railing at the public building and that the state breached that duty because the state had notice from the previous accident that there was a defect, yet the state did not cure, remove, or warn of the defect. Foreseeability was established at the time of the previous accident, so the state was liable despite a relatively accident-free history at the library and the fact that the building was grandfathered in under an older version of the building code in effect when the building was constructed. Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004), following Wiley v. Glendive, 272 M 213, 900 P2d 310 (1995).

No Prejudicial Error in Failure to Give Negligent Homicide Mental State Instruction in Wrongful Death Action When Other Instructions Adequately Reflect Negligence: Samson's son was killed by Bercier, a youth who walked away from a nonsecure, supervised licensed youth group home. Samson sued the state for foreseeable negligence. To boost the theory of foreseeability, Samson offered a jury instruction that defined Bercier's conduct as reckless and postulated therefrom that the conduct was foreseeable because of Bercier's background, seeking to undermine the state's theory that the shooting was an unforeseeable accident. The District Court refused to offer the instruction, instead instructing the jury on elements of wrongful death, and Samson appealed. The state argued that the mental state of Bercier was not a controlling issue and contended that it was not necessary to instruct the jury on the mental state of negligent homicide because the instructions as a whole properly included the key concepts of a wrongful death action. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. The fundamental issue concerned the state's negligence, not Bercier's mental state. Nevertheless, Samson was still able to present the foreseeability theory under the instructions that were given, so failure to give Samson's offered instruction did not result in prejudice to Samson's case. It is within a District Court's discretion to decide how to instruct the jury, taking into account the theories of the contending parties, and absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. Samson v. St., 2003 MT 133, 316 M 90, 69 P3d 1154 (2003). See also Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122 (1996).

State Not Liable for Unforeseeable Accident — Intervening Criminal Act of Third Person — Expert Testimony on Foreseeability Proper: Samson's son was killed by Bercier, a youth who walked away from a nonsecure, supervised licensed youth group home. Samson sued the state for negligence. The jury returned a verdict for the state, and Samson appealed. Rather than retry the case and evaluate the facts to determine whether the state was negligent, the Supreme Court reviewed the verdict to determine if there was substantial evidence to support it and determined that there was. In order to sustain a negligence action, plaintiff must establish a legal duty on the part of defendant, a breach of that duty, causation, and damages. In cases involving a dispute over the intervening criminal act of a third party, foreseeability must be analyzed twice—first with regard to the existence of a legal duty and second with regard to proximate causation. Samson contended that the District Court erred in allowing the state to present evidence in the form of expert testimony and to argue that the shooting was an unforeseeable accident. The state argued that the expert testimony was relevant and aided the jury. Given the need to determine the foreseeability of Bercier's actions, the expert testimony was properly allowed. Further, in cases alleging an intervening cause, juries must be instructed that the specific injury to plaintiff need not have been foreseen. Samson v. St., 2003 MT 133, 316 M 90, 69 P3d 1154 (2003), affirming Lacock v. 4B's Restaurants, Inc., 277 M 17, 919 P2d 373 (1996). See also Lopez v. Proximate Cause Determination Needed in Alleging Negligence Per Se or Common-Law Negligence in Swimming Pool Drowning — Summary Judgment Proper: Following a drowning at the swimming pool of Custer's Inn, the estate of the victim filed a wrongful death action, alleging that the inn's negligence per se in failing to comply with state swimming pool safety statutes and regulations was the proximate cause of the drowning. In granting the inn's motion for summary judgment, the District Court ruled that the estate had failed to plead common-law negligence. On appeal, the Supreme Court outlined the five elements established in VanLuchene v. St., 244 M 397, 797 P2d 932 (1990), to prove negligence per se and the four elements established by the court in numerous decisions necessary to prove common-law negligence. In affirming the District Court's grant of summary judgment for the inn, the court ruled that under either theory of negligence, a plaintiff's claim must fail as a matter of law if the defendant's conduct did not cause the alleged damages. In this case, the estate failed to establish any material dispute that the failure of the inn to comply with swimming pool safety statutes and regulations was the proximate cause of the victim's drowning death. Schwabe v. Custer's Inn Associates, 2000 MT 325, 303 M 15, 15 P3d 903, 57 St. Rep. 1370 (2000), overruled in Giambra v. Kelsey, 2007 MT 158, 338 M 19, 162 P3d 134 (2007), to the extent that Schwabe held that breach of a statutory duty under a negligence per se claim may also carry the added advantage of foreclosing common law defenses.

Duty of City to Inspect City Property for Hazards: Plaintiff was injured after tripping on a fence wire while walking her dog at night in an unmaintained grassy area on city right-of-way next to a city street. Plaintiff contended that the city was negligent in allowing a dangerous and hazardous condition to exist on a public right-of-way and guilty of negligence per se under 81-4-105 for allowing a public nuisance. The District Court granted summary judgment, determining as a matter of law that the city owed plaintiff no duty of care because: (1) she was not walking on a sidewalk, street, or path of any kind; (2) the city did not invite her to travel in that area; and (3) there were no city lights or signs in the vicinity. On appeal, plaintiff cited Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748 (1997), contending that the city ignored its duty to maintain the public streets, sidewalks, and rights-of-way within corporate limits in a reasonably safe condition for public travel by never going onto the premises, mowing it, raking it, or removing debris and that if routine maintenance had been done, the wire would have been found and removed. The Supreme Court agreed. The city's contention that it did not owe a duty of care in this case, because there was nothing in the area suggesting that it was a walkway or inviting the public to use it as such, failed under the Richardson test because of the city's neglect in exercising ordinary care or skill in the management of its property. Reasonable minds could differ on whether the city should have taken some action to inspect or maintain the property, so summary judgment was improper and thus reversed for a jury determination of negligence, including possible contributory negligence. Dobrocke v. Columbia Falls, 2000 MT 179, 300 M 348, 8 P3d 71, 57 St. Rep. 718 (2000).

Notice of Defect Not Required Before Landowner's Duty of Care Exists Toward Persons Injured on Property — Sullivan and Buck Overruled: Plaintiff was injured after tripping on a fence wire while walking her dog at night in an unmaintained grassy area on city right-of-way next to a city street. The District Court determined that under Montana law, a city must have notice of a defect in its streets and sidewalks before being held liable for an accident occurring as a result of the defect, citing Wiley v. Glendive, 272 M 213, 900 P2d 310 (1995), and since the city had no notice of the wire, it could not be held liable. The Supreme Court distinguished the Wiley pronouncement of required notice as based largely on dicta and went on to examine the cases that Wiley was based on, including Sullivan v. Butte, 104 M 225, 65 P2d 1175 (1937), and Buck v. St., 222 M 423, 723 P2d 210 (1986). The court then overruled Sullivan and Buck to the extent that notice of a defect is required before a landowner, whether it be the state, a city, a corporation, or a private individual, has a duty of care to persons injured on the landowner's property and instead applied Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748 (1997), which established the standard for premises liability based on the landlord's exercise of ordinary care or skill in the management of property. A property owner who never maintains the land will never have notice of defects until someone is injured. It would not make sense to hold that landowners who never inspect or maintain their property are not exposed to liability because they could not discover a defect, while landowners who do inspect and maintain their property are exposed to liability. Thus, the District Court erred in concluding that the city's failure to have notice of the wire precluded relief against it as a matter of law. Dobrocke v. Columbia Falls, 2000 MT 179, 300 M 348, 8 P3d 71, 57 St. Rep. 718 (2000). See also Brown v. Demaree, 272 M 579, 901 P2d 567 (1995).

Double Analysis of Foreseeability in Dispute Over Intervening Act of Third Party — Duty of Police to Protect Hospital Worker From Intoxicated Person in Voluntary Custody: Havre police received a report of two girls fighting downtown. They responded and found two intoxicated women fighting, one of whom appeared to require medical treatment. LaTray was working as a nurse at a hospital emergency room when police officers delivered the woman for treatment, accompanied by her sister. The injured woman was placed in protective custody, but neither woman was arrested. When attempting to administer medical care to the injured woman, LaTray was intentionally assaulted and injured by the sister, and LaTray filed an action against the city police officers for negligently failing to exercise proper control over the sister. The District Court found that because the intentional assault was not reasonably foreseeable as a matter of law, there was no duty owed LaTray by the city, and summary judgment was granted to the city. The Supreme Court held that intervening criminal acts of third persons are not automatically unforeseeable as a matter of law, but rather must be addressed in the foreseeability context on a case-by-case basis (see Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018 (1997)). Although foreseeability is ordinarily analyzed only under the duty element of negligence, in a dispute over intervening criminal acts of a third party, foreseeability must be analyzed twice: first with regard to the existence of a legal duty and, second, with regard to proximate causation (see Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081 (1999)). The city relied on Phillips v. Billings, 233 M 249, 758 P2d 772 (1988), arguing that because LaTray did not claim the existence of a special relationship or otherwise show that the officers owed LaTray a greater duty of care than that owed to the general public, the city owed LaTray no duty of care. The Supreme Court noted that Phillips has been clarified in Nelson v. Driscoll, 1999 MT 193, 295 M 363, 983 P2d 972 (1999), which stated that a duty to protect third persons arises only when a police officer actually makes an arrest or otherwise takes possession or custody of an individual. Although the officers did not actually arrest the sister or otherwise have a basis for taking her into custody in this case, the officers voluntarily undertook possession or custody in transporting her to the hospital and consequently harbored the ability to control her actions and prevent an unreasonable risk of harm to third persons like LaTray, who falls within the scope of the risk that negligent supervision would foreseeably entail. Thus, the Supreme Court held that, as a matter of law, the city owed a duty of reasonable care to adequately supervise the sister so as to prevent harm to a third person who would foreseeably be placed within the scope of risk arising from negligent supervision. Whether the city breached that duty is an issue for the jury because the causal issue of intervening acts of third parties normally involves questions of fact. Viewed in the light most favorable to LaTray, there was sufficient evidence of the sister's irascible conduct to raise a jury question as to whether she posed a danger to those around her on the day in question, and reasonable jurors could differ as to whether she presented a foreseeable risk of injury to persons in her immediate vicinity. These contested issues of material fact precluded a grant of summary judgment as a matter of law, and the case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. LaTray v. Havre, 2000 MT 119, 299 M 449, 999 P2d 1010, 57 St. Rep. 497 (2000), followed, with regard to appropriateness of summary judgment on issues of negligence, in Prindel v. Ravalli County, 2006 MT 62, 331 M 338, 133 P3d 165 (2006). See also Morrow v. FBS Ins. Montana-Hoiness LaBar, Inc., 230 M 262, 749 P2d 1073 (1988), and Estate of Strever v. No Duty Constituting Negligence When Danger or Risk Unforeseeable — Summary Judgment Proper Absent Material Fact Regarding Legal Duty: The father could not reasonably foresee that, by giving his child permission to go to a friend's house to play, the child would go to the house of a different friend, participate along with other children in burning a photograph using gasoline, and be burned when another friend accidentally kicked the container of flaming gasoline onto his child. The duty element of negligence turns primarily on foreseeability, and if a reasonably prudent defendant can foresee neither any danger of direct injury nor any risk from an intervening cause, there is no negligence. Ordinarily, negligence actions involve questions of fact and are not susceptible to summary judgment, but in this case, reasonable minds could not differ regarding the absence of material fact regarding any duty owed by the father, so summary judgment was proper as a matter of law. Poole v. Poole, 2000 MT 117, 299 M 435, 1 P3d 936, 57 St. Rep. 489 (2000), following Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122 (1996). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081 (1999), and Gourneau v. Hamill, 2013 MT 300, 372 Mont. 182, 311 P.3d 760.

Inherent Danger of Trenching Activity — Vicarious Liability of Employer for Injuries Caused by Subcontractor's Failure to Reduce Risks: Beckman was working to replace a waterline in a trench in Butte when the trench collapsed. At the time, Beckman was an employee of an independent contractor who had been hired by a developer to replace the city waterline as part of the upgrade to another project that the developer was constructing, as required by Butte-Silver Bow. Beckman filed a complaint against Butte-Silver Bow, seeking damages for personal injuries sustained in the collapse. Under Umbs v. Sherrodd, Inc., 246 M 373, 805 P2d 519 (1991), employers are generally not liable for the torts of their independent contractors, except when: (1) there is a nondelegable duty based on a contract; (2) the activity is inherently or intrinsically dangerous; and (3) the general contractor negligently exercises control reserved over a subcontractor's work. The District Court found that trenching activity was not inherently or intrinsically dangerous and granted Butte-Silver Bow's motion for summary judgment. The court, citing Kemp v. Bechtel Constr. Co., 221 M 519, 720 P2d 270 (1986), ruled as a matter of law that trenching activities did not fall under the inherently dangerous exception because Beckman's injury could have been avoided through standard precautions. On appeal, the Supreme Court decided that the analysis of the inherently dangerous activity exception in Kemp was manifestly wrong, and overruled that case and its progeny. Instead, the court reaffirmed the holding in Ulmen v. Schwieger, 92 M 331, 12 P2d 856 (1932), in which it was determined that the vicarious liability of an employer of a subcontractor was contingent on the nature of the work performed and not on the existence of standard precautions. An employer is therefore vicariously liable for injuries to others caused by a subcontractor's failure to take precautions to reduce unreasonable risks associated with engaging in an inherently dangerous activity. Risks associated with people working in trenches where a cave-in can cause death or serious bodily injury are well recognized in the construction industry as intrinsically or inherently dangerous and are recognized as such as a matter of law. Beckman v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 2000 MT 112, 299 M 389, 1 P3d 348, 57 St. Rep. 466 (2000), overruling Micheletto v. St., 244 M 483, 798 P2d 989 (1990), and Kemp v. Big Horn County Elec. Co-op, Inc., 244 M 437, 798 P2d 999 (1990). Beckman was followed in Cunnington v. Gaub, 2007 MT 12, 335 M 296, 153 P3d 1 (2007).

Material Question Whether County Negligently Exercised Control Over Subcontractor as Precluding Summary Judgment: Beckman was working to replace a waterline in a trench in Butte when the trench collapsed. At the time, Beckman was an employee of an independent contractor who had been hired by a developer to replace the city waterline as part of the upgrade to another project that the developer was constructing, as required by Butte-Silver Bow. Beckman filed a complaint against Butte-Silver Bow, seeking damages for personal injuries sustained in the collapse. Under Umbs v. Sherrodd, Inc., 246 M 373, 805 P2d 519 (1991), employers are generally not liable for the torts of their independent contractors, except when: (1) there is a nondelegable duty based on a contract; (2) the activity is inherently or intrinsically dangerous; and (3) the general contractor negligently exercises control reserved over a subcontractor's work. The District Court cited Micheletto v. St., 244 M 483, 798 P2d 989 (1990), and Kemp v. Big Horn County Elec. Co-op, Inc., 244 M 437, 798 P2d 999 (1990), in holding that the county did not assume a nondelegable duty of safety by contract, finding that Butte-Silver Bow never agreed to supervise the safety of the trenching operations and therefore did not assume a nondelegable duty based on contract that extended to Beckman. Thus, summary judgment was granted to Butte-Silver Bow. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the District Court correctly recognized the distinction between a nondelegable contractual duty and a duty based on the negligent exercise of retained control. However, Micheletto and Kemp provide an incorrect statement of the doctrine of retained control. Here, despite the lack of a written contract, the county retained the means with which to both discover and cure any unreasonably dangerous conditions. The terms of the water mains extension document, which provided that the county may supervise the water extension project, required the county to furnish a qualified construction inspector to monitor work performed during the installation of the water supply system and required that the materials and methods of construction conform to county requirements. The terms, combined with the fact that county employees were present during the trenching operation, constituted sufficient facts to preclude summary judgment for the county. The case was reversed and remanded. Beckman v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 2000 MT 112, 299 M 389, 1 P3d 348, 57 St. Rep. 466 (2000). See also Stepanek v. Kober Constr., 191 M 430, 625 P2d 51 (1981).

Expert Testimony Necessary to Establish Applicable Standard of Care Owed by Physician Who Treats Referred Patient — Functional Capacities Evaluation: Even though a physician-patient relationship may not exist when a test is administered at the request of a third party, a physician nevertheless owes a duty to an examinee who is not that physician's patient to exercise care commensurate with the examiner's professional training and experience. The standard of care applicable to the administration of a functional capacities evaluation (FCE) can be established only through expert testimony that takes into account the training and experience of the physical therapist relative to administering the FCE. Romans v. Lusin, 2000 MT 84, 299 M 182, 997 P2d 114, 57 St. Rep. 363 (2000). See also Webb v. T.D., 287 M 68, 951 P2d 1008, 54 St. Rep. 1502 (1997).

Plaintiff's Burden to Establish Prima Facie Case Not Relieved by Res Ipsa Loquitur: In order for the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur to apply, permitting an inference of negligence on the part of one in control of an instrumentality that causes injury, not only must the elements of the doctrine be met, but plaintiff also has the burden of making a prima facie case that defendant breached a duty of care. Here, plaintiff did not establish the standard of care applicable to administration of a functional capacities evaluation through expert testimony, nor did plaintiff establish a breach of the standard by the person who administered the test. Absent a prima facie case, res ipsa loquitur did not apply and summary judgment for defendant was proper. Romans v. Lusin, 2000 MT 84, 299 M 182, 997 P2d 114, 57 St. Rep. 363 (2000). See also Clark v. Norris, 226 M 43, 734 P2d 182, 44 St. Rep. 444 (1987).

Physician's Standard of Care Toward Examinee Sent to Physician by Examinee's Employer or Insurer or by Some Other Third Party: At the request of the workers' compensation insurer of an injured worker's employer, a physician examined the worker. He reported his findings to, and his fee was paid by, the insurer. He wrote the worker a letter telling her that she had a back sprain, that no treatment was needed, and that she had an impairment rating of 2% of the whole person. She went back to work, suffered a severely herniated disc in her back, and has significant physical limitations as a result. She sued the doctor for negligence. He claimed that he did not have a physician-patient relationship with her and therefore had no duty of care toward her. The Supreme Court held that based on 27-1-701, a physician who performs an examination of an employee, insured, or other person at the request of a third party has a duty to exercise the level of care required by the physician's professional training and experience and the duty to exercise ordinary care to: (1) discover those conditions that pose imminent danger to the examinee's physical and mental well-being; (2) take reasonable steps to communicate any such condition to the examinee; and (3) ensure that when the physician advises an examinee about a condition, the advice comports with the standard of care for the profession. The court stated that it was not thereby concluding that the physician has the same duty of care as toward a patient. Webb v. T.D., 287 M 68, 951 P2d 1008, 54 St. Rep. 1502 (1997), followed in Romans v. Lusin, 2000 MT 84, 299 M 182, 997 P2d 114, 57 St. Rep. 363 (2000).

Criminal Acts by Parolee Held Reasonably Foreseeable — Negligence of State Found in Supervising Parolee: Corliss was paroled, after serving time for an execution-style slaying with a handgun, under the condition that he not possess a firearm. While on a visit, with the approval of his parole officer, to Washington state to look for work, Corliss failed to return to Montana within the established time, failed to see a parole officer in Washington, had a temporary restraining order obtained against him by a girlfriend because of threats made to her and her family, and had an altercation with his wife involving a handgun. In neither instance of violence did Corliss's parole officer investigate the circumstances of the violence. Later, Corliss shot and killed one friend of his girlfriend and injured another. Both the estates of the deceased woman and the wounded woman brought actions against the state for negligent supervision of Corliss's parole. Citing Estate of Strever, 278 M 165, 924 P2d 666 (1996), the Supreme Court held that although in the usual case the criminal acts of a third party may not be foreseeable, lack of foreseeability is not established in Montana as a matter of law because the facts of a case may indicate that criminal acts should have been foreseen and held that criminal acts of a third party should be treated like any other intervening superseding act and the foreseeability of that act should be determined by the factfinder. The Supreme Court therefore held that the District Court properly denied the state's motion for a directed verdict. Starkenburg v. St., 282 M 1, 934 P2d 1018, 54 St. Rep. 214 (1997). See also Lopez v. Great Falls Pre-Release Serv., Inc., 1999 MT 199, 295 M 416, 986 P2d 1081, 56 St. Rep. 771 (1999).

Injury While Lifting Door Not Part of Continuous Sequence Establishing Proximate Cause: Bossard injured his arm while lifting a sliding door on Johnson's property back onto its track. The Supreme Court held that although Johnson knew that the door could come off its track, he could not foresee that Bossard would injure his arm lifting the door into place and that therefore there was a link missing in the chain of causation, thus negating proximate cause. Bossard v. Johnson, 265 M 272, 876 P2d 627, 51 St. Rep. 494 (1994).

Licensee or Invitee — Duty of Care: While visiting her son Brian and his family in Texas for the holidays, Doris was asked to show the family home to prospective buyers while Brian was at work. To enhance the appearance of the kitchen, Doris washed and waxed the floor, but she slipped on a wet spot and broke her hip and then sued Brian for negligence. Doris maintained that she was an invitee because her showing the house conferred an economic benefit on Brian and that Brian therefore had a duty to exercise reasonable care to eliminate a condition that posed an unreasonable risk of harm to her, of which he had either actual or constructive knowledge. Brian maintained that his mother was only a licensee because the primary purpose of her visit was to spend time with the family and that the incidental chores undertaken by her as licensee did not convert her status to that of invitee. (See also Prestwood v. Taylor, 728 SW 2d 455 (Tex. Ct. App. 1987).) The trial court properly held that Doris was a licensee because there was no evidence of business dealings between the parties or actual pecuniary benefit to Brian. Brian's liability was conditioned on his actual knowledge that the defect existed and that it was dangerous. (See also St. v. Tennison, 509 SW 2d 560 (Tex. 1974).) Absent proof of his actual knowledge of the dangerous condition, Brian had no duty to warn Doris or to repair the defect. Barrows v. Barrows, 256 M 78, 844 P2d 119, 49 St. Rep. 1145 (1992).

No Duty Owing to Student Injured in Extracurricular Activity During Summer: The plaintiff, a high school student, sustained injuries while attending a privately sponsored summer cheerleading clinic. She sued her high school district as the party responsible for its students during extracurricular activities and as principal of its agent, the cheerleading adviser, for negligent supervision. In the plaintiff's appeal of summary judgment in favor of the school district, the Supreme Court held that a school does not owe a duty to a student for an extracurricular activity during the summer months when the activity is governed by independent parties. Rollins v. Blair, 235 M 343, 767 P2d 328, 46 St. Rep. 39 (1989).

Summary Judgment Proper — No Reasonable Difference of Opinion That Defendant Did Not Cause Injury: Plaintiff parents appealed a summary judgment order in an action alleging a university's negligence caused injury to their minor daughter who had consumed alcohol and was involved in a motorcycle accident while under the supervision of a university program. Although the university assumed a custodial role similar to that of a high school when it undertook to have plaintiffs' daughter live on its campus, supervised by university personnel, and thus was charged with exercising reasonable care, there was no room for a reasonable difference of opinion as to whether someone other than the defendant university was the intervening cause of the daughter's injury. Therefore, summary judgment for the university based on proximate cause was proper. Graham v. Mont. St. Univ., 235 M 284, 767 P2d 301, 45 St. Rep. 2389 (1988).

Questions of Anticipated Harm and Duty of Ordinary Care as Material Issues of Fact — Summary Judgment Improper: In reversing a summary judgment as improper, the Supreme Court found that material questions of fact for a jury existed on the issues of whether: (1) the town of Whitehall should have anticipated that harm would be caused by the condition of the sidewalk despite the knowledge and obviousness of the condition; and (2) the town of Whitehall exercised ordinary care to keep the sidewalk reasonably safe. Even if it appeared that recovery under these issues was very remote, they constituted genuine issues of material fact; therefore, summary judgment was not appropriate. Kaiser v. Whitehall, 221 M 322, 718 P2d 1341, 43 St. Rep. 846 (1986). However, see Yager v. Deane, 258 M 453, 853 P2d 1214, 50 St. Rep. 610 (1993).

Lack of Contract — Breach of Warranty Sounded in Tort Rather Than Contract: Plaintiff was injured in 1979 while spraying weeds. He brought suit in 1984 against the producers, distributors, and sellers of the herbicide and spraying equipment, claiming counts in strict liability in tort, tortious misrepresentation, negligence, and contract for breach of sellers' warranty. Plaintiff had no direct written contract with any of the defendants. The District Court found that there was no contract from which to imply the warranties which plaintiff claimed were breached. The court reasoned that without a contract the breach of warranty claims sounded in tort rather than contract; therefore, the warranty claims were barred by the 3-year tort Statute of Limitations. On appeal, plaintiff contended that one of the longer contract Statutes of Limitations in 27-2-202 or 30-2-725 should apply. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the implied covenants of good faith and fair dealing, fitness for a particular purpose, merchantability, and workmanlike performance are imposed by law regardless of contract and that, absent a contract, breach of the implied covenants sounds in tort, not contract. The District Court judgment was affirmed. Bennett v. Dow Chem. Co., 220 M 117, 713 P2d 992, 43 St. Rep. 221 (1986).

"Substantial Factor" Rule to Apply:

The substantial factor rule applies when two causes concur to bring about an injury and either cause would have been sufficient for the result. Thus, it applied in this case when the necessity for amputation of the leg of a state prison inmate could have been caused either by the inmate's preexisting condition of arteriosclerosis of the blood vessels of the legs or by the negligence of doctors treating him for an ingrown toenail. Kyriss v. St., 218 M 162, 707 P2d 5, 42 St. Rep. 1487 (1985).

The Supreme Court stated its approval of the "legal cause" (substantial factor) instruction in this medical malpractice case involving alleged concurrent and subsequent tortfeasors (surgeon, nurses, and radiologist). The court stated that the rule was developed primarily for cases such as the one under consideration in which application of the "but for" (proximate cause) rule would allow each defendant to escape responsibility because the conduct of one or more others would have been sufficient to produce the same result. Rudeck v. Wright, 218 M 41, 709 P2d 621, 42 St. Rep. 1380 (1985), followed in Kyriss v. St., 218 M 162, 707 P2d 5, 42 St. Rep. 1487 (1985).

Contractor's Duty to Subcontractor: Sections 50-71-201 and 50-71-202 require a contractor to furnish a subcontractor with a safe place to work. A subcontractor is an employee of the contractor for purposes of 50-71-201. Cain v. Stevenson, 218 M 101, 706 P2d 128, 42 St. Rep. 1428 (1985).

Surgeon's Failure to Remove Foreign Object Negligence Per Se: In this medical malpractice action, the Supreme Court adopted the rule of negligence per se in holding that a surgeon is negligent as a matter of law when he leaves a foreign object inside his patient during surgery. The surgeon bears the responsibility of the surgical procedure. Other persons also may be negligent and liable as concurrent tortfeasors or subsequent tortfeasors, but the surgeon who initially was negligent and whose original negligence set in motion the concurrent and following negligent acts or omissions should not be allowed to avoid his liability. Rudeck v. Wright, 218 M 41, 709 P2d 621, 42 St. Rep. 1380 (1985), distinguished, with regard to liability for negligent design and supervision of a water pipeline project, in Jim's Excavating Serv., Inc. v. HKM Associates, 265 M 494, 878 P2d 248, 51 St. Rep. 623 (1994).

Jury Instructions — "Locality Rule" Standard Not Relevant for Judging Medical Specialist — "Loss of Chance": Woman sued her doctor, a national board certified orthopedic surgeon, for damages for alleged negligent medical treatment. Defendant had treated plaintiff for misdiagnosed knee problems for 4 months without ordering diagnostic X-rays before referring plaintiff for surgery to out-of-state doctor who discovered a giant cell tumor in plaintiff's knee. Plaintiff alleged that defendant's failure to order diagnostic films early in treatment resulted in her losing any chance to have less radical surgery and preserve her natural knee. Jury returned verdict in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Supreme Court vacated District Court judgment and remanded for new trial. Supreme Court held that District Court committed reversible error by instructing jury on the "locality rule" as appropriate standard of care rather than giving plaintiff's proposed instruction holding board certified specialists to national standards of the specialty. Supreme Court also held that on retrial, plaintiff is entitled to a "loss of chance" instruction. The trier of fact should determine whether defendant's negligence was a substantial factor in reducing plaintiff's chances of obtaining a better result rather than whether plaintiff would have obtained a better result with earlier diagnosis. Aasheim v. Humberger, 215 M 127, 695 P2d 824, 42 St. Rep. 235 (1985); holding explained and extended to include Board-certified family practitioners in Glover v. Ballhagen, 232 M 427, 756 P2d 1166, 45 St. Rep. 1168 (1988).

Respondeat Superior — Accident Caused by Insurance Agent: Defendant insurance company's agent participated in a Dillon rodeo, went to a barbecue at his Dillon home, and in the evening consumed alcohol at several Dillon bars. On the way home from the bars, he struck plaintiff while driving an auto the agent leased from insurer's wholly owned service company, which had a common board of directors with insurer. Plaintiff sued defendants under respondeat superior. There was evidence agent sold insurance as a result of participating in group recreational and social activities. Summary judgment for insurer was refused because there was a fact question as to whether agent's activities during the night in question were within the course and scope of his work as an insurance agent. However, summary judgment was granted in favor of the service company as there was no evidence that agent was acting as the agent of the service company at the time of the accident. Vollmer v. Bramlette, 594 F. Supp. 243, 41 St. Rep. 1964 (D.C. Mont. 1984).

Employee Suit Against Employer's Parent Corporation — Mere Holding Company Not Liable: Under the workers' compensation law provision that an employee may sue a third party in tort for causing injury to an employee, the employee may sue the parent corporation of a subsidiary corporation for which the employee works but must establish that the parent corporation had an independent duty toward the employee. In the present case, the facts failed to establish that any duty was breached by the parent corporation. The parent corporation was simply a holding company that carried on no business other than operating through its subsidiaries. Any negligence of the subsidiary employer in regard to employee's products liability theory could not be passed on to the parent corporation. Mitchell v. Shell Oil Co., 579 F. Supp. 1326, 41 St. Rep. 278 (D.C. Mont. 1984).

Children Under One's Control — Duty of Care: A father sued YMCA for injury allegedly incurred by his 6-year-old son, who was found submerged in the YMCA pool by a lifeguard. The jury was properly charged that when a person undertakes the control or supervision of a child, he has the duty to use reasonable care to protect the child from injury and that though he is not an insurer of the child's safety he is required to use reasonable care commensurate with the reasonably foreseeable risk of harm to which the child might be subjected while under the person's control and supervision. The instruction expressed the idea that the reasonable care to be accorded must be commensurate with the child's age and maturity. The father's counsel fully argued the proper standard of care, and the father's substantial rights were not prejudiced by failure to give his requested instructions stating that a greater degree of care is owed to a child than to an adult. Johnson v. YMCA, 201 M 36, 651 P2d 1245, 39 St. Rep. 1937 (1982).

Snowbanks — Jury Question: In a customer's suit against a supermarket for injuries sustained when she fell while climbing over a snowbank created by the plowing of the parking lot, summary judgment for the supermarket was reversed and the case remanded for trial, as it could reasonably be inferred that the piling of snow in front of the store entrance increased the hazard created by the natural accumulation of snow and ice and that the supermarket should have anticipated the injuries received as a result of the dangerous condition. The snowbank was between the parking lot and the store and had a path cut through it that customer did not use as it had a water puddle in it and she assertedly believed she could not step over it. Cereck v. Albertson's, Inc., 195 M 409, 637 P2d 509, 38 St. Rep. 1986 (1981), overruled, as to the distinction between liability based upon natural versus altered accumulations of ice or snow that are open and obvious and as to the standard that a property owner is absolved of liability because a dangerous condition upon the premises is open and obvious, in Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748, 54 St. Rep. 1422 (1997).

Snowbanks From Plowing Parking Lot — Duty of Property Owner: A property owner may be held liable for falls on accumulations of ice and show where the hazard created by the natural accumulation is increased or a new hazard is created by an affirmative act of the property owner; even where such a condition is actually known or obvious, a property owner may be held liable if he should have anticipated that injuries would result from the dangerous condition. Cereck v. Albertson's, Inc., 195 M 409, 637 P2d 509, 38 St. Rep. 1986 (1981), overruled, as to the distinction between liability based upon natural versus altered accumulations of ice or snow that are open and obvious and as to the standard that a property owner is absolved of liability because a dangerous condition upon the premises is open and obvious, in Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748, 54 St. Rep. 1422 (1997).

Availability of Affirmative Defenses to Railroad — Absolute Liability: Plaintiff was employed by a subsidiary of Burlington Northern and was injured in an accident involving Burlington's railroad cars. The Supreme Court decided the federal Safety Appliance Act applied despite the fact the railroad cars involved in the accident were on a siding where loading operations were handled by the subsidiary. Noting that the U.S. Supreme Court has declared that the question of whether a railroad can assert contributory negligence or assumption of risk as a defense in a case involving a nonrailroad employee depends entirely on state law, the Supreme Court cited its 1966 holding that, where the theory of absolute liability applies, liability is established when it is proved that a statute has been violated and there is a proximate cause connection between the violation and the resulting injuries. Proximate cause in a case under the Safety Appliance Act is decided using the definition that prevails under state law. Comparing the 1966 case under the Scaffolding Act with this case, the Supreme Court denied the defendant the two defenses. The Supreme Court also noted that railroad employees are entitled to a more liberal standard imposing liability than nonrailroad employees. Reynolds v. Burlington N., 190 M 383, 621 P2d 1028, 37 St. Rep. 1883 (1980).

Duty to Provide Safe Working Place — Railroad Employee: In a case brought by an employee injured while working for a subsidiary of a railroad, the Supreme Court held that the plaintiff was owed the duty to provide him with a safe place to work. Noting that giving the jury information about the subsidiaries might well have been highly prejudicial to the defendant railroad, the Supreme Court nonetheless felt obliged to consider it in this case. The plaintiff was working directly in the operations of the railroad in every sense of the word. The railroad would not be absolved of the responsibility to provide a safe place to work for employees who are technically employed by a subsidiary corporation but whose employment is directly related to the operations of a railroad. Closeness of the businesses of the parent and subsidiary companies was a factor in the court's conclusion that both corporations owed the duty to provide the plaintiff with a safe place to work. Reynolds v. Burlington N., 190 M 383, 621 P2d 1028, 37 St. Rep. 1883 (1980), distinguished in Thornock v. Pack River Management Co., 227 M 524, 740 P2d 1119, 44 St. Rep. 1284 (1987).

Corporate Employee: Where employee of foreign corporation allegedly placed crate of oranges in aisle of corporation's store resulting in injury to customer when he tripped over the crate, action against foreign corporation and its resident employee, who was joined as John Doe, was not served with process, and did not appear, was not removable by corporation to federal court on ground of diversity of citizenship. Jensen v. Safeway Stores, Inc., 24 F. Supp. 585 (D.C. Mont. 1938).

INJURY TO PROPERTY

Nuisance Action Based on Negligence — Elements of Claim: A woman used hanging bird feeders, ground feeding, and a heated bird bath to attract birds to her property. Her neighbor supplied evidence that the birds congregated on their shared property line and created a high level of excrement, feathers, carcasses, and noise. The Justice Court concluded that although the woman's activities may not have created a nuisance in different surroundings, the close proximity of the properties, the power line running between the yards, the distribution of trees, and the manner of feeding created a nuisance under the circumstances. The Supreme Court upheld the Justice Court's conclusion that the elements of nuisance were satisfied in this situation,. The Supreme Court noted that a nuisance action based on negligence consists of something done lawfully but so carelessly or negligently as to create a potential for harm to another, and all persons have a general duty of care to abstain from injuring the person or property of another. The Supreme Court found that the remedy imposed by the Justice Court was overly broad and substituted a narrower injunction in order to avoid depriving the woman of the enjoyment of her property. Simpkins v. Speck, 2019 MT 120, 395 Mont. 509, 443 P.3d 428.

Negligence During House Moving — Breach of House Moving Agreement — Remand for Determination of Causation and Damages: Kelly entered an agreement with Hall to move four of Kelly's housing units. Hall agreed to obtain cargo insurance on each unit but did not do so. During the move, two units were damaged, and Kelly filed a claim against Hall's insurer for remuneration. The claim was denied, and the insurer sought a declaratory judgment against both Hall and Kelly. Kelly filed negligence and breach of contract claims against Hall, and Hall counterclaimed for breach of contract against Kelly. The District Court concluded that Kelly failed to establish negligence, that both parties breached the contract, and that neither party could recover against the other. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the finding that Hall breached the contract by failing to obtain cargo insurance and that, based on the presumption against conditions precedent and inconclusive evidence, Kelly also breached the contract and thus could not recover breach of contract damages. However, there was no evidence to rebut Kelly's negligence claim, nor did the District Court address the damages that Hall conceded occurred during the move. Because it was error to find that Kelly failed to establish negligence, the case was remanded for trial on causation and damages. Scottsdale Ins. Co. v. Hall, 2003 MT 188, 316 M 460, 73 P3d 819 (2003).

Mortgagee's Right to Assert, on Mortgagee's Behalf, Mortgagor's Contract and Tort Claims for Damage to Property: The mortgagee alleged that the engineering firm hired by the mortgagor knowingly laid improper pipe in the land, resulting in the state's disapproval of the pipe. The mortgagee could not sue the engineering firm for breach of contract and for breach of professional duty owed to the mortgagor under the theory that the mortgagee was a direct creditor of the mortgagor and was entitled to execute on any asset of the mortgagor and that the contract and breach of professional duty claims were assets. The mortgagee would have to be a judgment creditor of the mortgagor with a claim against the mortgagor that had been reduced to judgment before the mortgagee could sue the engineering firm for breach of the firm's contract with and professional duty to the mortgagor. Turner v. Kerin & Associates, 283 M 117, 938 P2d 1368, 54 St. Rep. 522 (1997).

Mortgagee's Right to Sue Mortgagor and Third Party for Impairment of Security Interest — Suit by Mortgagee Acquiring Security Interest After Damage by Third Party: A mortgagee can sue a mortgagor for actions or inactions that impair the mortgagee's security interest. The mortgagee can also sue a third party for damage to the property that impairs the security interest. In this case, a mortgagee who acquired mortgages from a prior mortgagee could sue a third party in tort for impairment of the security interest caused by damage to the property that occurred while the prior mortgagee held the mortgages. Allowable damages are the extent of the outstanding debt. The third party was an engineering firm alleged to have knowingly laid improper pipe in a subdivision. The state refused to approve the pipe. Turner v. Kerin & Associates, 283 M 117, 938 P2d 1368, 54 St. Rep. 522 (1997).

Damage to Prescriptive Easement — Injunction Denied: The District Judge properly denied the plaintiffs' request for an injunction and their claim for damages for rutting and disrepair of the roadway where the testimony showed that plaintiffs kept the roadway up despite use of it by defendants and defendants' use of the roadway was consistent with defendants' interest in the land. Marta v. Smith, 191 M 179, 622 P2d 1011, 38 St. Rep. 28 (1981).

Negligence in Maintenance of an Irrigation Ditch: Although plaintiff's contention that an owner of an irrigation ditch is not an absolute insurer is correct where the testimony shows: (1) that there were erosion and cutting away of the cross-claimants' soil on both sides of the ditch; (2) that there had been "bad washing"; and (3) that it would take $5,500 to make the irrigation system suitable to prevent further washing on cross-claimants' land and to repair past damage, there was substantial evidence to support the findings of negligence and damages of $5,500. Marta v. Smith, 191 M 179, 622 P2d 1011, 38 St. Rep. 28 (1981).

Trespass: Where defendant had plaintiffs' permission to enter upon plaintiffs' land for seismograph operations and defendant, after protests by the plaintiff landowners, caused explosions which damaged a spring, defendant was a trespasser ab initio and could be liable irrespective of negligence. Francis v. Sun Oil Co., 135 M 307, 340 P2d 824 (1959).

No Reference to Unfair Claim Settlement Practices Statute — Remand — Suspension of Proceedings Pending Determination of Liability: Appellant Fode asked the Supreme Court to recognize the common-law duty of good faith and fair dealing imposed by 28-1-201 and 28-1-203 without reference to 33-18-201, the unfair claim settlement practices statute. In remanding the case, the court found that Fode's allegations contained in his complaint should be presented to the District Court to determine whether a cause of action existed under 33-18-201; however, all proceedings were suspended until liability was determined in the underlying case. Fode v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 221 M 282, 719 P2d 414, 43 St. Rep. 814 (1986), distinguished in Peris v. Safeco Ins. Co., 276 M 486, 916 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 481 (1996).

Where Contractual Obligation Not Assumed by Defendant, Suit for Breach Wrong Remedy: Where receiver of vendor company assigned contract of sale to another company without assumption by the latter of the vendor's obligation thereunder and assignee sold the property to a third person subject to the rights of the deceased owner's estate, in a suit for breach of contract against the assignee company by the personal representatives of the deceased purchaser, judgment for plaintiff was erroneous in absence of proof that defendant had assumed the obligations of the vendor. Under the facts, the assignee became a trustee for the original vendee by operation of law. Thompson v. Lincoln Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 114 M 521, 138 P2d 951 (1943), followed, with regard to lack of implied assumption of contractual obligations absent assignment of contractual rights, in Davey v. Case Notes

DECISIONS AFTER 1987 ENACTMENT

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — Properly Pleaded When Existence of Contract Alleged: A mortgagee obtained a loan for a residential property and fell behind on payments. The mortgagee contacted the bank for assistance to modify monthly payments, and alleged that the bank instructed her to stop making monthly mortgage payments in order to qualify for a loan assistance program. The mortgagee stopped making payments but never qualified for the assistance program. The mortgagee defaulted on the loan but continued to reside on the property. The mortgagee received at least nine notices of sale over an 8-year period, each of which, the mortgagee alleged, accelerated all amounts due. The deed of trust contained a provision stating the procedure that the lender was required to follow to provide notice to the mortgagee prior to accelerating the loan. As a result, the mortgagee sued, alleging six causes of action, one of which was a breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, based in contract and based on the "special relationship" criteria giving rise to a tort. The District Court dismissed the mortgagee's breach of contract claims. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, determining that because the mortgagee alleged that a contract existed and created a special relationship, and that the lender breached the implied covenant by not acting honestly and failing to observe reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing, the mortgagee sufficiently pleaded both a contractual breach of the implied covenant and a tortious breach of the implied covenant sufficient to survive a Rule 12(b)(6), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), motion. Puryer v. HSBC Bank USA, 2018 MT 124, 391 Mont. 361, 419 P.3d 105.

No Duty to Recover Funds Under Contract — No Breach of Contract or Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — Statute of Limitations for Equitable Relief Expired: The plaintiff contracted with Bancard Services, Inc. (Bancard), one of the defendants, for Bancard to provide processing services to the plaintiff's ATMs located throughout Montana. Bancard subcontracted with a third-party payment processor to assist in processing transactions, and an agent of the third party made a data entry error that transferred $285,000 of the plaintiff's funds to an out-of-state individual, Leland Ruzicka, and B&B Lounge (collectively Ruzicka), also defendants in the case. Bancard was able to recover all but $35,000 of the plaintiff's funds. Eventually, the plaintiff sued both Bancard and Ruzicka for the outstanding $35,000. The plaintiff also filed several contractual related claims against Bancard. The District Court granted summary judgment to the defendants because Bancard did not have an obligation to recover the funds under the parties' contract and because the statute of limitations had expired on the unjust enrichment claims against Ruzicka. Grizzly Sec. Armored Express, Inc. v. Bancard Serv., LLC, 2016 MT 287, 385 Mont. 307, 384 P.3d 68.

Tortious Breach — Existence of Contract Required: A claim for tortious breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing was based on an alleged, invalid oral contact that modified an existing, written contract. Because the claim of tortious breach was based on the invalid oral modification, the court properly granted summary judgment to the defendants. Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167, following Knucklehead Land Co., Inc. v. Accutitle, Inc., 2007 MT 301, 340 Mont. 62, 172 P.3d 116.

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — No Application When Terminated Policy Not Part of Employment Contract: A hospital discontinued a policy whereby it paid employees for their sick leave after 25 years of service. Employees with less than 25 years of service sued the hospital for breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The District Court granted the hospital summary judgment, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the policy at issue was not a part of the employment contract, the courts concluded that the covenant of good faith and fair dealing did not apply. Chipman v. NW. Healthcare Corp., 2014 MT 15, 373 Mont. 360, 317 P.3d 182.

Absence of Evidence of Violation of Standards of Commercial Reasonableness — Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Not Breached: Plaintiff contended that defendant title companies breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing during a foreclosure sale. Plaintiff presented an expert who opined that defendants did not conduct the sale in the same manner as the expert, but offered no conclusion that defendants' administration of the sale demonstrated a violation of accepted and reasonable commercial standards. Absent evidence of defendants' failure to act in accordance with industry practices, the District Court did not err in holding that defendants did not breach the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Knucklehead Land Co., Inc. v. Accutitle, Inc., 2007 MT 301, 340 M 62, 172 P3d 116 (2007).

Justifiable Cause to Terminate Contractual Relationship — No Breach of Contract or Tortious Interference With Business Relations: In 2000, optometrist Hardy enrolled as a Vision Service Plan (VSP) member with defendant. The agreement provided for automatic annual renewal unless either party terminated the agreement, or VSP could terminate the agreement at any time if Hardy failed to comply with VSP policies, rules, and procedures. One condition for continued membership was that the member maintain majority ownership and complete control of all aspects of the optometric practice. Unbeknownst to VSP, Hardy had previously entered a franchise agreement with another optical supplier that contravened certain provisions of the VSP agreement, so VSP terminated Hardy's agreement. Hardy sued VSP, alleging breach of contract and tortious interference with Hardy's business relations. The District Court granted summary judgment to VSP, and Hardy appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Hardy had no justifiable expectation of a continued contractual relationship with VSP after breaching VSP's policies. The VSP agreement was unambiguous as a matter of law, and VSP had just cause to terminate the agreement based on Hardy's actions in enrolling as a franchisee with another company on terms that violated the VSP agreement. Hardy's tortious interference claim also failed absent evidence that VSP unlawfully engaged in activities to damage Hardy's business. Summary judgment for VSP was proper. Hardy v. Vision Serv. Plan, 2005 MT 232, 328 M 385, 120 P3d 402 (2005).

Summary Judgment on Breach of Contract Affirmed — Wrongful Discharge Claim Reversed for Determination of Whether Claimant Was Employee or Independent Contractor: Tvedt brought a claim for breach of contract, wrongful termination, and indemnification of expenses, alleging that defendant group had breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, waived the at-will clauses in their employment agreement, and mischaracterized Tvedt as an independent contractor, rather than an employee. Defendant group moved for summary judgment and filed a contingent counterclaim stating that in the event that Tvedt was found to be defendant group's employee, then defendant group's obligation to pay Tvedt the contract value should cease and all payments made to Tvedt should be returned. The District Court determined that Tvedt was not an employee and granted summary judgment to defendant group on all claims, and Tvedt appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed summary judgment on the breach of covenant issue because Tvedt was given adequate notice of termination, defendant group was exercising the specific language of the at-will termination provision of the contract, and Tvedt did not demonstrate that defendant group had waived the right to enforce that provision. However, the court reversed summary judgment on the wrongful discharge claim because the District Court incorrectly applied defendant group's novation argument and because genuine issues of fact remained whether Tvedt was an employee or independent contractor and whether a manager's agreement that recognized Tvedt individually was in effect at the time of termination. Remand was ordered because the District Court never considered whether Tvedt was entitled to relief for wrongful discharge as a matter of law and, if so, whether the claim for indemnification was appropriate. Tvedt v. Farmers Ins. Group of Co., 2004 MT 125, 321 M 263, 91 P3d 1 (2004).

No Duty of Insurer to Notify Claimant of Limitation on Workers' Compensation Medical Benefits: Wiard's workers' compensation benefits were terminated because of failure to file a medical claim within the 60-month period required in 39-71-704. Wiard contended that the failure of the insurer to notify him of the statutory limit violated Title 33, ch. 18, commonly known as the Unfair Trade Practices Act, and the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The Supreme Court disagreed. The rights and duties of the parties were imposed by the provisions of the Workers' Compensation Act, and nothing in that Act established an affirmative duty on the insurer to inform Wiard of the 60-month limitation on the duration of his medical benefits. Wiard v. Liberty NW. Ins. Corp., 2003 MT 295, 318 M 132, 79 P3d 281 (2003).

When Claim for Relief Accrues for Failure of Construction Contract to Be Awarded to Lowest Bidder — No Negligence by Engineering Firm in Handling of Bidding Process on Public Works Contract: The city of Glasgow hired an engineering firm to prepare plans, specifications, and bid documents for a municipal sewer improvement project, including review of bid results and bid award recommendations. Debcon, Inc. (Debcon), submitted the lowest bid, but the engineering firm's review showed significant mathematical errors in Debcon's bid and some question as to the ability of Debcon to perform. The engineering firm recommended that the contract be awarded to a different bidder, and Debcon sued both the city and the engineering firm, alleging negligence in the award of the construction contract. The District Court concluded that Debcon lacked standing to assert a duty of care owed to it by the city and that the negligence claim against the engineering firm must also fail as a matter of law because the firm owed no duty of care to Debcon, an essential element for asserting negligence as a claim for relief. Debcon did not appeal the judgment in favor of the city, but did appeal the judgment in favor of the firm. The Supreme Court cited a long line of cases back to 1910 for the proposition that, absent a duty, no breach of duty can be established and no negligence action can be maintained. An unsuccessful bidder has no standing in mandamus or otherwise to control the discretion in the award of a contract to the lowest responsible bidder, which may not be the lowest pecuniary bidder. A claim for relief from the award of a public contract accrues under the following conditions: (1) plaintiff must timely assert its claim as an aggrieved taxpayer; (2) the claim must seek a remedy, such as an injunction, writ of mandamus, or declaratory judgment, that will protect the rights of the aggrieved taxpayer from the potential harm that will occur; and (3) plaintiff must then show that the process by which the public works contract was awarded resulted from an abuse of discretion, i.e., that discretion was tainted by an act of bad faith, fraud, corruption, or arbitrariness. The Supreme Court in this case declined to follow Debcon's contention that a new duty of care should be constructed from whole cloth that would allow Debcon, as the aggrieved low bidder, to recover lost profits or other expectancy damages under a negligence theory. The District Court properly concluded that the engineering firm, serving as project engineer for the city of Glasgow, did not owe Debcon, as a failed bidder, a duty of care in its handling of the public works contract bidding process under a negligence theory. Debcon's claim for relief was a claim for which relief could not be granted as a matter of law. Further, Debcon did not enjoy contractual privity with the engineering firm, so absent a statutory provision that would sustain a bad faith claim, a claim of bad faith did not lie. Summary judgment in favor of the engineering firm was proper. Debcon, Inc. v. Glasgow, 2001 MT 124, 305 M 391, 28 P3d 478 (2001), following O'Brien v. Drinkenberg, 41 M 538, 111 P 137 (1910), and its progeny, Koich v. Cvar, 111 M 463, 110 P2d 964 (1941), and State ex rel. Sletten Constr. Co. v. Great Falls, 163 M 307, 516 P2d 1149 (1973), and followed, with regard to standing to challenge the letting of a contract to provide public school transportation, in Hickey v. Baker School District No. 12, 2002 MT 322, 313 M 162, 60 P3d 966 (2002).

Lawsuit by Shareholder Causing Damages Considered Breach of Fiduciary Duty of Care: Sletteland brought a suit against two other corporate shareholders for charging excessive attorney fees and seeking their removal as corporate directors. The District Court held that the fees were excessive, but found no grounds for removal. The other shareholders filed a counterclaim against Sletteland, alleging that he breached his fiduciary duty in bringing the lawsuit because the timing of the suit caused refinancing of a project to fail, resulting in damage to the corporation and to other shareholders. The District Court agreed, and both parties appealed their respective issues. The Supreme Court reversed on the issue of excessive fees, but affirmed on the issue of breach of fiduciary duty. The fiduciary duty between shareholders of a close corporation is one of utmost good faith and loyalty. Sletteland admittedly knew of the refinancing and, as an attorney and investment banker, also knew the effect that a lawsuit alleging misconduct by board members would have on a refinancing effort. In fact, it appeared that the suit was brought to specifically derail the refinancing. Sletteland was the person who determined the timing of the suit, which was filed immediately before the individuals involved in the refinancing were to meet for discussions, and when asked to withdraw the suit so refinancing could conclude, he refused to do so. Sletteland did not use the care that an ordinarily prudent person would use in a similar situation, resulting in the breach of fiduciary duty. The Supreme Court also affirmed the award of damages. Although future damages could not be calculated exactly in this case, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in basing its calculations on expert testimony of a well-known regional economist. Sletteland v. Roberts, 2000 MT 382, 304 M 21, 16 P3d 1062, 57 St. Rep. 1639 (2000).

Real Estate Sale — Alleged Breach of Covenant Held Not to Require Expert Testimony: May sued a Bozeman real estate company and agent over the terms of the sale of his property, alleging a breach of the covenant. The Supreme Court held that the District Court improperly dismissed the claim and held that expert testimony was not necessary to establish reasonable commercial standards. The Supreme Court also held, distinguishing Crenshaw v. Bozeman Deaconess Hosp., 213 M 488, 693 P2d 487 (1984), that if the duty of good faith and fair dealing requires both honesty and commercially reasonable conduct, then that duty can be breached by dishonesty or commercially unreasonable conduct and that it does not require expert testimony to prove dishonesty. Because the Supreme Court had held that there was sufficient evidence of fraud to survive a summary judgment motion, the Supreme Court also held that there was sufficient evidence of breach of the covenant to survive that motion and reversed the District Court. May v. ERA Landmark Real Estate of Bozeman, 2000 MT 299, 302 M 326, 15 P3d 1179, 57 St. Rep. 1256 (2000).

Federal Preemption:

In a case involving discharge from employment from a job covered by a collective bargaining agreement and the federal Railway Labor Act, the Supreme Court held, citing Foster v. Albertsons, Inc., 254 M 117, 835 P2d 720 (1992), that a claim for the breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing is preempted by federal law because the covenant arises out of the employment contract and that that contract, in the case of a collective bargaining agreement, is governed by federal law. However, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court on dismissal of a common-law wrongful discharge claim, citing Foster for the proposition that a common-law claim, because it does not depend upon interpretation of the employment contract, is an independent claim and is not preempted by the federal Railway Labor Act. Winslow v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2000 MT 292, 302 M 289, 16 P3d 992, 57 St. Rep. 1238 (2000).

The method of handling a claim filed under the Federal Employees Health Benefits Act is governed exclusively by that federal Act and is not subject to a state law that imposes an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Nitschke v. Blue Cross of Mont., 45 St. Rep. 229 (1988); opinion withdrawn but issue affirmed in Nitschke v. Blue Cross of Mont., 231 M 113, 751 P2d 175, 45 St. Rep. 473 (1988).

Failure to Effectuate Insurance Settlement in Good Faith as Independent Cause of Action: Under 33-18-201, an insurer is required to attempt in good faith to effectuate prompt, fair, and equitable settlements of claims in which liability has become reasonably clear. A violation of this provision gives rise to an independent cause of action under 33-18-242. Because the continuing duty of good faith is not ended by commencement of a lawsuit by an insured, that duty can be breached by an insurer's postfiling conduct, including the actions of attorneys conducting the insurer's defense. Amendment of the claim to include an action under 33-18-242 related back to the original claim and was properly allowed. Further, third-party defendant's alleged failure to conduct a reasonable investigation and its subsequent refusal to pay the claim, although occurring more than 2 years before commencement of plaintiff's cause of action, were, if proved, ostensibly part of the bad faith postjudgment conduct. Thus, the evidence of those acts was not time-barred. Federated Mut. Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 288, 297 M 33, 991 P2d 915, 56 St. Rep. 1152 (1999), following Safeco Ins. Co. v. Ellinghouse, 223 M 239, 725 P2d 217, 43 St. Rep. 1689 (1986), and Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 261 M 91, 861 P2d 895, 50 St. Rep. 1210 (1993).

Exceptions to Requirement for Matching Terms in Offer Made Under Right of First Refusal: A right of first refusal does not give the rightholder the power to compel an unwilling owner to sell, but merely requires the owner, when and if a decision is made to sell, to offer the property first to the rightholder at the stipulated price. The preemptive right ripens into an option when the owner elects to sell, at which point the owner has the contractual obligation to offer the property to the optionee on the same terms and conditions as the offer made to the owner by a third party. (See 77 Am. Jur. 2d Vendor Purchaser § 40 (1997).) In order that each party to the contract receives the benefit bargained for, under Miller v. LeSea Broadcasting, Inc., 87 F3d 224 (7th Cir. 1996), three exceptions to the requirement for the exact matching of terms have been recognized: (1) the grantor of the option can waive exact matching; (2) proper names need not be matched; and (3) the grantor of the option may not act in bad faith, including procuring from the third party terms that the grantor knows are unacceptable to the optionee for the purpose of discouraging exercise of the right of first refusal. As long as the conditions of the sale are commercially reasonable, imposed in good faith, and not specifically designed to defeat the right of first refusal, the optionee is obliged to match the offer if the right is to be exercised. Here, although attorneys for the parties engaged in discussions concerning whether poison pill provisions included in an offer were an attempt to dissuade exercise of the right of first refusal, the discussions were not found to impact the effective exercise of the right, so the District Court's conclusion that the right had been properly exercised was not in error. Kennedy v. Dawson, 1999 MT 265, 296 M 430, 989 P2d 390, 56 St. Rep. 1078 (1999). See also Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767, 47 St. Rep. 850 (1990), and Lee v. Agricultural Lease — No Error in Failure to Give Instruction on Implied Contract Covenant to Farm in Workmanlike Manner — Express Lease Terms Stricter Than Requested Instruction on Implied Term: The Schumachers leased property that they owned to Stephens through an agricultural lease. The lease required Stephens to farm with "diligence and care" and to do "all work necessary . . . and to the best interest of lessor, all in such time and manner as shall be to the best advantage and economy". The Schumachers sued Stephens, alleging that Stephens breached the implied contract covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The District Court refused to give the Schumachers' requested instruction on an implied covenant in the lease that would have required Stephens to farm the property in a "competent, skilled, workmanlike and husbandlike fashion". The Supreme Court noted that: (1) the District Court was correct in not giving an instruction on negligence because the Schumachers' complaint and evidence contained no such theory; (2) the District Court did instruct on the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing; (3) the standard of care required of Stephens was expressly stated in the lease itself; and (4) the Schumachers had not shown that they were prejudiced by the failure to give the requested instruction. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that it was not error for the District Court to refuse to give an instruction on an implied covenant to farm in a workmanlike manner. Schumacher v. Stephens, 1998 MT 58, 288 M 115, 956 P2d 76, 55 St. Rep. 247 (1998).

Agricultural Lease — No Error in Failure to Give Plaintiffs' Instruction on Effect of Material Participation Provisions — Instruction on Mutual Cooperation Held Sufficient: The Schumachers leased property that they owned to Stephens through an agricultural lease. Later, when the Schumachers sued Stephens over Stephens' failure to comply with the terms of the lease, Stephens claimed in defense that the Schumachers had breached the material participation agreements in the lease and that therefore he was excused from compliance. The Schumachers requested an instruction stating that if the jury found that Stephens failed to cooperate with the plaintiffs, then Stephens was not entitled to claim that he was excused from liability because of his contention that the Schumachers breached the material participation agreements in the lease. The District Court refused to give the instruction and instead gave an instruction stating that "the failure of a party to fully perform a contract is excused if his performance is prevented or delayed by the conduct of the other party". The Supreme Court noted that the Schumachers had not shown that they were prejudiced in any way by the failure of the District Court to give the requested instruction. Citing Fillinger v. NW. Agency, Inc., of Great Falls, 283 M 71, 938 P2d 1347 (1997), the Supreme Court held that: (1) a party assigning error to a refused instruction must show that the party was prejudiced by the refusal; and (2) the refused instruction must be reviewed in the context of the instructions that were given and the evidence produced at trial. Under these standards, the Supreme Court held that the instruction given by the District Court was sufficient. Schumacher v. Stephens, 1998 MT 58, 288 M 115, 956 P2d 76, 55 St. Rep. 247 (1998).

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Not Breached When Mortgage Allowed Partial Release: Because the bank did not owe a duty to the mortgagors to maintain the mortgage contract until full payment of the debt, the mortgagors were not deprived of a contractual benefit when the bank partially released the mortgage. Therefore, the mortgagors could not successfully claim breach by the bank of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The claim did not relate to the contract but rather to peripheral aspects of the mortgagors' relationship with the bank. Weldon v. Mont. Bank, 268 M 88, 885 P2d 511, 51 St. Rep. 1178 (1994).

Failure to Conform With Literal Language of Administrative Rule Not Illegal and Therefore Not Justification for Breach of Contract: Lewis subcontracted to do the electrical work on five units being built by Huyser. In the first four units, some of the rough-in wiring was covered, but the electrical inspector did not require that all the wiring be visible even though the literal language of the administrative rule indicated that it should be. On the fifth unit, shelving had been installed before the inspection. Lewis insisted that it all be taken down, claiming that he could lose his license if it was not. Huyser had some of the shelving removed, exposing some of the rough-in wiring. Lewis refused to complete the work, and Huyser hired another electrician to complete the job. Lewis sued for payment, and Huyser counterclaimed. The lower court found for Huyser on the basis that the inspector had informed Lewis that he would not lose his license and that the inspector would accept part of the rough-in wiring being exposed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the administrative rule should be reasonably interpreted to allow for waiver by the inspector of the requirement that all rough-in wiring be exposed. The Supreme Court further held that violation of the rule was not a statutory ground for losing an electrical license. The rule having been waived, the contract was not contrary to the policy of express law so that Lewis had a good faith duty to perform the remainder of the contract. Lewis v. Huyser, 264 M 141, 870 P2d 95, 51 St. Rep. 192 (1994).

Extent of Obligation of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Measured by Justifiable Expectations of Parties: Talley argued that because the covenant of good faith and fair dealing is implied into every contract, the community college that employed him as a part-time instructor breached the covenant by not hiring him back after his term contract expired. However, the nature and extent of the obligation of good faith and fair dealing is measured by the justifiable expectations of the parties. Because Talley's contract had a "no-tenure" clause that precluded any justifiable expectation of continued employment, allegations of breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing were not reasonable. Talley v. Flathead Valley Community College, 259 M 479, 857 P2d 701, 50 St. Rep. 889 (1993).

Rights Under Written Contract Not Obliterated by Implied Obligation — Nonrenewal of Term Contract: Farris was hired under a term contract that lasted 1 year. The contract provided for nonrenewal with adequate notice. After signing term contracts for 3 consecutive years, Farris was notified that employment would be discontinued. Farris sought to invoke the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, contending that the employer's oral negotiations implied permanent employment and objective manifestations of job security. However, consideration of the oral negotiations was barred by the parol evidence rule of 28-2-904, under which oral stipulations are superseded by a written contract. Consideration of representations of permanent employment made after the contract was signed was barred by 28-2-1602, which allows only written or executed oral agreement to affect the validity of a written contract. The Supreme Court cited Carma Developers v. Marathon Dev. Calif., Inc., 826 P2d 710 (Calif. 1992), for the proposition that no obligation can be implied that would result in the obliteration of a right expressly given under a written contract. In interpreting a contract, an implication should not be made when the contrary is indicated in clear and express words. Farris v. Hutchinson, 254 M 334, 838 P2d 374, 49 St. Rep. 717 (1992), distinguishing at-will dismissal under a written contract in Stark v. Circle K Corp., 230 M 468, 751 P2d 162 (1988), and Prout v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 236 M 152, 772 P2d 288 (1989), and followed in Talley v. Flathead Valley Community College, 259 M 479, 857 P2d 701, 50 St. Rep. 889 (1993).

No Bad Faith When Party Takes Advantage of Transaction Structure in Real Estate Transaction: An insurer who was a party to a real estate transaction did not breach the implied covenant of good faith by telling the insureds that it was considering taking a deed in lieu of foreclosure and later deciding to proceed with strict judicial foreclosure. The insurer's availing itself of the structure of the transaction as established by the agreement, made while insureds were represented by counsel, did not rise to the level of a bad faith violation of either the arbitrary, capricious, or unreasonable standard of Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342 (1985), or the dishonesty or commercial unreasonableness standard of Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767 (1990). Davey v. Nessan, 252 M 397, 830 P2d 92, 49 St. Rep. 294 (1992).

Bank's Failure to Advance More Money Under Line of Credit: Bank refused an additional loan requested by borrowers who already had a line of credit, stating that borrowers' only business customer and sole source of income for repayment of the line of credit was 84 days late in payments and appeared incapable of paying its bills. The line of credit provided that it did not constitute a commitment to make future advances and that any future advances would be at bank's discretion. In bank's suit to recover under the line of credit, it was not error to refuse borrowers' motion to amend counterclaims to state a cause of action for breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The line of credit gave bank discretion to deny future loans. There was no evidence that the discretion was misused to deprive borrowers of the benefit of the line of credit. Borrowers, after discovery, failed to raise sufficient facts to withstand a motion for summary judgment on the issue. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

Nature of Covenant — Test for Breach: An implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing exists in every contractual relationship, and a breach of the covenant is a breach of the contract. The standard of compliance is honesty in fact and the observance of reasonable commercial standards of fair dealing in the trade. Each party to the contract has a justified expectation that the other will act in a reasonable manner in performing, or in efficiently breaching, the contract. When a party uses discretion conferred by the contract to act dishonestly or outside of accepted commercial practices to deprive the other party of the benefit of the contract, the contract is breached. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991), following Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767 (1990).

Bank's Forcing Ranch to Sell Cattle Not Contractual Breach of Implied Covenant: In its counterclaim, the defendant ranch alleged that the plaintiff bank had breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing by forcing the ranch to sell all of its cattle to reduce the amount of its outstanding loan from the bank. The Supreme Court held that there was no breach of the covenant because the evidence indicated that the cattle were scattered in various locations without adequate feed for their survival and that selling them was the only solution in light of the facts. First Sec. Bank & Trust of Miles City v. VZ Ranch, 247 M 453, 807 P2d 1341, 48 St. Rep. 255 (1991). See also Winchell v. U.S. Dept. of Agriculture, 961 F2d 1442 (1992).

No Special Relationship When Contract Entered for Profit: In its counterclaim involving a tort action, the defendant alleged that the bank had breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The Supreme Court held that no special relationship can exist between the parties when the motivation for entering into the contract is for profit. In the absence of a special relationship, there can be no breach of the implied covenant. First Sec. Bank & Trust of Miles City v. VZ Ranch, 247 M 453, 807 P2d 1341, 48 St. Rep. 255 (1991).

When Actionable Cause for Termination Arises: On June 16, 1987, Martin was told her position was to be terminated as of July 17, 1987. After receiving notice, Martin discovered the position had not been eliminated but was to be filled by the company's new president's personal secretary from his former job. Martin filed suit alleging wrongful discharge, breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and negligence. On July 1, 1987, the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act became effective. The District Court held that the Act precluded Martin's claims for breach of the implied covenant and negligence because the claim had not fully accrued until the date of termination. On appeal, Martin conceded that the claim for negligence was properly dismissed in light of Heltborg v. Modern Mach., 244 M 24, 795 P2d 954 (1990), but disputed dismissal of the breach of covenant claim, contending that a cause of action begins at the time of breach, which in this case occurred upon receipt of the notice of termination, and that all decisions made leading to the discharge occurred prior to notification. The Supreme Court, citing Del. St. College v. Ricks, 449 US 250, 66 L Ed 2d 431, 101 S Ct 498 (1980), and Chardon v. Fernandez, 454 US 6, 70 L Ed 2d 6, 102 S Ct 28 (1981), agreed with Martin that the cause of action accrued upon notice of termination and held that it was the decision to terminate and the act thereupon that caused the end result. It was at that point that legal redress could first be sought. Martin v. Special Resource Management, Inc., 246 M 181, 803 P2d 1086, 47 St. Rep. 2319 (1990), followed in Walch v. Univ. of Mont., 260 M 496, 861 P2d 179, 50 St. Rep. 1186 (1993), distinguishing Allison v. Jumping Horse Ranch, Inc., 255 M 410, 843 P2d 753 (1992).

Fiduciary Duty Between Shareholders in Close Corporation When No Other Type of Relationship Exists: The fiduciary duty between stockholders of a close corporation is one of utmost good faith and loyalty. However, the controlling group should not be stymied by a minority stockholder's grievances if the controlling group can demonstrate a legitimate business purpose and the minority stockholder cannot demonstrate a less harmful alternative. If called on to settle a dispute between the stockholders, the court must weigh the legitimate business purpose, if any, against the practicability of a less harmful alternative. Daniels v. Thomas, Dean & Hoskins, Inc., 246 M 125, 804 P2d 359, 47 St. Rep. 2293 (1990), citing Donahue v. Rodd Electrotype Co. of New England, Inc., 328 NE 2d 505 (Mass. 1975), and Wilkes v. Springside Nursing Home, Inc., 353 NE 2d 657 (Mass. 1976), and distinguishing Skierka v. Skierka Bros., Inc., 192 M 505, 629 P2d 214 (1981), Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188 (1984), and Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148 (1986).

In Warren v. Campbell Farming Corp., 2011 MT 324, 363 Mont. 190, 271 P.3d 36, the Montana Supreme Court, in answering a certified question from the Tenth Circuit Court of Appeals, revisited the Daniels test and concluded that the Daniels test does not apply to claims involving director conflict of interest transactions. However, the Daniels test does apply to minority shareholders' claims of breach of fiduciary duties against majority shareholders.

Tort of Bad Faith — Not Available for Most Contract Actions — Breach: In a contract action, the Supreme Court ruled that a breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing constituted a breach of the contract and that only contract damages would be available to the prevailing party. The court stated that tort-type damages would not be available for a breach of the covenant. The court also held that the tort of bad faith would apply only in exceptional circumstances to discourage oppression in contracts that necessarily give one party a superior position. Every contract, regardless of the type, contains an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. A breach of the covenant is a breach of the contract. Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767, 47 St. Rep. 850 (1990), followed in Mann Farms, Inc. v. Traders St. Bank of Poplar, 245 M 234, 801 P2d 73, 47 St. Rep. 2094 (1990) (replacing previous opinion, subsequently withdrawn, at 47 St. Rep. 1557 (1990)), Lachenmaier v. First Bank Sys., Inc., 246 M 26, 803 P2d 614, 47 St. Rep. 2244 (1990), Wise v. Sebena, 248 M 32, 808 P2d 494, 48 St. Rep. 309 (1991), Citizens First Nat'l Bank of Wolf Point v. Luzenac America, Inc., 1998 MT 136, 289 M 201, 961 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 541 (1998). See also Winchell v. U.S. Dept. of Agriculture, 961 F2d 1442 (1992).

All Bank Transactions Not Subject to Implied Covenant: The bank refused to release funds from escrow in the manner requested by the plaintiff. The plaintiff suffered monetary damages as a result of the bank's actions. The Supreme Court ruled that damages alone are not sufficient to prove the existence of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing and that the covenant does not arise in every transaction involving a bank. O'Bagy v. First Interstate Bank of Missoula, 241 M 44, 785 P2d 190, 47 St. Rep. 69 (1990).

Remand Upon Failure to Instruct on Justifiable Expectations of Parties in Employment Contract Relationship: The Supreme Court remanded after finding the trial court failed to tell the jury the nature and extent of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The instructions informed the jury that as a matter of law the employer owed the covenant to the employee but failed to mention that the covenant is measured in a particular contract by the justifiable expectations of the parties, as required under Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 1822 (1985). Although not binding on the parties or the trial court on retrial, the Supreme Court set out suggested instructions explaining in detail application of the covenant. Hobbs v. Pac. Hide & Fur Depot, 236 M 503, 771 P2d 125, 46 St. Rep. 544 (1989).

Breach of Contract Required for Bad Faith Liability to Attach: When an underlying contract subsumes the entirety of the relationship between parties, Montana law requires an initial finding that one party breached the contract in order to have liability for bad faith and conduct attach. Mont. Bank of Circle v. Ralph Meyers & Son, Inc., 236 M 236, 769 P2d 1208, 46 St. Rep. 324 (1989), followed in Citizens First Nat'l Bank of Wolf Point v. Moe Motor Co., 248 M 495, 813 P2d 400, 48 St. Rep. 528 (1991). See also Mann Farms, Inc. v. Traders St. Bank of Poplar, 245 M

234, 801 P2d 73, 47 St. Rep. 2094 (1990), replacing previous opinion, subsequently withdrawn, at 47 St. Rep. 1557 (1990).

Failure to Renegotiate Defaulted Note — No Breach of Good Faith: The Supreme Court has never held that a Montana bank is under a duty to renegotiate a defaulted loan. Absent evidence that such a duty exists, a claim that a bank breached the covenant of good faith by failing to renegotiate a defaulted loan was properly dismissed. Mont. Bank of Circle v. Ralph Meyers & Son, Inc., 236 M 236, 769 P2d 1208, 46 St. Rep. 324 (1989), followed in Citizens First Nat'l Bank of Wolf Point v. Moe Motor Co., 248 M 495, 813 P2d 400, 48 St. Rep. 528 (1991)

Summary Judgment Proper — Surety Relationship: Plaintiff was held liable to bank as surety on a note. Summary judgment granted to the bank was proper as to plaintiff's counterclaim for the bank's breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Plaintiff's citation of Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988), as authority that banks have a fiduciary duty toward their customers is misguided as to plaintiff. The only connection between plaintiff and the bank is the surety agreement, and Weinberg does not state that there is a fiduciary duty in such a relationship. Mont. Bank of Livingston v. Old Saloon, Inc., 235 M 244, 766 P2d 878, 45 St. Rep. 2354 (1988).

Payment Withheld in Anticipation of Breach: When employee sent letter to employer stating terms substantially different from original oral contract, employer withheld employee's pay. Court held that the employer's action was reasonable and in good faith and did not breach the contract. The employer had reasonable grounds to believe the employee would breach the contract and thus give the employer a claim for damages; therefore, the employer was entitled to withhold performance until he received assurance of the employee's intent to fulfill the contract. This is the rule stated in section 251 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts (1979). Julian v. Mont. St. Univ., 229 M 362, 747 P2d 196, 44 St. Rep. 2046 (1987).

DECISIONS PRIOR TO 1987 ENACTMENT

No Bank Duty to Make Further Loans After Loan Repaid: Recovery for breach of a covenant of good faith and fair dealing requires an enforceable contract to which the covenant attaches. The nature and extent of the covenant is measured by the justifiable expectations of the parties. When a bank contracted to loan an attorney money, when the bank loaned various amounts at various times, and when the whole amount owed was repaid, the bank had no obligation to enter into another contract to loan more money and the attorney's claimed "justifiable expectations" that the bank would continue to loan him money had no contract to which they could be attached. Absent an express or implied contract, there could be no covenant, no justifiable expectations of continued credit, and no breach of covenant. Cate v. First Bank (N.A.)-Billings, 262 M 429, 865 P2d 277, 50 St. Rep. 1624 (1993).

Procedurally Improper and Unsubstantiated Claim of Bank Alteration of Records: In an attorney's action against a bank for breach of a covenant of good faith and fair dealing, the attorney filed a motion for summary judgment in which he for the first time claimed that the bank had altered his banking records and that the alterations made it liable as a matter of law and precluded summary judgment for the bank. He presented no evidence of alteration, did not modify his complaint to add the alteration claim, attempted to have his expert on the alleged alteration added to the witness list a month after the deadline for presentation of expert witness lists, and submitted, on appeal, letters from his expert that were not part of the record below. He presented no legal authority under which the bank's alleged actions and manner of keeping his records were illegal. It was not error to deny his motion. Cate v. First Bank (N.A.)-Billings, 262 M 429, 865 P2d 277, 50 St. Rep. 1624 (1993).

Existence of Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Not Implied in Employment of Corporate Officer: Mannix argued that the board of directors had breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing when they fired him. The Supreme Court held that the covenant was not implied in the employment relationship between Mannix and the corporation and that Mannix acknowledged that he was aware when hired that he served at the discretion of the board of directors. Mannix v. Butte Water Co., 249 M 372, 854 P2d 834, 50 St. Rep. 691 (1993).

No Showing of Breach of Good Faith Covenant: The Supreme Court, in a case involving a contract for the purchase of one bank by another bank, held that Kuhns had presented no evidence that the defendant had not made a good faith effort to obtain approval of the sale by the Federal Reserve Board. Kuhns v. Scott, 259 M 68, 853 P2d 1200, 50 St. Rep. 685 (1993).

Elements of "Special Relationship" Necessary to Support Tort Claim of Bad Faith: The essential elements of a special relationship necessary to support a tort claim of bad faith, as set out in Wallis v. Kroehler Mfg. Co., 207 Cal. Rep. 123 (1984), are: (1) the contract must be such that the parties are in inherently unequal bargaining positions; (2) the motivation for entering the contract must be a nonprofit motivation (i.e., to secure peace of mind, security, or future protection); (3) ordinary contract damages are not adequate because they do not require the party in the superior position to account for its actions and they do not make the inferior party whole; (4) one party is especially vulnerable because of the type of harm it may suffer and of necessity places trust in the other party to perform; and (5) the other party is aware of this vulnerability. If substantial evidence is not presented in support of each and all of the elements, the court shall direct that there is no special relationship. Simmons Oil Corp. v. Holly Corp., 258 M 79, 852 P2d 523, 50 St. Rep. 433 (1993). These elements were applied in Stephens v. Safeco Ins. Co. of America, 258 M 142, 852 P2d 565, 50 St. Rep. 467 (1993). See also Story v. Bozeman, 242 M 436, 791 P2d 767 (1990), and Warrington v. Great Falls Clinic, LLP, 2019 MT 111, 395 Mont. 432, 443 P.3d 369.

Good Faith Required in Exercise of General Right to Assign Debts Under Restructuring Agreement — Summary Judgment Inappropriate: The District Court relied on Carma Developers v. Marathon Dev. Calif., Inc., 826 P2d 710 (Calif. 1992), in granting summary judgment to defendants who contended that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing could not be used to override the specific provisions of a restructuring agreement allowing the assignment of plaintiff's debts. The Supreme Court distinguished Carma in holding that summary judgment was improper when a genuine issue of material fact existed as to whether the covenant was breached by defendant's discretionary use of the power of assignment to assign the notes to plaintiff's partner. Simmons Oil Corp. v. Holly Corp., 258 M 79, 852 P2d 523, 50 St. Rep. 433 (1993).

Seizure of Collateral by Bank Not Bad Faith: The plaintiffs sued the defendant bank for breach of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The Supreme Court held that the relationship between the parties was contractual and that the plaintiffs' assertion that they only signed blank documents rather than documents pledging collateral to secure bank loans was not supported by the evidence. The court ruled that under the law applicable at the time, the bank did not act in bad faith in seizing the collateral when the plaintiffs defaulted on their loans. Stott v. Fox, 246 M 301, 805 P2d 1305, 47 St. Rep. 2040 (1990).

No Question of Fiduciary Duty When Judgment Based Only on Good Faith and Fair Dealing: Appellant argued that District Court prejudiced its interests by improperly instructing the jury that, as franchisor, appellant owed a fiduciary duty to respondents as franchisees. The Supreme Court noted that a franchise relationship is inherently a business relationship rather than a fiduciary relationship. However, the questioned jury instruction was found to be primarily definitional; therefore, the Supreme Court found it unnecessary to rule on whether the special facts of the case gave rise to a fiduciary duty since the District Court only held appellant to the responsibility of acting in good faith and fair dealing with respondents. Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, Inc., 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 964 (1986).

Bad Faith Claim Suspended Until Liability Determined: Plaintiff sued defendant, insurer of another driver, following a three-car accident. Defendant denied any liability on the part of its insured and refused to pay any part of plaintiff's claim. Plaintiff then filed a bad faith action against defendant. The District Court granted summary judgment. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case. The court overruled Klaudt v. Flink, 202 M 247, 658 P2d 1065, 40 St. Rep. 64 (1983), to the extent that Klaudt allowed a bad faith claim to be pursued although liability for an accident had not been determined. The court noted several problems in this procedure and held that all proceedings in a bad faith case alleging violations of the insurance laws which require a showing that liability be reasonably clear are suspended until the liability issues of the underlying case are determined by judgment or settlement. The bad faith case may be filed to toll the Statute of Limitations, but no discovery may be engaged. A favorable District Court judgment for the plaintiff is sufficient to trigger discovery in the bad faith case. Fode v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 221 M 282, 719 P2d 414, 43 St. Rep. 814 (1986), distinguished in Peris v. Safeco Ins. Co., 276 M 486, 916 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 481 (1996).

Breach of Covenant of Good Faith in Conducting Insurance Claim: In a foreclosure action, the insured, Britton, cross-claimed against Farmers Insurance Group (FIG) for the full amount of coverage provided by FIG's policy and for further compensatory and punitive damages by reason of "bad faith". FIG responded to the foreclosure action by setting up as a cross-claim against Britton its right under its partial assignment of mortgage and requesting foreclosure against Britton. FIG further defended against Britton's cross-claim by alleging that Britton had intentionally set the fire, had been guilty of fraud with respect to his interest in the property, and had not submitted a proper proof of loss. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that prior to filing its answer to Britton's cross-claim, FIG neither rejected Britton's proof of loss nor informed him in writing or otherwise of their contention of arson. Also, FIG's evidence regarding Britton's involvement in setting the fire was circumstantial, and there was no evidence of potential financial gain for Britton from the policy proceeds. The jury decision that FIG breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing in conducting the claim was upheld. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Inadequate Jury Instruction — Implied Covenant of Good Faith: The District Court instructed the jury on the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, stating that good faith means honesty in fact in the conduct or transaction concerned and then equating the implied covenant to an obligation imposed by law on defendants to do nothing to deprive plaintiffs of the benefits of their commercial transaction. On appeal, defendants argued that the implied covenant had no application in a case involving an arms-length contract. The Supreme Court, relying on its decision in Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 1822 (1985), held that a breach of the implied covenant which results in damages can give rise to an action in tort, but that in order to recover additional punitive damages, plaintiffs must prove that defendants' actions in breaching the implied covenant met the requirements of 27-1-221. The tort of breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing requires more than a lack of honesty in fact. The instruction given to the jury on this issue inadequately defined the tort. McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986), followed in Noonan v. First Bank Butte, 227 M 329, 740 P2d 631, 44 St. Rep. 1124 (1987). See also Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, Inc., 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 964 (1986).

Contract Dispute — Damages — Harmless Error: Plaintiffs, sellers of a motel, sued for repossession of the motel and the defendants counterclaimed for actual and punitive damages. The District Court jury awarded judgment in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs appealed, claiming the District Court erred by instructing the jury that an oral waiver could alter a written contract and by submitting to the jury an issue of bad faith between the parties. The Supreme Court held that the defendants' testimony as to the plaintiffs' waiver was sufficient to uphold the jury decision and that the failure of the District Court to distinguish between damages arising from a breach of contract provision and damages for the tort of bad faith is in this case harmless in view of the jury verdict awarding only compensatory damages. Thiel v. Johnson, 219 M 271, 711 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 2010 (1985).

Breach of Good Faith Obligation — Punitive Damages: A breach of the obligation of good faith imposed by this section, in and of itself, is not sufficient to support an award of punitive damages. There must be some oppressive, malicious, or fraudulent conduct, beyond a breach of the statutory good faith obligation, to support an award of punitive damages. This statement of dictum was made by the court in holding that the plaintiff bank properly foreclosed on a mortgage on real property pledged as collateral for business loans after the bank had refused to extend the note unless the principal balance was reduced substantially. Cent. Bank of Mont. v. Eystad, 219 M 69, 710 P2d 710, 42 St. Rep. 1850 (1985).

Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — General Test for Contracts Covered: Plaintiff, who owned a building and two construction companies, and defendant insurance company signed a lease for office space in a building. Plaintiff was to renovate the space, and the two were to confer on and mutually approve the renovation plans. Disagreements arose on the plans. Plaintiff claimed he had difficulties contacting defendant. Defendant rescinded the lease on the ground that it had continually invested more time and money than plaintiff and that from a business standpoint the lease was no longer feasible. After failing in an attempt to contact defendant's president, plaintiff sent a notice of default and sued. The court affirmed an award of punitive damages to plaintiff. The court declined to extend the tort of breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing to all contracts of any type, including arms-length and substantially equal bargaining power contracts, but stated that: (1) whether breach of a contract constitutes the tort depends on whether there has been some impermissible activity; (2) the nature and extent of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing is measured in a particular contract by the justifiable expectations of the parties and, whether performing or breaching, each party has a justifiable expectation that the other will act as a reasonable person; (3) a party who acts arbitrarily, capriciously, or unreasonably exceeds the justifiable expectations of the other party, and the other party should be compensated for damages resulting from the culpable conduct; and (4) for punitive damages to be awarded for breach of an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing in a contract breach situation, the breach must amount to oppression, fraud, or malice. Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 1822 (1985), followed in Randolf V. Peterson, Inc. v. J.R. Simplot Co., 239 M 1, 778 P2d 879, 46 St. Rep. 1463 (1989), Tresch v. Norwest Bank of Lewistown, 238 M 511, 778 P2d 874, 46 St. Rep. 1459 (1989), and in McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910, 44 St. Rep. 2111 (1987). See also Lachenmaier v. First Bank Sys., Inc., 246 M 26, 803 P2d 614, 47 St. Rep. 2244 (1990).

Commission of Bad Faith Tort Against Depositor by Bank: The District Court did not err in instructing the jury to consider recovery by bank depositor against the bank under bad faith tort principles and to accordingly consider punitive damages. The depositor and his nephew opened a checking account with a card requiring the signatures of both on checks. They then formed a partnership. The nephew induced the bank to change the card so that he could issue checks without the depositor's signature. The bank did not notify the depositor of the change or obtain his authorization for it. The bank told depositor his signature was not needed but did not tell him about the new card, and depositor disagreed. Later the bank told him it would not change its policy of honoring checks signed only by the nephew. When depositor's attorney told bank not to do so, the bank stated the card required only one signature and the bank would not change the card unless both the nephew and the depositor requested it. The bank then told depositor the card was lost but later that day produced both cards. Depositor sued, and the bank subsequently took various negative and detrimental actions against his credit status, refused loans of a type formerly granted, canceled his ready reserve account, and refused to pay several items presented before he was notified that the account had been canceled. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985). See also Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L Ass'n, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986).

Punitive Damages Proper in Action for Breach of Implied Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing and for Negligent Investigation: The plaintiff was properly granted punitive damages for the hospital's breach of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing and for negligence in investigating the charges for which plaintiff was dismissed from employment as a probationary employee. Crenshaw v. Bozeman Deaconess Hosp., 213 M 488, 693 P2d 487, 41 St. Rep. 2251 (1984).

Lender's Failure to Honor Renegotiated Loan Payments: Bank's employee, Johnson, told defendants that their note with the bank would be renegotiated to allow further time for payment. Another employee then refused to renegotiate, and he offset defendants' checking account balance against the note without telling defendants, after defendants told him they had relied on Johnson and would not be able to pay on the note's due date. Several of defendants' checks were then dishonored due to insufficient funds. If a duty to exercise good faith is imposed by law rather than by a contract, breach of the duty is tortious and punitive damages are thus recoverable if the conduct is sufficiently culpable. Here, punitive damages could have been granted on the basis of malice, fraud, oppression, or all three, and a new trial was granted because the judge refused to submit the punitive damages issue to the jury. First Nat'l Bank of Libby v. Twombly, 213 M 66, 689 P2d 1226, 41 St. Rep. 1948 (1984). See also Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L Ass'n, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986), and Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, Inc., 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 964 (1986).

Tort of Breach of Duty to Deal Fairly and in Good Faith in Employment Relationship — Punitive Damages Recoverable: Section 27-1-221 only exempts breach of contract actions from its provisions. Breach of the duty owed to deal fairly and in good faith in the employment relationship is a tort for which punitive damages may be recovered if defendant's conduct is sufficiently culpable. Gates v. Life of Montana, 205 M 304, 668 P2d 213, 40 St. Rep. 1287 (1983).

Reversal of Mislabeled Award — Validity Not Raised in Pleadings: The Supreme Court reversed the District Court award of $3,768.66 in damages related to freight adjustment, which the District Court had mistakenly labeled as invalid trailer charges. The award was improper because under the contract, plaintiff was responsible for the adjustments and because the validity of the charges was not properly raised in the initial or amended pleadings. Koontz v. Sky Country, Inc., 244 M 192, 795 P2d 980, 47 St. Rep. 1490 (1990).

1997 Amendment: Chapter 429 in exception clause inserted "and 27-1-705". Amendment effective on occurrence of contingency.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 429, L. 1997, provided: "WHEREAS, efforts of the Legislature to amend the comparative negligence statute, which is premised on a modified joint and several liability scheme, have repeatedly been struck down by the Montana Supreme Court; and

WHEREAS, the Montana Supreme Court rulings prohibiting the consideration of fault attributable to nonparties impair the effectiveness of the current modified joint and several liability system in Montana; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature intends that the policy of the state should be a system of comparative fault in which persons are held responsible only to the extent to which they cause or contribute to the harm; and

WHEREAS, the current system of joint and several liability, which apportions all liability only among parties to the action, fails to apportion liability among all tortfeasors according to their equitable share of fault; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature recognizes that public policy favors fair settlements that accurately reflect the liability of settled or released parties; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature is concerned with the present inequitable results of solvent defendants having to pay for the liability of insolvent, immune, or settled parties; and

WHEREAS, the present system of joint and several liability for all tort actions does not reflect the state's policy of liability in proportion to fault; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature recognizes that joint and several liability should be retained for certain situations; and

WHEREAS, at least ten other states have abrogated the doctrine of joint and several liability, except for specific situations; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature has the power to alter tort causes of action to promote legitimate state interests.

THEREFORE, the Legislature declares that the doctrine of joint and several liability is abolished, except for specific causes of action, and is replaced with a comparative fault system utilizing the principles of several liability."

Insurers of Uninsured Motorist Not Treated as Joint Tortfeasors for Purposes of Liability: When accident and injury are caused by uninsured motorist, insurance companies providing uninsured motorist coverage to parties involved cannot be held jointly and severally liable because an insurer's relationship to the uninsured motorist is based on contract, not tort. Materialman Not Bound by Owners' Agreement to Share Costs: In an action to foreclose a mechanics' lien (now construction lien), an agreement between the lessors and lessees of the liened property on sharing improvement costs is a matter to be settled only between the lessors and lessees. The contractor was not a party to that contract and is not bound by its terms. Price Bldg. Serv., Inc. v. Holms, 214 M 456, 693 P2d 553, 42 St. Rep. 84 (1985).

Successive Judgments Against Co-obligors: Entry of default judgment against codefendant does not bar entry of subsequent judgment against co-obligor on same obligation where obligation

Guarantor Owes Pro Rata Share: Appellant and four other shareholders in company executed continuing guaranties for promissory notes on behalf of their shared business. Appellant subsequently signed away his share in company and left the business. Although the court considered appellant's equitable defense that he was not liable for his pro rata share of the notes because the other four guarantors personally profited from the sale of the business after appellant departed, he remains liable for his pro rata share. He signed the guaranty knowing the lender could sue him directly on the notes. All five shareholders shared equal liability on the promissory notes, and appellant is required to contribute his one-fifth pro rata share. Citizens St. Bank v. Bossard, 226 M 75, 733 P2d 1296, 44 St. Rep. 468 (1987).

Accommodation Endorsers — Parol Evidence: While it is general rule that where a number of persons successively sign a note, they are prima facie liable in the order in which their names appear even though they are in fact accommodation endorsers, their intention that there should be a joint rather than a successive liability may be inferred from the circumstances, and parol evidence is admissible to show that there was an agreement to that effect. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926).

Relation of Parties: Where the relation of parties is merely that of joint or joint and several obligors, an action at law can be maintained by one party against any one of the others, upon the theory that each of them upon assuming the relation impliedly agreed to contribute to every other such sum as the other should be compelled to pay in his behalf. Croft v. Bain, 49 M 484, 143 P 960 (1914).

Form of Bid Deposit Accepted by Seller's Agent — No Failure to Satisfy Condition Precedent — Specific Performance to Enforce Transfer of Real Property — Summary Judgment Proper: The defendants auctioned off two parcels of land. To qualify to bid on the parcels, a bidder had to make a bid deposit in certified funds or other acceptable funds. The plaintiffs each made a bid deposit accepted by the seller's agent, were the highest bidders on the respective parcels, and afterward executed a buy-sell agreement. However, the defendant sellers later notified the plaintiffs that they would not convey the property to them because the plaintiffs had failed to satisfy the condition precedent to entering into the buy-sell agreement since their bid deposits were not certified funds. The plaintiffs then filed suit seeking specific performance of the agreement. The District Court granted the plaintiffs' summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the form of the bid deposit did not effect a failure of a condition precedent to formation of the contract and affirmed the grant of summary judgment. Case Notes

Condition Precedent — Sick Leave Payout Upon 25 Years of Service — No Compensation Prior to 25 Years of Service: A hospital discontinued a policy whereby it paid employees for their sick leave after 25 years of service. Employees with less than 25 years of service sued the hospital alleging violations of Title 39, ch. 3. The District Court granted the hospital summary judgment, concluding that the policy did not constitute deferred compensation or wages under Montana law. The plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing that the completion of 25 years of service was a condition precedent and therefore the benefit did not accrue until the employee had actually completed 25 years of service. Chipman v. NW. Healthcare Corp., 2014 MT 15, 373 Mont. 360, 317 P.3d 182.

Settlement Agreement — Clearing of Title Not Condition Precedent Under Plain Meaning of Language: The parties entered into a settlement agreement to resolve a dispute over two oil wells. The agreement provided that Summer Night Oil would make payments to Miocene and Miocene would clear its liens against Summer Night's property. Summer Night filed a motion to compel Miocene to clear the liens even though it had not made any payments to Miocene, claiming that the payments to Miocene were conditioned upon Miocene first clearing the liens. Miocene argued that clearing the title was not a condition precedent to Summer Night's payment under the settlement agreement. The District Court agreed with Miocene, as did the Supreme Court on appeal, that under the plain language of the settlement agreement, Summer Night's payments were not conditioned upon Miocene first clearing the liens. Summer Night Oil Co., LLC v. Munoz, 2011 MT 202, 361 Mont. 424, 259 P.3d 778.

Negligence During House Moving — Breach of House Moving Agreement — Remand for Determination of Causation and Damages: Kelly entered an agreement with Hall to move four of Kelly's housing units. Hall agreed to obtain cargo insurance on each unit but did not do so. During the move, two units were damaged, and Kelly filed a claim against Hall's insurer for remuneration. The claim was denied, and the insurer sought a declaratory judgment against both Hall and Kelly. Kelly filed negligence and breach of contract claims against Hall, and Hall counterclaimed for breach of contract against Kelly. The District Court concluded that Kelly failed to establish negligence, that both parties breached the contract, and that neither party could recover against the other. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the finding that Hall breached the contract by failing to obtain cargo insurance and that, based on the presumption against conditions precedent and inconclusive evidence, Kelly also breached the contract and thus could not recover breach of contract damages. However, there was no evidence to rebut Kelly's negligence claim, nor did the District Court address the damages that Hall conceded occurred during the move. Because it was error to find that Kelly failed to establish negligence, the case was remanded for trial on causation and damages. Scottsdale Ins. Co. v. Hall, 2003 MT 188, 316 M 460, 73 P3d 819 (2003).

Five Agreements Constituting Integrated Sales Agreement With Condition Precedent — Overriding Previous Partnership Agreements and Providing for Attorney Fees: Daines argued that of the five agreements executed by the parties, the option agreement should have been read separately and interpreted as an option to buy conferring a privilege but not imposing an obligation and that on that basis, he could not be liable for not completing a purchase agreement. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had properly looked at the five agreements as a whole in interpreting the parties' intent and had correctly concluded that the agreements constituted an integrated sales agreement subject to conditions precedent. The Supreme Court further held that since the five agreements constituted a sales agreement, they superseded the previous partnership agreements. The respondents were not liable for capital contributions as partners, and the default provision in the option agreement providing for attorney fees did apply to the agreement created by all five of the documents executed by the parties. Daines v. Knight, 269 M 320, 888 P2d 904, 52 St. Rep. 8 (1995).

Completion of Survey Not Condition Precedent: Buyer breached buy-sell agreement, claiming he is entitled to rescission because of sellers' refusal to permit a survey of the real property prior to closing of the sale. The court properly held that there is no language in the contract indicating completion of a survey to be a condition precedent to closing. Because the sellers had performed all material conditions precedent, they are entitled to specific performance. Hillstrom v. O'Neil, 226 M 452, 736 P2d 126, 44 St. Rep. 795 (1987).

Default Excused by Failure to Convey Good Title: Defendants were successors in interest by assignment of contract for deed granted by plaintiff to defendants' assignor. The question addressed by the court was whether plaintiff's failure to convey good title excused defendants' default in not tendering a balloon payment, thereby entitling defendants to keep proceeds of defendants' fire insurance policy when the residence was destroyed by fire. The court held that plaintiff's duty to convey title free and clear of a Federal Land Bank mortgage constituted a condition precedent to defendants' balloon payment obligation. It also constituted a concurrent condition unfulfilled by plaintiff. Additionally, under the doctrine of equitable conversion, plaintiff would bear the risk of loss since she could not convey good title. Sharbono v. Darden, 220 M 320, 715 P2d 433, 43 St. Rep. 400 (1986), followed in Stark v. Borner, 226 M 356, 735 P2d 314, 44 St. Rep. 717 (1987) (affirmed in Stark v. Borner, 234 M 254, 762 P2d 857, 45 St. Rep. 1885 (1988)).

Real Estate Sale Conditioned on Approval of Shareholders — No Commission Due: District Court correctly reasoned that buy-sell agreement was a conditional contract containing the condition precedent of full shareholder approval of seller corporation. The condition precedent was never performed, and therefore the payment of broker's commission never became enforceable on the uncompleted sale. ERA Real Estate Home & Ranch Properties v. Big Horn Game Ranch, Inc., 213 M 47, 692 P2d 1218, 41 St. Rep. 1937 (1984).

Sufficiency of Default Notice — Mandatory Finding: Michunovich purchased a tract of land under contract for deed from the Brangers. Michunovich entered a contract for deed to sell a portion of that tract to Owen. Owen fulfilled his part of the contract. Michunovich defaulted on the Branger contract. Brangers filed a breach of contract suit against Michunovich. Michunovich served Owen a notice of termination since he was unable to secure a deed release from Brangers. Michunovich did not refund Owen's downpayment as required by the contract. Owen refused to vacate the property. Michunovich assigned all his interest in the Branger contract to Stevenson with the Brangers' consent. Since Stevenson was able to bring the Branger contract current, the Brangers stipulated to the dismissal of their suit against Michunovich. Owen filed a purchaser's lien on the property under his contract from Michunovich. Stevenson then filed a quiet title action. The trial court found for Stevenson, finding that the notice from Michunovich to Owen terminated that contract so that Owen had no interest in the land. The Supreme Court remanded because according to the terms of the contract the refund of Owen's downpayment was a condition precedent to the contract being declared void. The trial court was instructed to determine whether Stevenson's default notice terminated the Owen contract and to resolve issues regarding rental value and improvements. Stevenson v. Owen, 212 M 287, 687 P2d 1010, 41 St. Rep. 1743 (1984).

Condition of Payment in Commission Contract — "Unless" Condition Held Valid: Where the plaintiff and defendant entered into a commission contract providing that the defendant would not pay any commission to the plaintiff "unless and until" the purchaser of the defendant's property fulfilled its duties under a contract for deed, the District Court did not err in holding that this language created a valid condition precedent for payment of the commission. By using the term "unless", the defendant reserved the right to withhold payment of the commission, and the time contingency, created by the use of the term "until", does not come into play until the condition precedent occurs. Martin v. Community Gas & Oil Co., 205 M 394, 668 P2d 243, 40 St. Rep. 1385 (1983).

Condition as Triggering Contract: A condition precedent is to be performed before the agreement becomes effective. It calls for the happening of an event upon the performance of an act after the parties have agreed to terms. It causes the contract to be binding on the parties. Westmont Tractor Co. v. Viking Exploration, Inc., 543 F. Supp. 1314, 39 St. Rep. 1398 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Documents Incorporated as Contract — Waiver of Condition Precedent: Plaintiff negotiated to sell two-wheel loaders to defendant. The terms of the sale were contained on the purchase order and included a 30-day warranty. Later, a lease agreement covering the same equipment was executed with plaintiff as lessor and defendant as lessee. One of the loaders broke down and required repair. Plaintiff contended the date of the warranty was from the date the purchase order was executed. Defendant refused to pay for the repair, contending the warranty began on the date of the lease agreement. Plaintiff claimed breach and took possession of the loaders. By its own admission, plaintiff conceded that the initial agreement was transformed into the lease agreement. This in effect was a modification of the contract. The terms contained in the purchase order were incorporated into and became part of the lease agreement. The two writings together constituted the final written expression of the agreement. The terms were unambiguous and could not be contradicted by evidence of any prior agreement. Plaintiff was responsible for repair under the warranty provision. Defendant contended refusal to honor this warranty constituted breach of the agreement, while plaintiff contended that a provision for advance payment, not rendered by defendant, was a condition precedent to the formation of the lease contract. The only logical interpretation of the events which transpired was that plaintiff waived the advance payment by delivering the loaders prior to receipt of the payment. Plaintiff could not rely on failure to receive the advance payment in claiming breach of contract under 30-2-706. Defendant was entitled to summary judgment. Westmont Tractor Co. v. Viking Exploration, Inc., 543 F. Supp. 1314, 39 St. Rep. 1398 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Waiver:

A buy-sell agreement contained a clause making the agreement contingent upon the buyer's obtaining a contract for deed for that part of the seller's interest subject to a previous contract for deed. The buyer proceeded to obtain such a contract for deed but upon different terms from those specified in the buy-sell agreement. Assuming that contingency clause created a condition precedent, the buyer's acceptance of different terms resulted in a waiver of any right to rely on the contingency clause. Wendy's of Mont. v. Larsen, 196 M 525, 640 P2d 464, 39 St. Rep. 299 (1982).

A clause in a water well drilling contract providing that the contract was not valid unless approved by the FHA made approval a condition precedent. However, the condition was waived by drilling and payment. Hein v. Fox, 126 M 514, 254 P2d 1076 (1953).

Buy-Sell Agreement: A buy-sell agreement contained a clause stating that the agreement was contingent upon the buyer's obtaining a contract for deed for that part of the seller's interest subject to a previous contract for deed. This clause may have been a necessary prerequisite to closing the transaction but was not a condition precedent whose lack of performance required the return of earnest money. Wendy's of Mont. v. Larsen, 196 M 525, 640 P2d 464, 39 St. Rep. 299 (1982).

Specified Time of Performance — Nonperformance of Condition Precedent: Contract farmer and landowner orally agreed that farmer would seed landowner's land between August 25 and September 20, with the condition that landowner would help farmer with the downpayment on drills needed for seeding. The help with the downpayment was a condition precedent that had to be performed by landowner before farmer was bound to the time frame in the contract. When landowner did not help with the downpayment, farmer was relieved of his obligation to meet the contract performance dates and the contract was to be performed within a reasonable time. Weyler v. Kaufman, 196 M 132, 638 P2d 393, 38 St. Rep. 2197 (1981).

Condition Precedent — Fulfillment Required: Before any party to an obligation can require another party to perform any act under it, he must fulfill all conditions precedent thereto imposed upon himself and must be able and offer to fulfill all conditions concurrent so imposed upon him of the like fulfillment by the other party except as provided by 28-1-407. Management, Inc. v. Mastersons, Inc., 189 M 435, 616 P2d 356, 37 St. Rep. 1601 (1980).

Offer Subject to Financing — Condition Precedent: The District Court properly found that the failure to obtain the necessary financing for the purchase from Empire Federal Savings and Loan in Livingston rendered the contract a nullity. The provision is specific that the offer is subject to such financing and, as such, a condition precedent. Under the circumstances, the efforts to obtain financing were reasonable. Management, Inc. v. Mastersons, Inc., 189 M 435, 616 P2d 356, 37 St. Rep. 1601 (1980).

Franchise Agreement: The court decided that duties of a franchisor by necessary implication were conditions precedent if construing them as covenants or concurrent duties would leave a franchisee without an adequate remedy for a breach of those obligations by franchisor. United Campgrounds, U.S.A. v. Stevenson, 175 M 17, 571 P2d 1161 (1977).

Lease Agreement: Lease terminable by either party upon 10 days' notice does not impose a condition precedent, performance of which must be alleged in plaintiff's complaint, but a condition subsequent which terminates the obligations of the parties to the lease. McEwen v. Big Sky of Mont., Inc., 169 M 141, 545 P2d 665 (1976).

Condition Precedent to Be Alleged and Proved:

In an action for an accounting based on a lease and management agreement by which defendant turned over his sheep ranch, farm machinery, and sheep to plaintiffs, who were required to build fences, plant hay and grain crops, care for the sheep, and perform other similar duties before they would become entitled to their share of the revenue from the sale of lambs and wool, the requirements were conditions precedent, and to state a cause of action on a contract of this nature, plaintiffs were required to allege performance under this contract or set forth facts excusing failure to perform. First Nat'l Bank of White Sulphur Springs v. Stoyanoff, 137 M 20, 349 P2d 1016 (1960).

Where the right of recovery is dependent upon happening of a condition precedent or of a future event, the happening of the condition or contingency must be alleged and proved; otherwise, the conditions agreed to between the parties would be nullified, a new contract would be made for them by the court, and the defendant's obligation and plaintiff's right would have accrued without reference to the express terms of the agreement. Binzel v. Viehmann, 111 M 6, 106 P2d 187 (1940).

Where right of recovery is dependent upon happening of the condition precedent, the happening of the condition must be alleged. Broat Lumber Co. v. Van Houten, 66 M 478, 213 P 1116 (1923).

Abandonment of Contract: Where written contract was clear and explicit and neither party performed his part of the contract but acted contrary to terms of contract pursuant to a subsequent oral agreement, there was an abandonment of the original contract. Eggers v. Gen. Refrigerating Co., 123 M 205, 210 P2d 636 (1949).

Condition Performed Before Agreement Becomes Effective: A "condition precedent" is one that is to be performed before the agreement becomes effective, and which calls for the happening of some event or the performance of an act after the terms thereof have been agreed upon, before the contract shall be binding on the parties. Atlantic-Pacific Oil Co. of Mont. v. Gas Dev. Co., 105 M 1, 69 P2d 750 (1937).

Performance Precedent to Payment: Under a building contract providing that final payment should be made only upon the production of satisfactory proof that there were no claims or liens against the building, the performance of the condition is precedent to the right of payment. Franklin v. Schultz, 23 M 165, 57 P 1037 (1899).

Case Notes

Agreement to Sign Land Development Plan After Sale of Land Not Mutually Dependent Concurrent Obligation With Agreement for Sale of Land: Paragraph 4 of a buy/sell agreement provided that defendant would buy land from plaintiffs. Paragraph 5 provided that "[w]ithin 30 days of the closing of this sale", plaintiffs and defendant would enter into an agreement to develop the land. The two paragraphs were not mutually dependent concurrent obligations. Paragraph 4 had to be complied with before paragraph 5 had to be complied with, paragraph 5 was dependent upon the performance of paragraph 4, and paragraph 5 was void if paragraph 4 was not complied with. Defendant failed to make the downpayment and to sign the contract for deed required by paragraph 4, which were material breaches permitting plaintiffs to suspend performance under paragraph 5. The lower court erred by ruling that the parties mutually breached the two paragraphs when plaintiffs refused to perform under paragraph 5 because defendant had not yet performed under paragraph 4. King Resources, Inc. v. Oliver, 2002 MT 301, 313 M 17, 59 P3d 1172 (2002), followed, with regard to performance under a construction contract, in James Talcott Constr., Inc. v. P&D Land Enterprises, 2006 MT 188, 333 M 107, 141 P3d 1200 (2006).

Default Excused by Failure to Convey Good Title: Defendants were successors in interest by assignment of contract for deed granted by plaintiff to defendants' assignor. The question addressed by the court was whether plaintiff's failure to convey good title excused defendants' default in not tendering a balloon payment, thereby entitling defendants to keep proceeds of defendants' fire insurance policy when the residence was destroyed by fire. The court held that plaintiff's duty to convey title free and clear of a Federal Land Bank mortgage constituted a condition precedent to defendants' balloon payment obligation. It also constituted a concurrent condition unfulfilled by plaintiff. Additionally, under the doctrine of equitable conversion, plaintiff would bear the risk of loss since she could not convey good title. Sharbono v. Darden, 220 M 320, 715 P2d 433, 43 St. Rep. 400 (1986), followed in Stark v. Borner, 226 M 356, 735 P2d 314, 44 St. Rep. 717 (1987) (affirmed in Stark v. Borner, 234 M 254, 762 P2d 857, 45 St. Rep. 1885 (1988)).

Delivery and Payment for Chattels: Where delivery of chattels and payment for them were to be concurrent, plaintiff in his action for breach of contract was required to show an offer and ability to pay for and receive them at the place of delivery before he could put defendant in default. Weatherman v. Reid, 62 M 522, 205 P 251 (1922).

Sale of Land: One who has agreed to convey land when he has acquired title to it cannot terminate the contract without tendering a conveyance, or at least accompanying the demand for payment with an offer to convey. The obligation to convey being concurrent with the obligation to pay, the right to terminate the contract does not arise until the vendor has acquired title and tendered or offered a conveyance. Milwaukee Land Co. v. Ruesink, 50 M 489, 148 P 396 (1915).

Engagement Ring Given in Contemplation of Marriage Not Considered Gift — Conditional Gift Analysis: Albinger gave Harris a $29,000 diamond engagement ring when the two promised to marry. The relationship was strained, resulting in breakups and the return of the ring to Albinger several times, but each time the couple reconciled, and the ring was returned to Harris. Following their final separation, Albinger told Harris to "take the car, the horse, the dog, and the ring", so Harris moved to Kentucky, marriage plans evaporated, and Harris refused to return the ring. Albinger filed in District Court to settle ownership of the ring. The District Court found the ring to be a gift in contemplation of marriage, implying that the existence of a condition attached to the gift, and held that Albinger was entitled to return of the ring upon failure of the condition of marriage. Harris appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The rights and duties of parties regarding property exchanges in contemplation of marriage are determined by existing law and common-law principles. A gift is a transfer of personal property made voluntarily and without consideration, and the essential elements of an inter vivos gift are donative intent, voluntary delivery, and acceptance by the recipient. Delivery, which manifests the intent of the giver, must turn over dominion and control of the property to the recipient, and when made without condition, such a gift becomes irrevocable upon acceptance, so the Supreme Court will not void the transfer when the giver experiences a change of heart. The only revocable gift recognized under Montana law is a gift in view of death, and a gift causa mortis may be revoked by the giver at any time and is revoked by the giver's recovery from the illness or escape from the peril under which the gift was made. However, the Supreme Court declined to analogize gifts in contemplation of marriage with a gift in contemplation of death. Further, a purported gift that is part of the inducement for an agreement to do or not do a certain thing becomes the consideration essential to contract formation. An exchange of promises creates a contract to marry, albeit an unenforceable one, so when an engagement ring is given as consideration for the promise to marry, a contract is formed and legal action to recover the ring is barred by the abolition of breach of promise actions in 27-1-602. Here, the engagement ring was an unconditional, completed gift upon acceptance, and a completed gift is not revocable. Thus, the ring remained in Harris's ownership and control. Albinger v. Harris, 2002 MT 118, 310 M 27, 48 P3d 711 (2002).

Lease Agreement: Lease terminable by either party upon 10 days' notice does not impose a condition precedent performance of which must be alleged in plaintiff's complaint, but a condition subsequent which terminates the obligations of the parties to the lease. McEwen v. Big Sky of Mont., Inc., 169 M 141, 545 P2d 665 (1976).

Operation of Condition Subsequent Upon Estate: A "condition subsequent" operates upon the estate already created and vested, rendering it liable to be defeated if the condition is broken. Atlantic-Pacific Oil Co. of Mont. v. Gas Dev. Co., 105 M 1, 69 P2d 750 (1937).

Case Notes

Failure to Give Notice of Deficient Performance — Summary Judgment Burdens: Plaintiff alleged it had performed and was entitled to payment under a contract. Defendant answered that plaintiff had performed deficiently and that defendant had not breached the contract and owed no money under it. Since the contract required defendant to notify plaintiff of deficient performance, whether notice was given was crucial to each party's case. Defendant's answer raised the genuine issue of material fact as to whether defendant gave notice of deficiency, so that when plaintiff moved for summary judgment, plaintiff had the initial burden of offering evidence establishing the absence of notice. Statements of plaintiff's attorney that no notice had been given did not meet this burden; therefore, the burden to show that notice had been given did not shift to defendant and the court committed reversible error when it: (1) placed that burden on defendant; (2) granted plaintiff summary judgment for failure of defendant to carry the burden; and (3) refused defendant's motion for alteration or amendment of the judgment. However, defendant could have avoided an unnecessary appeal by filing affidavits or other evidence showing that defendant had given notice and that a genuine issue of material fact thus existed. Brinkman & Lenon v. P&D Land Enterprises, 263 M 238, 867 P2d 1112, 51 St. Rep. 36 (1994).

Suspension of Performance Upon Material Breach of Contract: As part of a contract for sale of real property, seller agreed to obtain release of mortgage within 1 year, and failure to do so constituted a material breach entitling buyer to suspend performance. Sjoberg v. Kravik, 233 M 33, 759 P2d 966, 45 St. Rep. 1270 (1988).

Prior Breach by Plaintiff as Bar to Enforcement of Contract: The general rule is that a party committing a substantial breach of a contract cannot maintain an action against the other contracting party or his predecessor in interest for a subsequent failure to perform if the promises are dependent. A substantial or material breach is one which touches the fundamental purposes of the contract and defeats the object of the parties in making the contract. Malloy v. Judge's Foster Home Program, Inc., 229 M 317, 746 P2d 1073, 44 St. Rep. 1996 (1987); Rogers v. Relyea, 184 M 1, 601 P2d 37 (1979).

Sufficiency of Default Notice — Mandatory Finding: Michunovich purchased a tract of land under contract for deed from the Brangers. Michunovich entered a contract for deed to sell a portion of that tract to Owen. Owen fulfilled his part of the contract. Michunovich defaulted on the Branger contract. Brangers filed a breach of contract suit against Michunovich. Michunovich served Owen a notice of termination since he was unable to secure a deed release from Brangers. Michunovich did not refund Owen's downpayment as required by the contract. Owen refused to vacate the property. Michunovich assigned all his interest in the Branger contract to Stevenson with the Brangers' consent. Since Stevenson was able to bring the Branger contract current, the Brangers stipulated to the dismissal of their suit against Michunovich. Owen filed a purchaser's lien on the property under his contract from Michunovich. Stevenson then filed a quiet title action. The trial court found for Stevenson, finding that the notice from Michunovich to Owen terminated that contract so that Owen had no interest in the land. The Supreme Court remanded because according to the terms of the contract the refund of Owen's downpayment was a condition precedent to the contract being declared void. The trial court was instructed to determine whether Stevenson's default notice terminated the Owen contract and to resolve issues regarding rental value and improvements. Stevenson v. Owen, 212 M 287, 687 P2d 1010, 41 St. Rep. 1743 (1984).

Real Estate Listing — Time Limits Binding: Defendant entered a real estate listing agreement with plaintiff. The agreement was entered June 25, 1979, and was to expire June 25, 1980, with a 180-day grace period for a buyer put in contact with the seller by the realtor. This period ended December 22, 1980. On October 23, 1979, defendant entered a buy-sell agreement with the Gerhardts, who were shown the ranch by a realtor affiliated with the defendant. The agreement was contingent on the Gerhardts' selling their ranch. The Gerhardts occupied defendant's ranch as tenants. Gerhardts were not able to sell their ranch until December 31, 1980, and on January 29, 1981, they bought defendant's ranch. Defendant refused to pay the real estate commission, and this suit followed. It is a generally accepted rule that a buyer is financially "able" only when he can command the necessary funds to complete the purchase within the time allowed by the offer. Here, the buyers were not able to purchase until they sold their ranch. Courts have generally strictly followed the time limits in listing agreements. An exception may occur if surrounding circumstances indicate the time provisions were waived by the parties or if the seller interfered with the sale. Nothing in this case suggests either, and judgment for the defendant was affirmed. Property Brokers, Inc. v. Loyning, 201 M 309, 654 P2d 521, 39 St. Rep. 2128 (1982). See also WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995), distinguishing Snyder v. Schram, 547 P2d 102 (Oreg. 1976).

Specific Performance — Failure to Tender Purchase Price — Excuse: Plaintiff and defendants entered into a buy-sell agreement for a parcel of land. The agreement was prepared by defendants' real estate agent. The agreement failed to note a 60-foot roadway and utility easement. Defendants in the meantime sold an adjoining parcel of land, including an interest in the 60-foot easement. Plaintiff sued for specific performance of the buy-sell agreement. Plaintiff was excused from tendering the purchase price because defendants by selling the adjoining parcel subject to the easement indicated their refusal and inability to perform the agreement. Plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of that part of the agreement defendants are now able to convey, notwithstanding that it is the very same title plaintiff refused to accept in the first instance. Chadwick v. Giberson, 190 M 88, 618 P2d 1213, 37 St. Rep. 1723 (1980).

Performance of Conditions Precedent to Be Alleged: In an action for an accounting based on a lease and management agreement by which defendant turned over his sheep ranch, farm machinery, and sheep to plaintiffs, who were required to build fences, plant hay and grain crops, care for the sheep, and perform other similar duties before they would become entitled to their share of the revenue from the sale of lambs and wool, the requirements were conditions precedent, and to state a cause of action on a contract of this nature, plaintiffs were required to allege performance under this contract or set forth facts excusing failure to perform. First Nat'l Bank of White Sulphur Springs v. Stoyanoff, 137 M 20, 349 P2d 1016 (1960).

Abandonment of Contract: Where written contract was clear and explicit and neither party performed his part of the contract but acted contrary to terms of contract pursuant to a subsequent oral agreement, there was an abandonment of the original contract. Eggers v. Gen. Refrigerating Co., 123 M 205, 210 P2d 636 (1949).

Sale of Corporate Stock:

If agreement relating to sale of corporate stock gave purchaser an option to return it on becoming dissatisfied with his bargain, return of it was a condition precedent to his right to maintain an action to recover the purchase price paid, and defendant in such an action could invoke the doctrine of waiver and estoppel because of plaintiff's retention of dividends paid on the stock after the accrual of his right to return it. Peterson v. Nelson, 77 M 539, 252 P 368 (1926).

Complaint in action to recover purchase price of corporate stock based on contract for its redelivery and payment of the price paid within a specified time is insufficient where the concurrent condition of redelivery is not alleged. Porter v. Plymouth Gold Min. Co., 29 M 347, 74 P 938 (1904).

Pleading: Where the right of recovery is dependent upon happening of condition precedent, the happening of the condition must be alleged. Broat Lumber Co. v. Van Houten, 66 M 478, 213 P 1116 (1923).

Sale of Real Property: In an action to cancel contract for sale of real estate and forfeit the downpayment, the condition that plaintiffs should secure authority from probate court to execute the deed and make delivery of it to the defendant within a reasonable time, was a condition precedent to putting defendant in default. Henderson v. Daniels, 62 M 363, 205 P 964 (1922), overruled on another point by Thelen v. Vogel, 86 M 33, 281 P 753 (1929).

Valid Defense: A right dependent on a condition precedent does not accrue unless or until the condition is performed. It is a valid defense in a contract action to show that the obligation to perform was based on a condition which was not complied with. White v. Hulls, 59 M 98, 195 P 850 (1921).

Delivery of Grain: Where delivery of a carload of oats and payment therefor were to be concurrent at shipping point, the buyer was required, in his action for breach of the contract of sale, to show an offer and ability to pay at that point. Jenderson v. Hansen, 50 M 216, 146 P 473 (1915).

Specific Performance — Failure to Tender Purchase Price — Excuse: Plaintiff and defendants entered into a buy-sell agreement for a parcel of land. The agreement was prepared by defendants' real estate agent. The agreement failed to note a 60-foot roadway and utility easement. Defendants in the meantime sold an adjoining parcel of land, including an interest in the 60-foot easement. Plaintiff sued for specific performance of the buy-sell agreement. Plaintiff was excused from tendering the purchase price because defendants by selling the adjoining parcel subject to the easement indicated their refusal and inability to perform the agreement. Plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of that part of the agreement defendants are now able to convey, notwithstanding that it is the very same title plaintiff refused to accept in the first instance. Chadwick v. Giberson, 190 M 88, 618 P2d 1213, 37 St. Rep. 1723 (1980).

Condition Precedent: Before any party to an obligation can require another party to perform any act under it, he must fulfill all conditions precedent thereto imposed upon himself and must be able and offer to fulfill all conditions concurrent imposed upon him by their fulfillment by the other party except as provided by this section. Management, Inc. v. Mastersons, Inc., 189 M 435, 616 P2d 356, 37 St. Rep. 1601 (1980).

Obligation to Make Payments Under Mining Agreement When Escrow Not Established: In a mining agreement with an option to purchase, the covenant to establish escrow was a material part of the contract and a condition precedent to the plaintiff's obligation to make payments. Although the plaintiff knew escrow had not been established, he did not waive the requirement, and the defendant defaulted first when he refused to establish escrow. Therefore, the defendant could not enforce the making of payments. Rogers v. Relyea, 184 M 1, 601 P2d 37 (1979).

Waiver: A party entitled to performance of a condition precedent may waive the condition either expressly or by his actions. Fed. Sur. Co. v. Basin Constr. Co., 91 M 114, 5 P2d 775 (1931). See also Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965).

Case Notes

Show of Prejudice From Untimely Notice Required to Deny Coverage: The plaintiff filed an action for a declaratory judgment that it was not required to defend under a commercial general liability policy its insured that had entered into an agreement with a third party. The plaintiff argued that the policy required the insured to provide timely notice of a claim, which the insured did not. The federal District Court held that the plaintiff was excused from defending because of the insured's failure to provide timely notice of a claim. The case was appealed to the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, which certified the question of whether an insurer must show prejudice from the lack of notice in order to deny a claim. The Supreme Court held that an insurer must prove that it suffered prejudice in order to deny coverage. Atlantic Casualty Ins. Co. v. Greytak, 2015 MT 149, 379 Mont. 332, 350 P.3d 63.

Waiver of Contract Rights — Late Payments Not Considered Breach Based on Prior Acceptance: The uninsured employers' fund (UEF) sought indemnity from an employer that did not have workers' compensation insurance using a monthly payment arrangement that was agreed to by the parties. The UEF accepted four late payments before turning the employer over to collections, at which point the employer sued UEF for breach of contract. The Supreme Court held that UEF waived its right to terminate the contract based on late payment when it accepted late payments without objection. Consequently, it was a breach of contract for the UEF to turn the employer over to collections and the employer was entitled to damages. Elk Mtn. Motor Sports, Inc. v. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2012 MT 261, 367 Mont. 36, 289 P.3d 165.

Coordination of Habendum and Pugh Clauses in Oil and Gas Lease — Shut-In Gas Well Considered Producing Well for Lease Purposes — Lease Extended on Section With Producing Well, Terminated on Undeveloped Sections for Lack of Timely Rental Payments: Plaintiff's oil and gas leases had habendum clauses, which provided that the primary leases would be extended as long as oil or gas was produced or drilling operations continued on any of the leased property, and Pugh clauses, which provided that production would not serve to extend the primary term of a lease unless the lessee paid an annual per-acre rental fee prior to the end of the primary term. By the end of the primary term, plaintiff had only one shut-in well developed on the leasehold. Depending on the habendum clauses, plaintiff concluded that there was not a producing well on the leasehold, so the Pugh clauses did not take effect and rental payments were not required. Depending on the Pugh clauses, defendants concluded that because there were no producing wells on the leasehold and because the rental fee on the shut-in well was 2 days late, all of plaintiff's leases were canceled. In reconciling the clauses, the District Court correctly found that: (1) the Pugh clauses required that rental payments be paid on or before the expiration of the primary term in order to extend leases on undeveloped sections; and (2) because time is of the essence in oil and gas leases and plaintiff did not pay timely rental, the leases expired by their own terms on all sections except the section containing the shut-in well, which was considered a producing well, and that lease would continue under the habendum clause as long as plaintiff used reasonable diligence in marketing the gas. Sandtana, Inc. v. Wallin Ranch Co., 2003 MT 329, 318 M 369, 80 P3d 1224 (2003).

Forfeiture — Affirmative Defense: Forfeiture is an affirmative defense and must be pleaded in the defendant's answer to a complaint. It will not be considered for the first time on appeal. Massar Cattle Co. v. Reese, 216 M 22, 699 P2d 87, 42 St. Rep. 609 (1985).

Gross Negligence in Failure to Perform — No Relief From Forfeiture: The seller of real property is entitled to cancellation of a contract for deed. The purchasers are not entitled to any equitable relief from forfeiture because they were grossly negligent in failing to perform in accordance with the terms and provisions of the contract. Redinger v. French, 216 M 16, 699 P2d 94, 42 St. Rep. 604 (1985).

Buy-Sell Agreement: A buy-sell agreement contained an earnest money forfeiture clause and a clause making the agreement contingent upon the buyer's obtaining a contract for deed for that part of the seller's interest subject to a previous contract for deed. As the latter clause was not a condition precedent whose lack of performance required the return of the earnest money, the forfeiture clause was upheld. Wendy's of Mont. v. Larsen, 196 M 525, 640 P2d 464, 39 St. Rep. 299 (1982).

Waiver of Default — Limit of Scope: Though after a default by purchaser, vendor accepted sums due and performed according to the contract, such action does not constitute a total waiver of default provisions. Following Suburban Homes Co. v. North, 50 M 108, 145 P 5 (1914), such a waiver does not compel vendor to keep contract open indefinitely; on the contrary, the vendor waives the right to forfeit only for the time being and may terminate the contract after purchaser is given suitable notice and a reasonable time to pay. Mont. Williams Double Diamond v. Royal Village, Inc., 186 M 359, 607 P2d 1120 (1980).

Interest in Insurance Proceeds — Issue of Law — Implied Waiver of Default Provision: Summary judgment was improperly granted when the record disclosed, as a matter of law, that plaintiff had a possessory interest in a building on the property in dispute at time of destruction by fire, giving plaintiff a corresponding right to the insurance proceeds less the unpaid balance of the purchase price. This result was based on an implied waiver of a contract default provision by defendant county's failure to timely repossess. Hansen v. Transamerica Ins. Co., 175 M 273, 573 P2d 663 (1978).

Forfeiture Improper: Interpreting the forfeiture clause of a mine sale contract against plaintiffs, the parties for whose benefit the provision was created, it can hardly be said that the contract requires forfeiture for failure to produce 300 yards of material each working day. The appropriate remedy is an award of damages for breach of contract, even though not requested in the pleadings. Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977).

Assignment of Lease: Under lease providing that lessee would not assign lease without consent of lessor, and that sale of more than 50% of the stock would be considered an assignment, no violation of lease occurred where lessor had consented to sale of stock in one instance, and such stock was then pledged as security for a loan, which security was then surrendered for the payment of the loan. Such surrender was by operation of law, and provision restraining assignment of lease includes only voluntary assignments and is not operative against an assignment effected by law. Lipsker v. Billings Boot Shop, 129 M 420, 288 P2d 660 (1955).

Strict Interpretation Against Benefited Party: This section requires a condition involving a forfeiture to be strictly interpreted against the party for whose benefit it is created, and trial court erred in declaring a forfeiture of the drilling agreement between a lessee of oil and gas and an operator, for failure to find a market for plaintiff's share of the gas produced by defendant operator. Cedar Oil & Gas Co. v. Archer, 112 M 477, 117 P2d 265 (1941).

Sufficiency of Allegations to Sustain Action on Forfeiture: Where purchaser of farm land, under contract which made time of the essence and provided that in case of default in payment the purchaser should forfeit his right to possession and all payments made as liquidated damages, remained in possession for 10 years without any complaint, and then finding himself unable by reason of conditions beyond his control to meet the final payment, notified vendor of his inability to make payment and of his desire to surrender the land, whereupon the contract was declared forfeited, his complaint in his action to be relieved of the forfeiture, asking recovery of difference between payments made by him under the contract, with taxes, insurance, cost of improvements made by him, etc., and rental value of property, was held insufficient to state facts which appeal to the conscience of a court of equity and therefore insufficient to state a cause of action under 28-1-104. Estabrook v. Sonstelie, 86 M 435, 284 P 147 (1930).

Forfeiture Favored in Oil and Gas Leases: While generally speaking forfeitures are not favored in the law, in the case of an oil and gas lease, forfeiture is favored rather than frowned upon because of injury that may result to lessor from delay, where it clearly appears that lessee has failed to commence operations within the time stipulated or thereafter neglected to prosecute such operations with diligence. Solberg v. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co., 76 M 254, 246 P 168 (1926).

Intention of Parties: In order to provide for a forfeiture there must be a plainly expressed intention by parties that the language employed is to have that effect. Finley v. School District, 51 M 411, 153 P 1010 (1915).

Enforcement of Agricultural Lien Following Sale or Transfer of Farm Products — Assignment of Inchoate or Unperfected Lien Interests Allowed: A crop of sugar beets was sold, and a pesticide sprayer that held an agricultural lien sought to enforce the lien after the sale. Plaintiff bank also held a secured interest on the proceeds of the crop. The buyer issued checks made payable jointly to the bank and the sprayer, honoring the agricultural lien, and the lienholder's unconditioned negotiation of the check acknowledged satisfaction and release of its lien. The bank asserted that, not being an agricultural supplier, the sprayer had no right to file the lien and further contended that because inchoate or unperfected liens are not assignable, any argument that the supplier had assigned its lien right to the sprayer must fail as a matter of law. The sprayer argued that the supplier was clearly eligible to file an agricultural lien and that all actions taken by the sprayer were taken in an agency capacity for the supplier, as indicated in the lien filing, so the payment was not an assignment. Alternatively, the sprayer contended that the transaction was a pass-through between related entities constituting a limited assignment for collection purposes only and that even if the bank's evidence was sufficient to demonstrate that the transaction was a full assignment supported by consideration, inchoate lien interests are nonetheless assignable. The Supreme Court concluded that the dispute was best resolved on the issue of the assignability of inchoate lien interests, noting that generally property of any kind may be transferred, that a right arising out of an obligation is the property of the person to whom it is due and may be transferred, and that Montana's general policy supports the free assignability of rights and obligations stemming from contractual obligations. An agricultural lien is a security and ought to follow the debt or contract to which it pertains, and the free assignability of the right to perfect an agricultural lien comports with lien statutes as well as modern business practices. Thus, even though the supplier's lien was not yet perfected when transferred to the sprayer, it was assignable, and the sprayer validly proceeded to perfect and enforce the lien and was entitled to funds in the amount stipulated by the parties as payment for the chemicals sold by the supplier to the farm and applied by the sprayer and was entitled to the interest on the funds to be credited on that sum. Stockman Bank of Mont. v. Mon-Kota, Inc., 2008 MT 74, 342 M 115, 180 P3d 1125 (2008).

Assignment Not Prohibited by Contract — Mineral Development Contract Not So Personal or Unique as to Preclude Assignment: A contract for the development of a mineral interest did not prohibit assignment or delegation. Despite this fact, appellants pointed out that an exception to the general rule (that rights arising under a contract are generally assignable unless prohibited by the contract) exists when the contract is personal in nature and an assignment would deprive a party of the benefit of his bargain. The Supreme Court acknowledged this exception but found that the duties imposed by the agreement were not so unique in the industry as to involve a degree of trust and confidence singularly personal to the contracting parties. Somont Oil, Inc. v. Nutter, 228 M 467, 743 P2d 1016, 44 St. Rep. 1685 (1987).

Ambiguous Assignment — Construction of Document as a Whole: Peterson sold property to the Blairs under a contract for deed that reserved one-half the mineral rights in Peterson. Peterson then assigned her rights under the contract to Hopkins. The Blairs paid Hopkins and recorded. Peterson sued Hopkins to quiet title when the lessee of Peterson's one-half mineral rights claimed Peterson had assigned them to Hopkins by mistake. Hopkins was granted summary judgment because the assignment conveyed all of Peterson's right, title, and interest in the property, together with the contract for deed. The judgment was reversed, and judgment was granted Peterson. The assignment stated that it was subject to the contract for deed, thus creating an ambiguity. Taken as a whole, it appeared that the assignment was of the contract for deed and was not itself a deed of the entire surface and mineral interests to Hopkins. This was supported by the conduct of the parties, for Peterson leased her reserved interest for the 22 years following the assignment until lessee raised the alleged mistake, and at no time up to his death in the 17th year of the 22 years did Hopkins claim all the mineral rights or demand Peterson's one-half interest. Peterson v. Hopkins, 210 M 429, 684 P2d 1061, 41 St. Rep. 1140 (1984).

Ambiguous Assignment — Explanatory Evidence Admissible: A contract for deed reserved one-half the mineral rights in seller. Seller's subsequent assignment was ambiguous where it assigned all of seller's right, title, and interest in the property, together with the contract for deed, yet also stated that it was subject to the contract for deed. Therefore, the evidence was admissible to explain the ambiguity and the intent of seller and assignee of seller's rights under the contract for deed. Peterson v. Hopkins, 210 M 429, 684 P2d 1061, 41 St. Rep. 1140 (1984).

Assignor Not Liable for Breach by Debtor: Plaintiffs, tribal members, obtained a loan from the Blackfeet Tribe. Plaintiffs defaulted, and the tribe obtained a judgment in tribal court. The tribe filed notice with the Clerk and Recorder and the District Court. Plaintiffs agreed to sell their ranch to Robertson and to provide title insurance. A portion of the purchase price was placed in escrow to cover the amount owing the tribe. The escrow agreement contained a provision assigning pasturage fees to which plaintiffs were entitled to Robertson. Plaintiffs later filed suit against the tribe and Robertson. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that it is an established rule of contract law that the assignor does not guarantee that the obligor will pay and that the assignor is not liable to the assignee for breaches of the assignment by the debtor. Robertson could not recover pasturage fees from the plaintiffs, because plaintiffs did not owe them. Wippert v. Blackfeet Tribe, 201 M 299, 654 P2d 512, 39 St. Rep. 2117 (1982), overruled in part on other grounds by Green v. Gerber, 2013 MT 35, 369 Mont. 20, 303 P.3d 729.

Option Agreement — Sufficiency of Consent and Consideration: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that the writing involved was not an option agreement because it failed to meet the essential requirements for the validity of a contract. In particular, he contended that there was a lack of consent and that the consideration was legally insufficient. The Supreme Court found the actual payment of $1 and actual participation in a family corporate dissolution sufficient consideration for the agreement. A memorandum here acted as an offer, and a binding agreement resulted from action on that offer by the offeree. The trial court was affirmed. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981).

Guarantor Owes Pro Rata Share: Appellant and four other shareholders in company executed continuing guaranties for promissory notes on behalf of their shared business. Appellant subsequently signed away his share in company and left the business. Although the court considered appellant's equitable defense that he was not liable for his pro rata share of the notes because the other four guarantors personally profited from the sale of the business after appellant departed, he remains liable for his pro rata share. He signed the guaranty knowing the lender could sue him directly on the notes. All five shareholders shared equal liability on the promissory notes, and appellant is required to contribute his one-fifth pro rata share. Citizens St. Bank v. Cattle Feeding and Sale — Complete Breach of Nonseverable Contract: A joint venture was formed, the contract contemplating the feeding of cattle by one party until 80% graded "choice", followed by sale and splitting of the proceeds with the supplier of the cattle, who was the second party. When cattle prices dropped, the feeder lost his financing and defaulted on the contract. The agreement was entire and nonseverable. Having failed in the complete performance of the contract, the feeder could not recover under it. Restitution to the feeder of his expenses before default would have to be based on implied contract theory. In order for a claim of restitution to lie, there must be no willful or intentional departure from the contract, and the defects in performance must not pervade the whole or be so essential that the object which the parties intended to accomplish is not accomplished. The feeder could not recover his prior expenses because a party who has completely breached an entire, nonseverable contract, without justification or excuse, may not recover for any performance rendered prior to the breach. On the contrary, a counterclaim against the feeder for damages was upheld. Roundup Cattle Feeders v. Horpestad, 184 M 480, 603 P2d 1044 (1979), distinguishing Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

Defaulting Party's Right to Accounting — Contract Entire or Divisible: To determine whether or not a party defaulting on a contract is entitled to an accounting (either contractually or equitably), it must be determined first whether the contract was entire or severable. This depends very largely on contractual terms and on the intention of the parties disclosed by those terms. As a general rule, a contract is entire when by its terms, nature, and purpose it contemplates and intends that each and all of its parts are interdependent and common to one another and to the consideration. A contract contemplating the feeding of cattle by one party until 80% graded "choice", followed by sale and splitting of the proceeds with the supplier of the cattle, was held clearly intended to be entire and nonseverable. The feeder's default and abandonment completely frustrated the purpose, intent, and terms of the joint venture agreement. The feeder thereby forfeited any right it may have had to an accounting under the contract. When the joint venture was destroyed by abandonment by one of the joint venturers, equity would not compel an accounting because a wrongdoer may not take advantage of his own wrong. Roundup Cattle Feeders v. Horpestad, 184 M 480, 603 P2d 1044 (1979), distinguishing Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

Election of Remedies:

A contractor may, on breach of contract by other party by refusal to make payment due during progress of work, discontinue work and elect either to sue upon contract to recover damages for its breach, or ignore the contract and bring action on quantum meruit. When he pursues the former remedy he is entitled to recover the entire amount due at time of default, including percentages reserved on previous estimates, with interest, from date on which contract was breached. Clifton-Applegate-Toole v. Big Lake Drain District, 82 M 312, 267 P 207 (1928).

One charging wrongful interference with contract by other party thereto can treat wrongful act as a breach and sue for damages (difference between contract price and cost to him of doing work) or treat contract as ended and sue on quantum meruit for work already done. McFarland v. Welch, 48 M 196, 136 P 394 (1913).

Retention of Benefits From Work Done: Where defendant's retention of benefits from work done under the partial performance of a contract to plow and sow land with wheat was not voluntary, he was not liable for the work done. Waite v. Shoemaker & Co., 50 M 264, 146 P 736 (1915).

Defendant Not Allowed to Characterize Damages: Shilhaneks were injured in a vehicle accident, and defendants were ordered to pay more than $3 million in damages, including punitive damages. Defendants requested that the $750,000 tendered to Shilhaneks to date be allocated toward payment of the punitive award and that Shilhaneks be required to file a corresponding satisfaction of judgment with respect to the punitive damages award, in essence asserting that a defendant has the power to specifically designate payment toward a particular award. Defendants cited 25-9-311 for the rule that a satisfaction of judgment must be provided by the party in whose favor judgment is entered and contended that under 28-1-1225 and this section, the power lies with the debtor, not the creditor, when it comes to designating to which particular obligation a payment should be credited. The District Court denied the request, noting that Title 28 applies only to contractual obligations and that Title 25 governs obligations arising from judgments. The District Court did not abuse its discretion, given defendants' failure to provide a legal basis that would allow them to dictate how damages owed are characterized, the fact that defendants owed more than double the available insurance coverage and were obligated to pay the policy limits to satisfy the verdict, and that allocating 22% of the available insurance proceeds to the punitive damage award would have harsh tax consequences on Shilhaneks. Shilhanek v. D-2 Trucking, Inc., 2000 MT 16, 298 M 101, 994 P2d 1105, 57 St. Rep. 89 (2000).

Failure to Direct Application of Payment:

Absent instructions from the debtor as to which note to apply rents to, it was not a breach of the duty of good faith and fair dealing for a savings and loan to apply the rents to satisfy an August note prior to satisfying a July note in light of the fact that the debtor was notified of the action but failed to object. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n v. Buckland, 238 M 364, 777 P2d 1289, 46 St. Rep. 1339 (1989).

When a debtor owes more than one debt and on making a general payment fails to direct the creditor as to which debt should receive the credit, the creditor may apply it on any one of the debts, secured or unsecured, and a surety on the secured debt is in no position to complain if made on one unsecured. Nat'l Bank of Mont. v. Bingham, 91 M 62, 5 P2d 554 (1932).

Under this section a debtor owing more than one debt or a debt consisting of more than one item (as principal and interest) has the right to direct application of a payment voluntarily made by him, and if the creditor accepts the payment and retains it, the law will treat it as having been applied as directed. Monidah Trust v. Hruze, 62 M 444, 205 P 232 (1922).

Second Lease Canceling First Lease — Subsequent Payments: The parties entered into a second lease that canceled the first lease, with neither party reserving any rights. The lower court's ruling that subsequent payments could not be applied to rents owed under the first lease due to lessor's not reserving its rights was affirmed on appeal. The Supreme Court held, however, that lessor could apply the payments to other accounts existing between the parties since lessee had not specified to which account the payments applied. Empire Dev. Co. v. Johnson, 236 M 433, 770 P2d 525, 46 St. Rep. 487 (1989).

Application of Debtor's Payment to Past Due Account With Creditor — Debtor's Instructions — Creditor's Lien Despite Payment: Defendant contracted for a new building. The contractor purchased materials from the plaintiff through a subcontractor who had an account with the plaintiff. When the subcontractor was paid by the defendant, he in turn paid the plaintiff. The plaintiff applied the payment to the subcontractor's past due account, then later filed a lien against the defendant. The defendant appealed from a judgment upholding the lien. Because a creditor is bound by the instructions given to him by his debtor as to the application of a payment, the issue on appeal was the instructions the subcontractor gave to the plaintiff. With no trial court finding of a duty of the plaintiff to apply the funds paid to it by the subcontractor to the bill for materials used by the defendant, the Supreme Court followed the clear mandate from the Legislature and held that the defendant was liable to the plaintiff on the lien judgment against him, while recommending that the Legislature review the statute. Gen. Elec. Supply v. Mont. Auto. Ass'n, 189 M 553, 617 P2d 136, 37 St. Rep. 1715 (1980), distinguished in Witbart v. Witbart, 204 M 446, 666 P2d 1217, 40 St. Rep. 995 (1983).

Liquor License Sale Proceeds: Where debtor's liquor license had been purchased with advances from bank under security agreement, proceeds from the sale of such license were to be applied first to notes secured by such security agreement, then to note secured by an attachment, and finally to other obligations since sale contract provided that all proceeds were to be placed in escrow with bank to whom all debts were owed. Gallatin Trust & Sav. Bank v. Darrah, 152 M 256, 448 P2d 734 (1968).

No Presumption That Payments Made on Last Accruing Obligation: It is incumbent upon defendant, in order for him to sustain the burden of proof that an action to recover wages due under a contract of employment was barred because most of the items accrued more than 5 years prior to commencement of the action, to show that the partial payments were applied on the items last accruing rather than the oldest, the record failing to show any direction for application thereof by either party. There is no presumption that payments were made on an obligation last accruing. Girson v. Girson, 112 M 183, 114 P2d 274 (1941).

Statute of Limitations: In an action to recover balance due on contract for the purchase of water stock and to foreclose mortgages on land securing contracts, where company constructed its water distribution system under contract with the Carey Land Act Board, payment of an installment of the purchase price made 8 years before suit and credited first to interest on the entire unpaid balance prevented the 8-year Statute of Limitations from running against any of the installments remaining unpaid. Valier-Montana Land & Water Co. v. Ries, 109 M 508, 97 P2d 584 (1940).

When Consent Necessary for Application: Where defendant in action to recover balance due for goods, wares, and merchandise claimed he turned the property over to a corporation which agreed to discharge his personal debts incurred in working the mine, and that the plaintiff had so applied certain payments made by it, it was held that in absence of showing that the corporation had consented to having payments made by it so applied, neither plaintiff nor defendant could rely on the doctrine of application of payments declared by this section. Ingman v. Hewitt, 107 M 267, 86 P2d 653 (1938).

Agreement as to Application of Payment: Where several written instruments relating to the same indebtedness contained no provision for the order of payment, parol evidence was competent to show what application of a payment was agreed on. Grogan v. Valley Trading Co., 30 M 229, 76 P 211 (1904).

Case Notes

Waiver of Contract Rights — Late Payments Not Considered Breach Based on Prior Acceptance: The uninsured employers' fund (UEF) sought indemnity from an employer that did not have workers' compensation insurance using a monthly payment arrangement that was agreed to by the parties. The UEF accepted four late payments before turning the employer over to collections, at which point the employer sued UEF for breach of contract. The Supreme Court held that UEF waived its right to terminate the contract based on late payment when it accepted late payments without objection. Consequently, it was a breach of contract for the UEF to turn the employer over to collections and the employer was entitled to damages. Elk Mtn. Motor Sports, Inc. v. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2012 MT 261, 367 Mont. 36, 289 P.3d 165.

Failure to Timely Enforce Contract Provision Insufficient of Itself to Constitute Waiver — Proof of Waiver — Reasonable Diligence Required of Rescinding Party: Mere failure to take steps to enforce a legal right under a contract in a timely manner is not, by itself, sufficient to constitute proof of waiver. Rather, a party claiming waiver must prove that the language or conduct by the other party showed unequivocally that the party voluntarily and intentionally relinquished the right to receive the full benefit of the contract. (See Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).) Even though a party may be entitled to rescind a contract because of failure of consideration, the rescinding party must take action within a reasonable time upon discovering the facts that enable the rescission. Here, the District Court erred in concluding, without first determining whether the provisions of 28-2-1713 were complied with, that purchasers under a contract could rescind for failure of consideration. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000), following Liddle v. Petty, 249 M 442, 816 P2d 1066, 48 St. Rep. 779 (1991).

Acceptance of Payment — Waiver of Right to Demand Acceleration: Bailey sold Lilly real property under a contract. Six years later Lilly sold the property to Hiramoto subject to Bailey's interest. Bailey refused to consent to the sale unless Lilly paid off the original contract in full. After the sale by Lilly to Hiramoto, Bailey filed suit alleging default. Prior to trial, Bailey continued to accept the payments from the escrow account for Lilly's obligation under the contract. District Court held that Lilly did not breach his agreement with Bailey and that any right of Bailey to demand acceleration of the balance due was waived as Bailey accepted Lilly's payments under the terms of the contract up until the date of trial. Bailey v. Lilly, 205 M 35, 667 P2d 933, 40 St. Rep. 1079 (1983).

Acts Constituting Waiver: Party who was obligated to sell shares of stock under repurchase agreement waived objections to tender by failing to object to terms of tender, conduct evidencing his willingness to sell and requesting a change in payment terms. State ex rel. Howeth v. D. A. Davidson & Co., 163 M 355, 517 P2d 722 (1973), overruled, with regard to elements of collateral estoppel, in Dagel v. Great Falls, 250 M 224, 819 P2d 186, 48 St. Rep. 919 (1991).

Check as Tender: Ordinarily a check is not a tender, but it may be as effective as a tender of currency if there is no timely objection to the form of tender, or if the objection is waived. Schultz v. Campbell, 147 M 439, 413 P2d 879 (1966).

Insufficiency of Tender:

Where the makers of a renewal note tendered an amount in payment which did not include a disputed attorney's fee, failure to include the fee in the tender rendered it ineffective to discharge the mortgage lien. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

Insufficiency of the tender of delinquent taxes by a mortgagee seeking to redeem from the county was immaterial because, first, objections to a tender are waived unless specified at the time and, second, they are waived where the tenderee's attitude would make the tender a vain and idle ceremony. Blackford v. Judith Basin County, 109 M 578, 98 P2d 872 (1940).

Specific Performance on Option to Purchase Real Property: In action for specific performance by lessee having option to purchase real property, tender could not be objected to where it was evident that defendants would not have conveyed property no matter what was done in the way of a tender and no objection was made to the tender at the time it was made. Fiers v. Jacobson, 123 M 242, 211 P2d 968 (1949), distinguished in Dalakow v. Geery, 132 M 457, 318 P2d 253 (1957).

Tender Unnecessary: In an action for damages for breach of a contract of sale of real property, where defendant vendor conveyed the property to another when his contract with vendee was still valid, tender was not necessary for recovery, hence unnecessary to plead. Thompson v. Lincoln Nat'l Life Ins. Co., 110 M 521, 105 P2d 683 (1940).

Rescission of Contract for the Sale of Goods: Where one seeking to rescind a contract relating to the furnishing of a furnace requests the one furnishing it to remove it because it is unsatisfactory, the latter, on refusing, must point out his objection to the offer to return it at the time it is made, and if he does not do so he will be deemed to have waived all objections thereto and is precluded from later objecting to the sufficiency of the tender. O'Keefe v. Routledge, 110 M 138, 103 P2d 307 (1940).

Part 12
Extinction of Obligation by Offer of Performance

28-1-1201. When obligation extinguished by offer of performance.

Case Notes

Unconditional Offer and Ability to Perform: An unconditional offer in good faith to perform made by the party upon whom the obligation rests, coupled with the ability to perform, is equivalent to full performance and extinguishes the obligation as to the party making the offer, and a wrongful refusal to accept it disables the other party from claiming any benefit. Lehrkind v. McDonnell, 51 M 343, 153 P 1012 (1915), distinguished in Audit Serv., Inc. v. Frontier-West, Inc., 252 M 142, 827 P2d 1242, 49 St. Rep. 186 (1992). See also Hanlon v. Manger, 85 M 31, 277 P 433 (1929).

28-1-1202. Effect of offer.

Case Notes

Failure to Timely Enforce Contract Provision Insufficient of Itself to Constitute Waiver — Proof of Waiver — Reasonable Diligence Required of Rescinding Party: Mere failure to take steps to enforce a legal right under a contract in a timely manner is not, by itself, sufficient to constitute proof of waiver. Rather, a party claiming waiver must prove that the language or conduct by the other party showed unequivocally that the party voluntarily and intentionally relinquished the right to receive the full benefit of the contract. (See Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).) Even though a party may be entitled to rescind a contract because of failure of consideration, the rescinding party must take action within a reasonable time upon discovering the facts that enable the rescission. Here, the District Court erred in concluding, without first determining whether the provisions of 28-2-1713 were complied with, that purchasers under a contract could rescind for failure of consideration. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000), following Liddle v. Petty, 249 M 442, 816 P2d 1066, 48 St. Rep. 779 (1991).

What Constitutes Valid Tender: In order to constitute a valid tender, the party making the tender must offer a specific amount that covers all that the other party is entitled to, including interest, costs, and attorney fees. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Frontier-West, Inc., 252 M 142, 827 P2d 1242, 49 St. Rep. 186 (1992), distinguishing Lehrkind v. McDonnell, 51 M 343, 153 P 1012 (1915).

Promise of Performance Not Equivalent to Unconditional Tender of Performance: Obligor gave written notice of the intention to prepay the balance of a contract for deed but never made the payment. The statement of what the obligor intended to do in the future never rose to the level required to make an unconditional tender of performance that would trigger the Lehrkind rule or to the level required to constitute an offer to pay under this section; therefore, the obligation was never extinguished. Keller v. Dooling, 248 M 535, 813 P2d 437, 48 St. Rep. 554 (1991).

Contention of Error in Award of Prejudgment Interest — Faulty Waiver Argument: Defendant argued that plaintiff's waiver of payments availed defendant of a defense to interest on the difference between the contract amount due and the amount actually paid. However, the Supreme Court discounted the waiver argument and noted that defendant did not pay the whole principal; therefore, interest was proper under 27-1-211. Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).

Mode of Tender: Ordinarily a check is not a tender, but it may be as effective as a tender of currency if there is no timely objection to the form of tender, or if objection is waived. Schultz v. Campbell, 147 M 439, 413 P2d 879 (1966).

Contract for Purchase of Ranch: A ranch was sold on an installment plan with the contract providing for a downpayment, 10 annual payments at 5% interest, and possession on April 1, 1954. The sellers retained possession of the ranch and operated it until April 1960. The purchaser did not tender the various amounts due except as to the "binder" payment, in effect borrowing the deferred payments at 5%. Since the purchaser received a reasonable rental value for the property, he was required to stand a reduction of the amount of interest due under the contract on all payments over the downpayment of 29% for the time they were due. Hughes v. Melby, 139 M 308, 362 P2d 1014 (1961).

Effect of Dispute as to Consideration: Where there was a bona fide dispute between the makers and payees of a renewal note as to whether there was a partial failure of consideration, an offer to pay an amount not including the disputed item did not bar the payees' right to hold mortgage security. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

Satisfaction of Debt: It is payment, not tender, that is required to discharge or satisfy the debt. Mahoney v. Lester, 118 M 551, 168 P2d 339 (1946).

Right of Redemption: Where one entitled to redeem from execution sale fully complies with the statutory requirements, such compliance results in a completed redemption and a Sheriff's deed to the property issued thereafter to purchaser is void since redemption operated to transfer to redemptioner all right, title, and interest acquired by purchaser. Leonard v. Western, 74 M 513, 241 P 523 (1925).

Release of Lien: Since tender has same effect upon all incidents of obligation as actual payment, if debt is secured by lien upon property or by sureties, tender operates as release of lien or sureties, the creditor being left to his personal claim against debtor. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 51 M 509, 154 P 717 (1916).

28-1-1203. Offer of partial performance ineffective.

Case Notes

What Constitutes Valid Tender: In order to constitute a valid tender, the party making the tender must offer a specific amount that covers all that the other party is entitled to, including interest, costs, and attorney fees. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Frontier-West, Inc., 252 M 142, 827 P2d 1242, 49 St. Rep. 186 (1992), distinguishing Lehrkind v. McDonnell, 51 M 343, 153 P 1012 (1915).

Case Notes

Option Agreement — "Indefinite" Terms: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. The defendant contended that the terms of the option agreement were so indefinite that specific performance could not be granted as a remedy. When the contract is silent, the place of payment is wherever the seller can be found. The option agreement here provided for the manner and the amount of payment. Although the interest to be conveyed was not mentioned, 70-20-301 provides that when the contract or terms of the grant are silent, a fee simple is presumed to be intended to pass. The Supreme Court concluded that the defendant surely did not intend that any less interest should pass and if he so intended, he did not prove it. Specific performance was affirmed. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981).

When Payment Does Not Constitute Performance: Performance of a contract is the doing of the things promised to be done. While the obligation may be for the delivery of money only, in which event performance is called "payment", if the contract calls for the doing of various things, payment alone would not constitute performance. Hardenburgh v. Hardenburgh, 115 M 469, 146 P2d 151 (1944).

Alternative or Unstated Conditions: Where the place of performance of a contract is in the alternative, ordinarily the promisor may elect what act he will perform, the obligation being discharged by the performance of either of the enumerated acts; if one contracts to do one of two things by a given date and allows the day to lapse without performing either, his right of election is lost; if a given date is not stated, the expiration of a reasonable time has the same effect. Thomas v. Cloyd, 110 M 343, 100 P2d 938 (1940).

Sale of Sheep: Where time was not of the essence of contract for sale of sheep, buyers could not claim violation of contract or rescind for nondelivery on the day specified, without giving seller an opportunity to tender performance, with compensation for delay. Seller was obliged, within a reasonable time, to tender performance coupled with an offer to compensate for delay. Curtis v. Parham, 49 M 140, 140 P 511 (1914).

Sale of Real Property: Time was held not to be of the essence of an oral contract to sell realty. Stevens v. Trafton, 36 M 520, 93 P 810 (1908).

Tender of Payment of Attorney Fees Conditioned on Release of Files Upheld — Right of Patent Assignee to Files Upheld — Construction of Agreement as Assignment and Not License of Patent: Millhollin invented a device to align conveyor belts, which he called a "belt trapper". Millhollin also entered into an agreement with The Conveyor Company (TCC), in which Millhollin gave TCC the exclusive right to make, use, and sell the belt trapper in the United States and foreign countries and in which, in return, TCC agreed to pay Millhollin royalties and other amounts. After deciding that the fees charged by Conover, Millhollin's lawyer, for certain work in connection with the patents were too high, TCC tendered Conover the balance of his fees, conditioned upon Conover turning over his files in the matter to TCC. Millhollin then sent TCC a notice of its default on the contract. After no action was taken by TCC to cure the default, Millhollin declared the agreement terminated and filed a declaratory judgment action. The District Court held that TCC had the right to tender payment conditioned upon receipt of the files. Citing Advance-Rumely Thresher Co., Inc. v. Hess, 85 M 293, 279 P 236 (1929), and this section, the Supreme Court held that a tender of payment may be conditional as long as the condition is one that the tenderer has a right to insist upon. The Supreme Court then analyzed the relationship between TCC and Millhollin as set forth in the written agreement between them and found that the agreement transferred by assignment all of Millhollin's rights in the belt trapper to TCC. Consequently, the Supreme Court held that the files in the hands of Conover were property belonging to TCC and that TCC could therefore withhold payment to Conover conditioned upon release of those files without breaching its agreement with Millhollin. Millhollin v. The Conveyor Co., 1998 MT 41, 287 M 377, 954 P2d 1163, 55 St. Rep. 136 (1998).

Sale of Livestock: An offer to perform by obligee must be unconditional and made in good faith, coupled with the ability to perform; hence where the seller of sheep, sued for damages for failure to make delivery, offered to deliver the animals provided a certain person could select them, the offer was conditional and of no avail to him as a defense. Hanlon v. Manger, 85 M 31, 277 P 433 (1929).

Debtor Not Excused From Paying Delay Money: Lessee of land for oil and gas exploration under a contract which, inter alia, provided that money to be paid by him should be paid to lessor or deposited in bank for his credit was not excused from making payment of delay money by refusal of lessor to execute an indemnity bond assuring proper apportionment of the money among grantees of portions of the lands sold after execution of lease, the transferees having taken subject to its provisions. Lessee, by making payment as provided, would have been released from all claims by the transferees and was therefore in no position to insist upon acceptance of the condition prior to making payment. No Implied Waiver Contract Provision Subject to Waiver or Modification: In an action involving several complex business transactions, the District Court allowed the plaintiffs to present evidence regarding contract formation and waiver to the jury. On appeal, the defendant bank argued that the no waiver provision of the contract applied. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that antiwaiver clauses are like any other clause in a contract, subject to waiver or modification by performance. Masters Group Int'l, Inc. v. Comerica Bank, 2015 MT 192, 380 Mont. 1, 352 P.3d 1101.

Blank Security Agreement Signed by Borrower and Filled Out by Bank: Borrower signed a blank security agreement that bank then filled out and mailed to her. The record shows that she had the agreement in her possession in December 1985; thus, she had the means to discover the fraud that she alleged bank committed in setting the agreement's terms. Because she did not file a claim until December 1988, her claim was barred by the 2-year statute of limitations. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

Defendant Not Allowed to Characterize Damages: Shilhaneks were injured in a vehicle accident, and defendants were ordered to pay more than $3 million in damages, including punitive damages. Defendants requested that the $750,000 tendered to Shilhaneks to date be allocated toward payment of the punitive award and that Shilhaneks be required to file a corresponding satisfaction of judgment with respect to the punitive damages award, in essence asserting that a defendant has the power to specifically designate payment toward a particular award. Defendants cited 25-9-311 for the rule that a satisfaction of judgment must be provided by the party in whose favor judgment is entered and contended that under 28-1-1106 and this section, the power lies with the debtor, not the creditor, when it comes to designating to which particular obligation a payment should be credited. The District Court denied the request, noting that Title 28 applies only to contractual obligations and that Title 25 governs obligations arising from judgments. The District Court did not abuse its discretion, given defendants' failure to provide a legal basis that would allow them to dictate how damages owed are characterized, the fact that defendants owed more than double the available insurance coverage and were obligated to pay the policy limits to satisfy the verdict, and that allocating 22% of the available insurance proceeds to the punitive damage award would have harsh tax consequences on Shilhaneks. Shilhanek v. D-2 Trucking, Inc., 2000 MT 16, 298 M 101, 994 P2d 1105, 57 St. Rep. 89 (2000).

Substantial Compliance: Judgment debtor's deposit in a savings account in judgment creditor's name of amount of trial court's recomputed award extinguished its obligation so that interest did not continue to run even though deposit did not include interest already accrued and original, higher award was reinstated on appeal. Resner v. N. Pac. Ry., 161 M 177, 505 P2d 86 (1973), overruled on other grounds in Woods v. Burlington N. Ry., 2004 MT 384, 325 M 106, 104 P3d 1045 (2004).

Lease Option Renewal — Tender to Lessor's Daughter Ineffective: Tender of check to lessor's daughter-in-law at lessor's residence did not renew lease option since there was no tender to lessor himself and no written offer of payment or deposit of funds was made, notwithstanding that daughter-in-law refused to allow lessee to see lessor because of latter's illness. Keller v. Martin, 153 M 9, 452 P2d 422 (1969).

Method of Payment: Where payment of judgment was tendered and refused, payment should be made under the provisions of this section and not by deposit in court. Galbreath v. Armstrong, 121 M 387, 193 P2d 630 (1948).

Conditional Tender: A tender is not valid when accompanied with conditions which the tenderer has no right to make, and in order for a tender to operate as payment of an obligation it must be for the full amount thereof. Advance-Rumely Thresher Co., Inc. v. Hess, 85 M 293, 279 P 236 (1929).

Tender in Redemption: After a tender in redemption had been made and refused, plaintiff was not required, in order to keep it good, to deposit the money in court and keep it there. Hamilton v. Hamilton, 51 M 509, 154 P 717 (1916).

$250,000 Nonrefundable Option Payment — Plaintiffs Allowed to Keep Payment Despite Developers' Inability to Develop Land: The plaintiffs entered into a real estate contract to sell property near Whitefish Lake to the defendants. The contract provided for a $250,000 nonrefundable option due within 30 days, which the defendants paid to the plaintiffs. Subsequently, the defendants were unable to get the approval necessary to develop the property and sought the return of the $250,000, claiming that the contract was null and void. Following a bench trial, the District Court ordered the plaintiffs to return the money to the defendants and the plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the real estate contract was a binding agreement because it included all the essential material terms, regardless of the later opposition of neighbors to the development of the property. Consequently, the plaintiffs were entitled to keep the nonrefundable option as provided for in the contract. Hurly v. Lake Cabin Dev., LLC, 2012 MT 77, 364 Mont. 425, 276 P.3d 854.

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977), and Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236 (1999).

What Constitutes Excuse of Performance: On appeal in a breach of contract action, the seller argued that the evidence showed he intended to deliver the calves to the buyer by the extended delivery date of December 15 but was excused from performance because of bad weather. The trial court, however, chose to believe that the seller did not so intend, which belief was supported by the facts. The findings were not clearly erroneous. Therefore, the trial court was upheld. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

What Constitutes Excuse of Performance by Reason of Rejection: On appeal in a breach of contract action, the seller argued that the buyer had wrongfully rejected delivery after January 1. (The contract called for delivery in mid-November, but an extended delivery date of December 15 had been discussed.) The rejection allegedly made performance impossible due to the buyer's hindrance. The trial court found that the seller had never delivered any calves and concluded that the failure of the seller to make even partial performance amounted to a complete breach of the contract. The court's finding was supported by the evidence that the seller failed to tender delivery after January 1; that all he did was state on several occasions that he would be unable to deliver until January 1; and that the buyer always had demanded delivery by the (earlier) agreed date. After January 1, the seller took the calves to Billings and sold them at a price higher than the contract price without offering them to the buyer. Accordingly, the trial court's findings were held not clearly erroneous. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

Impossibility of Performance of Contract: A joint venture was formed, the contract contemplating the feeding of cattle by one party until 80% graded "choice", followed by sale and splitting of the proceeds with the supplier of the cattle, who was the second party. A drop in cattle prices which caused the feeder to lose his financing was not a case of commercial impossibility for two reasons. First, in order for commercial impossibility to excuse performance of a contract, the parties thereto must have had no reason to foresee the impossibility at the time they contracted prior to the breach. On the contrary, a contract against the feeder for damages was upheld. Fluctuation in cattle prices is foreseeable. Second, in order for commercial impossibility to excuse performance, the contractual duties must be impossible for anyone to perform. Subjective (personal) impossibility does not inhere to the nature of the act to be performed and does not excuse nonperformance. A loss of financing is personal impossibility. Roundup Cattle Feeders v. Horpestad, 184 M 480, 603 P2d 1044 (1979), distinguishing Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

No Delay Attributable to Performance of Obligation — Interest Owing From Date of Mistaken Mortgage Payment: The Ophuses sold their farm and ranch to the Fritzes pursuant to a contract for deed, which included annual mortgage payments payable by the Fritzes to a federal land bank. After the Fritzes defaulted, the parties entered another contract for deed wherein the Ophuses agreed to sell the same property back to the Fritzes at a reduced price. The second contract contained provisions for dividing any profits that the Fritzes received from their sale of the property, but a dispute arose concerning the profits after the Fritzes sold the property to another party. In the course of discovery, it was found that pursuant to the new contract, the Fritzes had made a payment to the land bank that should have been paid by the Ophuses. The District Court held that the Ophuses owed the payment amount to the Fritzes, plus 7% interest from the date on which the payment was made. On appeal, the Ophuses did not dispute their obligation to repay the Fritzes, but did contest the interest calculation. The Supreme Court found that under this section, the Ophuses could not be excused from their interest obligation unless the Fritzes caused the Ophuses to delay repaying, which was not the case because the Fritzes were not even aware that they had mistakenly made the payment until 8 years later. The District Court's calculation of the interest was affirmed. Ophus v. Fritz, 2000 MT 251, 301 M 447, 11 P3d 1192, 57 St. Rep. 1037 (2000).

Inability to Pay Insufficient Defense to Obligations Due on Promissory Note: Plaintiffs claimed that a bank's exercise of a setoff made it impossible to pay off promissory notes. The Supreme Court affirmed a finding that inability to pay is the common problem of any maker of a promissory note who defaults and that inability is not in itself a sufficient defense to obligations due on the note. Bottrell v. Am. Bank, 237 M 1, 773 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 561 (1989).

Contract for Purchase of Ranch: A contract for the sale of a ranch on an installment plan provided for a down payment and then 10 annual payments at 5% interest, possession April 1, 1954. Sellers remained in possession and operated the ranch until April 1960. The purchaser did not tender the various amounts due except as to the "binder" payment. He was in effect borrowing the deferred payments at 5% interest. Having received the reasonable rental value of the property the purchaser must stand a reduction of the amount of interest due under the contract on all payments over the down payment of 29% for the time they were due. Hughes v. Melby, 139 M 308, 362 P2d 1014 (1961).

Nonperformance Excused — Failure to Pay Caused by Seller: Notwithstanding provision in contract that seller was to be wholly discharged of liability under warranty in case buyer failed to pay for goods ordered, if the failure to pay was caused by action of seller, as where price was to be paid out of advances on government contract and government contract was lost because of defective condition of goods, nonperformance was excused. Pioneer Eng'r Works, Inc. v. McConnell, 123 M 171, 212 P2d 641 (1949).

Applicable in Action for Negligence — Act of God: An act of God such as to excuse performance under this section is an unusual or unprecedented happening or event arising within the realm of natural law, but beyond and outside of the observations and experience of the average person. Wibaux Realty Co. v. N. Pac. Ry., 101 M 126, 54 P2d 1175 (1935).

Demand for Performance of Term Not Contained in Contract — Statement That Party Will Not Perform Unless Demand Met — Anticipatory Breach of Contract: "A party acts at his peril if, insisting on what he mistakenly believes to be his rights, he refuses to perform his duty." Therefore, a demand for performance of a term not contained in the parties' contract, accompanied by an unequivocal statement that the demanding party will not perform unless the additional term is met, constitutes an anticipatory breach of the contract, excusing performance by the other party. In determining whether an anticipatory breach was committed, the concern is whether the promisor communicated an unequivocal indication of an intent not to perform rather than the promisor's uncommunicated subjective intent in repudiating its contractual obligations. A promisee need not jeopardize its own interests by speculating about the promisor's clear refusal to perform or by waiting until the time set for performance to ascertain whether the promisor's unequivocal repudiation was serious. Chamberlin v. Puckett Constr., 277 M 198, 921 P2d 1237, 53 St. Rep. 593 (1996), following United Calif. Bank v. Prudential Ins. Co, 681 P2d 390 (Ariz. Ct. App. 1983), and followed in Eschenbacher v. Inability to Pay Insufficient Defense to Obligations Due on Promissory Note: Plaintiffs claimed that a bank's exercise of a setoff made it impossible to pay off promissory notes. The Supreme Court affirmed a finding that inability to pay is the common problem of any maker of a promissory note who defaults and that inability is not in itself a sufficient defense to obligations due on the note. Case of First Impression — Breach of Contract by Anticipatory Repudiation: Combining two maxims of jurisprudence, "The law neither does nor requires idle acts" and "For every wrong there is a remedy", court found no reason in policy or in law for denying an immediate action for damages based on breach of contract by anticipatory repudiation. However, court held for defendant as language asserted by plaintiff as a repudiation was subject to different interpretations and since breach of contract by anticipatory repudiation works harsh results; for its application, there must be a positive unequivocal statement to the promisee indicating that the promisor will not or cannot substantially perform his contractual duties before his time for performance has arrived. STC, Inc. v. Billings, 168 M 364, 543 P2d 374 (1975).

Prevention Caused by Changes in Building Plans: A building contractor agreed to complete the remodeling of a residence within a given time and not to receive any payment until completion. During such time the owner made frequent changes in plans occasioning considerable delay and necessitating additional work. The owner thereby prevented the performance of the condition precedent upon which his liability under the contract depended, but he could not avail himself of its nonperformance which he himself had occasioned. Smith v. Gunniss, 115 M 362, 144 P2d 186 (1943).

Rejection of Offer of Performance: An unconditional offer in good faith to perform by the party on whom the obligation rests, coupled with the ability to perform, is, if rejected by the other party, equivalent to full performance and extinguishes such obligation; the offerer is then entitled to all the benefits he would have been entitled to if performance had been complete on both sides. Lehrkind v. McDonnell, 51 M 343, 153 P 1012 (1915).

No Tortious Interference With Business When Sublease Terminated Prior to Alleged Interference: Lessee Anderson filed a counterclaim against lessor Grenfell for tortiously interfering with Anderson's sublease of a portion of the leased property. However, the District Court correctly found that Anderson terminated the sublease prior to Grenfell's actions, so Grenfell could not be found to have interfered with a sublease that was no longer in effect. Grenfell v. Anderson, 2002 MT 225, 311 M 385, 56 P3d 326 (2002).

Mortgage Against Party's Interest in Property Granted Pursuant to Dissolution — No Tortious Interference With Business, Prima Facie Tort, or Intentional Infliction of Emotional Distress: When George and Joyce were divorced, the District Court granted George exclusive possession of the ranch until it could be sold and the proceeds divided between the parties. During the course of the dissolution proceedings, Joyce took out several loans for living expenses. After the dissolution, Joyce consolidated the $150,000 in loans, and the bank executed a mortgage on Joyce's interest in the ranch to secure the loan. When George found out about the mortgage and security interest, he became distraught because he believed that he would not be able to obtain loans on the property to enable him to conduct ranch obligations and meet his operations. George subsequently filed suit against Joyce, the bank, and the bank president, who was Joyce's son-in-law, alleging tortious interference with business relationships, prima facie tort, and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The District Court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, and George appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Applying Farrington v. Buttrey Food & Drug Stores Co., 272 M 140, 900 P2d 277 (1995), the court concluded that the acts of Joyce and the bank were legal and that, standing alone, the acts did not give rise to any presumption or inference that the acts were done to harm George. The court also declined to recognize a separate cause of action for prima facie tort under the facts of this case. Applying Sacco v. High Country Independent Press, Inc., 271 M 209, 896 P2d 411 (1995), the court further concluded that because the defendants' acts were legal, no claim for emotional distress could arise from those acts. Absent material facts evidencing malicious intent or damages, summary judgment was proper. Pospisil v. First Nat'l Bank of Lewistown, 2001 MT 286, 307 M 392, 37 37 P3d 704 (2001).

Instruction Necessary — Interference With Contract: An instruction on interference with contract must address the element of unjustifiability or impropriety of the alleged tortious actions and provide that the act is "without right or justifiable cause on the part of the actor". NW. Nat'l Bank of Great Falls v. Weaver-Maxwell, Inc., 224 M 33, 729 P2d 1258, 43 St. Rep. 1995 (1986), distinguished in Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988).

Breach of Contract — Interference With Business: Defendant breached a contract to sell business property to plaintiff and not to compete and subsequently interfered with the conduct of plaintiff's business. Defendant is liable not only for breach of the contract between himself and plaintiff but also for the tort of intentional interference with a contractual or business relationship between plaintiff and his potential customers. Bolz v. Myers, 200 M 286, 651 P2d 606, 39 St. Rep. 1747 (1982), followed in Farrington v. Buttrey Food & Drug Stores Co., 272 M 140, 900 P2d 277, 52 St. Rep. 667 (1995).

Interference With Contractual Relationship: In order to establish a prima facie case of interference with contractual or business relations, it must be shown that: (1) the acts were intentional and willful; (2) the acts were calculated to cause damage to the plaintiff in his business; (3) the acts were done with the unlawful purpose of causing damage or loss, without right or justifiable cause on the part of the actor; and (4) actual damages and loss resulted. Bolz v. Myers, 200 M 286, 651 P2d 606, 39 St. Rep. 1747 (1982), followed in Randolf V. Peterson, Inc. v. J.R. Simplot Co., 239 M 1, 778 P2d 879, 46 St. Rep. 1463 (1989), Grenfell v. Prevention of Performance by Stranger: An action against a stranger to a contract for damages caused by his unlawful interference with its performance is one for a tort, and not one upon the contract, and therefore plaintiff was not required to plead in his complaint that he had performed all conditions precedent to be performed by him under it, to entitle him to recover. Burden v. Elling St. Bank, 76 M 24, 245 P 958 (1926), followed in Bolz v. Meyers, 200 M 286, 651 P2d 606, 39 St. Rep. 1747 (1982).

Amendment of Judgment Proper Based on Impermissible Double Recovery Yet Jury's Determination of Breach Supported by Substantial Evidence — Accord and Satisfaction Not Argued and Not Supported by Facts: The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial or amendment of judgment, arguing that there was insufficient evidence to justify the jury's damages award of $25,000 for the plaintiff's breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The trial court found that this argument had merit because the award would be an impermissible double recovery for the defendant and, accordingly, granted the plaintiff's request that the award be vacated. However, the plaintiff never asserted that there was not substantial evidence supporting the jury's determination that the plaintiff breached the second agreement, nor did the plaintiff argue waiver or accord and satisfaction as defenses. Thus, though the parties disputed its terms, there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that all the elements of a contract existed, that the plaintiff breached a second agreement, and that the defendant was damaged. Moreover, the Supreme Court determined that the evidence was substantive enough for the jury to have found in favor of the defendant and to have rejected the waiver and accord and satisfaction arguments the plaintiff presented on appeal. Ryffel Family Partnership v. Alpine Country Constr., Inc., 2016 MT 350, 386 Mont. 165, 386 P.3d 971.

Absence of Evidence of Rescission, Release, Waiver, or Accord and Satisfaction of Contract — Reversal Warranted: Plaintiffs owned shares in defendant's corporation and sought to sell the shares back to the corporation. The corporation sent a letter offering to purchase the shares for $64,933.60, and plaintiffs were instructed that to accept the offer, they were to sign the back of the stock certificate and mail it to the corporation. Plaintiffs did so, but included with the certificate a letter stating that by accepting the offer, plaintiffs reserved their rights under federal and state law. The corporation found the language unacceptable and declined to purchase the shares, instead returning the certificate to plaintiffs. Concerned about possessing a signed stock certificate, plaintiffs ultimately visited the corporation and surrendered the endorsed certificate in exchange for a new one. Plaintiffs then brought a breach of contract suit claiming $64,933.60 in damages, asserting that the corporation had breached its offer to repurchase the stock. The corporation denied that a contract offer existed, arguing that plaintiffs' reply was not an acceptance but rather a counteroffer, and asserted that even if a contract did exist, plaintiffs had waived their rights under it by forfeiting the endorsed certificate in favor of a new one and by failing to immediately assert their rights under the contract. A jury found that the corporation had breached its contract, causing damages in the amount of $64,933.60, but then entered a verdict for the corporation on grounds that the corporation had proved at least one of its affirmative defenses of rescission, release, waiver, or accord and satisfaction. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that only in rare cases should a jury verdict be set aside but reversed the verdict nevertheless on grounds that, even drawing all legitimate inferences in favor of the corporation, there was a complete absence of probative evidence supporting any of the corporation's affirmative defenses. The case was remanded for entry of judgment of $64,933.60 in favor of plaintiffs. Benson v. Diverse Computer Corp., 2004 MT 114, 321 M 140, 89 P3d 981 (2004), followed in Harland v. Anderson Ranch Co., 2004 MT 132, 321 M 338, 92 P3d 1160 (2004).

Insurer Required to Pay Undisputed Medical Coverage Without Settlement Agreement When Liability Reasonably Clear — No Bad Faith Claim for Pre-Watters Conditioned Settlement Offer: Defendant insurer offered to pay plaintiffs the policy limit of $1 million in exchange for a full release of claims against the insureds. Plaintiffs refused to provide a release, the case went to trial, and plaintiffs were awarded more than $3 million. Plaintiffs then counterclaimed against the insurer, claiming that refusal to pay the undisputed medical claims without a release violated 33-18-201(6) and (13). The Supreme Court noted that the purpose of 33-18-201 is to ensure prompt payment of damages for which an insurer is clearly obligated. Thus, pursuant to Ridley v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 286 M 325, 951 P2d 987 (1997), and Watters v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 2000 MT 150, 300 M 91, 3 P3d 626 (2000), the insurer had a duty to pay plaintiffs' undisputed medical expenses up to the limits of its coverage and without the benefit of a settlement agreement. Nevertheless, because the insurer made its settlement offer in 1998, more than 2 years prior to the Watters decision, the insurer had an arguably reasonable basis under 33-18-242 for asserting that it was entitled to condition payment of policy limits on plaintiffs' provision of a release of claims, so the insurer was not liable for acting in bad faith in violation of 33-18-201. Shilhanek v. D-2 Trucking, Inc., 2003 MT 122, 315 M 519, 70 P3d 721 (2003), overruling Juedeman v. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co., 253 M 278, 833 P2d 191 (1992), and overruling Watters to the extent that Watters implies that an insurer's obligation under Ridley is limited to the minimum coverage required by the Motor Vehicle Safety-Responsibility Act. See also High Country Paving, Inc. v. United Fire & Cas. Co., 2019 MT 297, 398 Mont. 191, 454 P.3d 1210.

Validity and Enforceability of Memorandum of Understanding — Findings of Facts and Conclusions of Law Not Required: The District Court ruled that the parties had entered into a valid and enforceable memorandum of understanding (MOU) regarding the parties' obligations applicable to an agricultural lease. The defendants argued that the MOU was simply an agreement to agree, that only a formal settlement agreement would bind the parties, and that the District Court erred in finding the MOU to be binding without setting out its findings of fact and conclusions of law. The plaintiff maintained that the MOU was an unconditional settlement agreement, that a more formal settlement document was not necessary to finalize or carry out the MOU, and that the court had no duty to set out its findings and conclusions. The Supreme Court found no error in the District Court's ruling and affirmed. All interested parties were present at the settlement conference and participated in negotiations, which ended with all the parties signing the MOU, memorializing the agreement among the signatories. Clearly there was a meeting of the minds during negotiations, and all the parties anticipated being bound by the MOU. The MOU was not conditioned upon the execution of a formal settlement agreement, so one was not necessary. The Supreme Court has recognized the validity of similar MOUs in Hetherington v. Ford Motor Co., 257 M 395, 849 P2d 1039 (1993), and Marta Corp. v. Thoft, 271 M 109, 894 P2d 333 (1995), and concluded that the agreement memorialized in the MOU here was a valid unconditional resolution of the parties' claims that effectively released any claims of the signatories. Further, under former Rule 52(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), findings and conclusions are unnecessary on decisions of motions except for judgments at trial, which did not apply in this case. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a defendant's motion to file an amended answer and counterclaim addressed to the original complaint, because those claims were also resolved by the MOU. Bar OK Ranch, Co. v. Ehlert, 2002 MT 12, 308 M 140, 40 P3d 378 (2002).

Unfair Trade Practice to Require Full and Final Release of Liability Before Claim Paid Within Policy Limits — "Settlement" Distinguished From "Release": Guaranty National Insurance Co. (Guaranty) provided a minimum motor vehicle liability policy for Moore, who was clearly liable for injuring the Watterses' in a car accident. Guaranty offered to settle the Watterses' claim to the extent of the policy coverage, but not without an absolute release of all liability. The Watterses declined the offer, eventually bringing an unfair trade action against Guaranty for failing to promptly pay damages for which Moore was liable. Guaranty argued that the full release from liability was necessary to effectuate a settlement, citing Thompson v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 161 M 207, 505 P2d 423 (1973), and Juedeman v. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co., 253 M 278, 833 P2d 191 (1992), and contended that because no settlement was proffered from the Watterses, Guaranty could not, as a matter of law, have violated 33-18-201. The Supreme Court instead applied Ridley v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 286 M 325, 951 P2d 987 (1997). The court clarified the relevant terms, noting that in accord with the general governing principles of contract law from which the law of settlements is derived, in the context of the Unfair Trade Practices Act, a settlement is synonymous with an enforceable bilateral contract that discharges a future or existing obligation, while a release, as a matter of law, is nothing more than an accord and satisfaction or one of several ways in which an obligation may contractually be discharged or settled for less than or for something different than from what is owed. The court concluded that a settlement between Guaranty and the Watterses was legally possible without the Watterses executing a full and final release of all liability, as evidenced by Guaranty's settlement of the Watterses' property damage claims within the limits of Moore's policy without a release. Thus, when liability resulting from an automobile accident is reasonably clear and a third-party claimant's damages undisputedly exceed mandatory minimum policy limits pursuant to 61-6-103, it is an unfair trade practice per se under 33-18-201 for an insurer to condition the payment of the owed mandatory minimum policy limits on the third party's agreement to provide a full and final release of all liability in favor of an insured. An insurer who pays mandatory minimum policy limits under these circumstances does not act in bad faith per se against its insured by not obtaining a full and final liability release on the insured's behalf. Unfortunately for the Watterses, under the case law in effect at the time, Guaranty had a reasonable basis under Juedeman upon which to deny payment of policy limits, so Guaranty's cross-motion for summary judgment was granted. Watters v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 2000 MT 150, 300 M 91, 3 P3d 626, 57 St. Rep. 588 (2000), overruling Thompson v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 161 M 207, 505 P2d 423 (1973), and Juedeman v. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co., 253 M 278, 833 P2d 191 (1992). See also High Country Paving, Inc. v. United Fire & Cas. Co., 2019 MT 297, 398 Mont. 191, 454 P.3d 1210.

Accord and Satisfaction Applicable Only Between Parties to Agreement: Berlin entered into agreements with Boedecker and his brother Brooks to purchase interests in certain oil well properties. Later, Brooks and Berlin renegotiated their agreement twice. Still later, Berlin sued Boedecker upon discovery that Boedecker had committed fraud in the transaction. Boedecker argued that the action against him by Berlin should be dismissed on the basis of accord and satisfaction. The Supreme Court held that accord and satisfaction extinguishes only the obligation between the parties to the agreement (Berlin and Brooks) and that it had no effect upon Boedecker's liability to Berlin. Berlin v. Boedecker, 268 M 444, 887 P2d 1180, 51 St. Rep. 569 (1994).

No Accord When Payment Stopped on Check — Evidence of Agreement Properly Excluded: In a dispute over the charges for the care and training of horses, the parties agreed that Watkins would accept $5,000 for his services. The Williamses gave Watkins two checks for $2,500, but they stopped payment on the second check and refused to tender the rest of the money on the basis that one of the horses had been mistreated. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Watkins for $20,191 for services. The Williamses argued that the lower court erred in initially excluding the accord and satisfaction affirmative defense. The Supreme Court ruled that there was no accord because of the Williamses' failure to pay the agreed-upon sum and that the District Court had been correct in excluding testimony concerning the agreement. Watkins v. Williams, 265 M 306, 877 P2d 19, 51 St. Rep. 489 (1994).

Breach of Release Agreement by Heirs — Specific Performance Proper: The heirs of a woman, who died from injuries sustained after being run over by her own automobile, authorized their attorney to accept a settlement agreement that required Ford Motor Company (Ford) and a local body shop to pay a total of $185,000 in exchange for a full and final release of all claims. Four days after authorizing acceptance of the settlement offer, the heirs retained different counsel and filed an action against Ford, claiming that the right to bring a claim was not lost until the agreement was formally executed. Ford subsequently counterclaimed for summary judgment, seeking specific performance based on the settlement agreement. The District Court denied Ford's motion, ruling that there was no "meeting of the minds" on the release provision in the agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the interim agreement was an executory accord and Ford, upon the heirs' breach, had the option of suing for damages or asking for specific performance of the contract. Hetherington v. Ford Motor Co., 257 M 395, 849 P2d 1039, 50 St. Rep. 325 (1993), followed in Marta Corp. v. Thoft, 271 M 109, 894 P2d 333, 52 St. Rep. 374 (1995), and distinguished in Murphy v. The Home Depot, 2012 MT 23, 364 Mont. 27, 270 P.3d 72.

Accord and Satisfaction as Extinction of Debt — Further Claims Barred: Bohnsacks agreed to assign a $20,000 promissory note to Hi-Noon Petroleum, Inc. as payment for a $23,729 debt owed Hi-Noon for gasoline delivered to a third party, Charles, for which Bohnsacks acted as guarantor. Bohnsacks then sought to proceed against Hi-Noon for wrongfully delivering gasoline to Charles despite Charles' failure to pay for loads previously delivered. However, Hi-Noon had agreed to accept less than that to which it was entitled in extinction of Bohnsack's debt. Once Hi-Noon accepted payment, the debt was extinguished by accord and satisfaction, barring Bohnsack's further claims. Bohnsack v. Hi-Noon Petroleum, Inc., 243 M 190, 793 P2d 815, 47 St. Rep. 1125 (1990).

Cashing of Check Evidence of Full Satisfaction of Claim: In settlement of a personal injury claim, plaintiff cashed defendant's check, which action constituted a full satisfaction of the claim. Despite plaintiff's subsequent contention that he did not intend to fully and finally release the claim, the trial court found that the check was tendered to plaintiff under such circumstances that he was bound to know it was offered in full settlement of the claim, resulting in an accord and satisfaction between the parties and a discharge of plaintiff's whole claim. A disputed, unliquidated obligation may be extinguished if the obligated party offers to exchange an amount different from or less than the obligation in full settlement of the obligation and if the party owed the obligation agrees to accept and does accept the amount offered in full settlement of the obligation. Boyer v. Ettelman, 235 M 323, 767 P2d 324, 46 St. Rep. 21 (1989), followed in Eatinger v. Johnson, 269 M 99, 887 P2d 231, 51 St. Rep. 1484 (1994).

No Accord and Satisfaction When Right to Recover Deficiency Reserved: Defendant's conveyance of interest in real property as consideration for an antecedent debt does not constitute accord and satisfaction when defendant agreed that if there was a deficiency after sale of the property, he remained responsible for the deficiency. Hunt v. Hunt, 219 M 118, 710 P2d 1352, 42 St. Rep. 1887 (1985), distinguishing Hale v. Belgrade Co., 75 M 99, 242 P 425 (1925).

Unsatisfied Accord: Where buyer of ranch agreed to take over seller's debt on mortgaged sheep on the property, but agreement and promise of settlement of debt were never completed, there was no satisfaction and seller was still liable for the debt. Goggins v. Bookout, 141 M 449, 378 P2d 212 (1963).

Evidence of Accord: In action against landlord where tenant alleged that he had given verbal notice, accepted by the landlord, of his intention to renew lease and had paid consideration therefor, and landlord alleged that consideration was for subsequent accord and satisfaction which allowed tenant time to remove property from premises, there was ample evidence from which the jury could determine that landlord had breached the accord. Flint v. Mincoff, 137 M 549, 353 P2d 340 (1960).

What Does Not Constitute Accord and Satisfaction: To constitute acceptance by a creditor of a smaller amount than that claimed by him to be due on an accord and satisfaction, there must be a bona fide dispute between the parties with respect to the amount due. If plaintiff accepted weekly pay for an amount less than he claimed to be due, laboring under the impression that eventually his employer would make up the difference as he promised, and continued to work until he learned the promise would not be kept, the jury could not logically find that he was bound to know that his acceptance of the pay constituted an accord and satisfaction. Jensen v. Cloud, 107 M 593, 88 P2d 36 (1939).

Accord and Satisfaction — Suit on Quantum Meruit: Where plaintiff agreed to accept stock in lieu of wages if defendant desired, if stock was not delivered and agreement breached, he is not restricted to remedy of specific performance on breach of the agreement, or to an action for damages for the breach, but may treat agreement as ended and sue upon quantum meruit. Davis v. Sullivan Gold Min. Co., 103 M 452, 62 P2d 1292 (1936).

Obligation Not Extinguished: Under this section and 28-1-1402, an accord does not extinguish the obligation sought to be extinguished until the agreement between the parties is fully executed, i.e., in case of a tort, until the injured party has accepted the consideration for the accord; until then the original obligation remains. Barbarich v. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pac. Ry., 92 M 1, 9 P2d 797 (1932).

Distinction Between "Compromise and Settlement" and "Accord and Satisfaction": Distinctions drawn between "compromise and settlement" and "accord and satisfaction"—terms in many cases used interchangeably—seem to be of little practical importance, the intention of the parties in making the agreement in either instance and the effect given by statute to it being the controlling factors. Barbarich v. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pac. Ry., 92 M 1, 9 P2d 797 (1932).

"Obligation" Defined: An "obligation" within the meaning of this section includes a liability for actionable tortious conduct. Barbarich v. Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul & Pac. Ry., 92 M 1, 9 P2d 797 (1932).

Defense of Accord and Satisfaction: Defense of accord and satisfaction must be pleaded, and to constitute acceptance by mortgagee of check for less amount than was actually due from mortgagor on accord, there must have been an agreement on part of mortgagee to accept less in satisfaction in full of the mortgage. Nett v. Stockgrowers' Fin. Corp., 84 M 116, 274 P 497 (1929).

"Accord and Satisfaction" Defined: "Accord and satisfaction" means the substitution of a new agreement in satisfaction of an obligation different from the original rights existing under an antecedent liability, and to be available in defense must be specially pleaded. Nelson v. Young, 70 M 112, 224 P 237 (1924).

28-1-1402. Satisfaction — definition and effect.

Case Notes

Amendment of Judgment Proper Based on Impermissible Double Recovery Yet Jury's Determination of Breach Supported by Substantial Evidence — Accord and Satisfaction Not Argued and Not Supported by Facts: The plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial or amendment of judgment, arguing that there was insufficient evidence to justify the jury's damages award of $25,000 for the plaintiff's breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The trial court found that this argument had merit because the award would be an impermissible double recovery for the defendant and, accordingly, granted the plaintiff's request that the award be vacated. However, the plaintiff never asserted that there was not substantial evidence supporting the jury's determination that the plaintiff breached the second agreement, nor did the plaintiff argue waiver or accord and satisfaction as defenses. Thus, though the parties disputed its terms, there was sufficient evidence for the jury to find that all the elements of a contract existed, that the plaintiff breached a second agreement, and that the defendant was damaged. Moreover, the Supreme Court determined that the evidence was substantive enough for the jury to have found in favor of the defendant and to have rejected the waiver and accord and satisfaction arguments the plaintiff presented on appeal. Ryffel Family Partnership v. Alpine Country Constr., Inc., 2016 MT 350, 386 Mont. 165, 386 P.3d 971.

Absence of Evidence of Rescission, Release, Waiver, or Accord and Satisfaction of Contract — Reversal Warranted: Plaintiffs owned shares in defendant's corporation and sought to sell the shares back to the corporation. The corporation sent a letter offering to purchase the shares for $64,933.60, and plaintiffs were instructed that to accept the offer, they were to sign the back of the stock certificate and mail it to the corporation. Plaintiffs did so, but included with the certificate a letter stating that by accepting the offer, plaintiffs reserved their rights under federal and state law. The corporation found the language unacceptable and declined to purchase the shares, instead returning the certificate to plaintiffs. Concerned about possessing a signed stock certificate, plaintiffs ultimately visited the corporation and surrendered the endorsed certificate in exchange for a new one. Plaintiffs then brought a breach of contract suit claiming $64,933.60 in damages, asserting that the corporation had breached its offer to repurchase the stock. The corporation denied that a contract offer existed, arguing that plaintiffs' reply was not an acceptance but rather a counteroffer, and asserted that even if a contract did exist, plaintiffs had waived their rights under it by forfeiting the endorsed certificate in favor of a new one and by failing to immediately assert their rights under the contract. A jury found that the corporation had breached its contract, causing damages in the amount of $64,933.60, but then entered a verdict for the corporation on grounds that the corporation had proved at least one of its affirmative defenses of rescission, release, waiver, or accord and satisfaction. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that only in rare cases should a jury verdict be set aside but reversed the verdict nevertheless on grounds that, even drawing all legitimate inferences in favor of the corporation, there was a complete absence of probative evidence supporting any of the corporation's affirmative defenses. The case was remanded for entry of judgment of $64,933.60 in favor of plaintiffs. Benson v. Diverse Computer Corp., 2004 MT 114, 321 M 140, 89 P3d 981 (2004), followed in Harland v. Anderson Ranch Co., 2004 MT 132, 321 M 338, 92 P3d 1160 (2004).

Accord and Satisfaction Applicable Only Between Parties to Agreement: Berlin entered into agreements with Boedecker and his brother Brooks to purchase interests in certain oil well properties. Later, Brooks and Berlin renegotiated their agreement twice. Still later, Berlin sued Boedecker upon discovery that Boedecker had committed fraud in the transaction. Boedecker argued that the action against him by Berlin should be dismissed on the basis of accord and satisfaction. The Supreme Court held that accord and satisfaction extinguishes only the obligation between the parties to the agreement (Berlin and Brooks) and that it had no effect upon Boedecker's liability to Berlin. Berlin v. Boedecker, 268 M 444, 887 P2d 1180, 51 St. Rep. 569 (1994).

No Accord When Payment Stopped on Check — Evidence of Agreement Properly Excluded: In a dispute over the charges for the care and training of horses, the parties agreed that Watkins would accept $5,000 for his services. The Williamses gave Watkins two checks for $2,500, but they stopped payment on the second check and refused to tender the rest of the money on the basis that one of the horses had been mistreated. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Watkins for $20,191 for services. The Williamses argued that the lower court erred in initially excluding the accord and satisfaction affirmative defense. The Supreme Court ruled that there was no accord because of the Williamses' failure to pay the agreed-upon sum and that the District Court had been correct in excluding testimony concerning the agreement. Watkins v. Williams, 265 M 306, 877 P2d 19, 51 St. Rep. 489 (1994).

28-1-1403. When part performance extinguishes obligation.

Case Notes

Signing of Separation Agreements and Acceptance of Payments Precluding Obligation for Further Payments: Several physicians signed separation agreements when terminating employment with a medical clinic. The agreements provided that the physicians expressly accepted payments representing a reduced amount of profits, stock, and partnership interest and that the payments called for by the agreements constituted the full amount payable by the clinic. The physicians later asserted that the provision in the agreement reducing payments was void or unreasonable. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to 28-1-1403, any obligation of the clinic to pay more was extinguished when the physicians accepted the terms of the separation agreement. Mungas v. Great Falls Clinic, LLP, 2009 MT 426, 354 M 50, 221 P3d 1230 (2009).

Partial Payment Accompanied by Letter Indicating Payment as Full Settlement — Accord and Satisfaction Created: Where the Department of Revenue sought back child support of $14,240 and the father's attorney sent a $1,000 check to the Department along with a letter clearly indicating that the check was offered as full settlement and that negotiation of the check would represent consent to full compromise of the Department's claim, the District Court properly held that the claim was a disputed and unliquidated claim and that acceptance of the check created an accord and satisfaction. St. v. Frank, 226 M 283, 735 P2d 290, 44 St. Rep. 657 (1987).

Endorsement of Check: Where a claim is liquidated, it can be discharged only by payment in full or by acceptance in writing of a lesser amount. Endorsement of a check for purpose of cashing it is not the writing contemplated by this section as evidence of acceptance of a lesser amount for that claimed to be due. Sawyer v. Somers Lumber Co., 86 M 169, 282 P 852 (1929). See also Geissler v. Nelson, 222 M 409, 722 P2d 632, 43 St. Rep. 1372 (1986), and Interstate Prod. Credit Ass'n v. Abbott, 223 M 405, 726 P2d 824, 43 St. Rep. 1829 (1986).

Part 15
Novation

Part Case Notes

Statute of Frauds: Where promise is made to pay antecedent obligation of another upon condition that party receiving it will cancel the obligation, accepting the new promise in substitution therefor, it is an original undertaking or agreement and not a mere promise to answer for debt of another within meaning of Statute of Frauds, and need not be in writing. Tannhauser v. Shea, 88 M 562, 295 P 268 (1930).

What Are Subjects of Novation: Judgments are as much the subjects of novation as simple contract debts. Tannhauser v. Shea, 88 M 562, 295 P 268 (1930).

Assignment of Lease: Plaintiffs leased business property to one who covenanted to pay rent for the full term of 6½ years but thereafter assigned the lease to another who in turn subleased it to a third person, all with the consent of the lessors. Contention of defendant (the original lessee), in an action for rent, that novation resulted from his assignment of lease with consent of lessors, their acceptance of rent from assignee, and their recognition of latter's right to sublease was unavailing, where it was not apparent that acts of plaintiffs were inconsistent with their intention to continue to look to defendant for rent in case of default of his assignee. Harrison v. Fregger, 88 M 448, 294 P 372 (1930).

Affirmative Defense:

Novation is an affirmative defense. It constitutes new matter which must be specially pleaded. It is made by contract and is subject to all the rules concerning contracts in general. It must be supported by consideration. Bose v. Sullivan, 87 M 476, 288 P 614 (1930).

In action on notes the defense to which was novation, defendant had burden of proving that payee bank agreed to release him from all liability on the notes and to accept alleged new debtor as its debtor instead of defendant, that alleged new debtor agreed to pay notes, and that defendant to whom the new debtor was indebted released the latter from payment of an amount equal to total due on notes. First St. Bank v. Larsen, 65 M 404, 211 P 214 (1922).

Novation as a Cause of Action: When plaintiff failed to allege either that defendant company agreed that the contract claimed to have been made with its promoters should be its own, with the understanding that the original obligor should be released, or that it adopted or agreed to carry out the terms and conditions of the contract in substitution of the original obligor agreed to by the parties to the original contract, the complaint did not state a cause of action in novation. Kirkup v. Anaconda Amusement Co., 59 M 469, 197 P 1005, 17 ALR 441 (1921).

Renewal of Note: Renewal of a note will not be treated as payment or discharge of an original obligation unless there is an affirmative showing that its execution constituted a novation. First Nat'l Bank v. Cottonwood Land Co., 51 M 544, 154 P 582 (1916).

Agreements Not Constituting a Novation: Where automobile buyer gave a chattel mortgage to secure unpaid purchase money but afterward made a new agreement whereby he was to run the machine for hire, the seller paying expenses and the buyer to turn over to the seller all money received until the balance due on the machine was paid, the agreement did not effect a novation or extinguish the debt. Kinsman v. Stanhope, 50 M 41, 144 P 1083 (1914).

28-1-1501. Novation defined.

Case Notes

Novation Not Found: Defendant Mastersons was the original obligee in a contract with plaintiff and simply wanted his money for the building and property, not a substitute contract with another person when plaintiff defaulted by nonpayment. Plaintiff attempted to secure additional buyers for the property when he was in default and induced Mastersons to allow plaintiff to enter a buy-sell agreement as a seller with third parties. However, the buy-sell failed to effectuate a binding contract. There was no substituted contract and, therefore, no novation. Management, Inc. v. Mastersons, Inc., 189 M 435, 616 P2d 356, 37 St. Rep. 1601 (1980).

Pleading Novation: In pleading a novation a plaintiff must allege the following essential elements: a previous valid obligation, an agreement of all the parties to the new contract, extinguishment of the old contract, and validity of the new contract. The question of whether the facts alleged constitute a novation is one of law. Tannhauser v. Shea, 88 M 562, 295 P 268 (1930); Kirkup v. Anaconda Amusement Co., 59 M 469, 197 P 1005 (1921).

Novation and Assignment Distinguished: In novation, an obligation between original parties is completely extinguished and new obligation between transferee and obligator is substituted for the previous one; while in case of assignment of contract, obligation of original debtor continues to rest upon him and he may be compelled to respond to obligee upon default of assignee. Harrison v. Fregger, 88 M 448, 294 P 372 (1930).

Modification of Former Agreement Not a Novation: Where one is already legally bound by his contract (a note) to perform an obligation, a later agreement (a new note) for same consideration, modifying the former one, does not effect a novation. Bose v. Sullivan, 87 M 476, 288 P 614 (1930).

Essentials:

To constitute a novation by substitution of new debtor for old one with intent to release latter, there must be a mutual agreement between the three parties and creditor must have consented to discharge of original debtor and accepted promise of new one; such acceptance need not be shown by express words to that effect but may be implied from attendant facts and circumstances and subsequent conduct of parties. Kenison v. Anderson, 83 M 430, 272 P 679 (1928).

Novation, like any other valid contract, must be supported by consideration which may be the discharge of the original debt or the release of the original debtor, and may be proved by parol. Kenison v. Anderson, 83 M 430, 272 P 679 (1928).

Partial Novation: Where subcontractor assigned a portion of money to become due under his contract with defendant, and defendant accepted the assignment, the transaction constituted a novation to extent of money assigned. The assignee became creditor of defendant, and the rights and remedies of the parties were determinable under the contract of novation. Silver v. Morin, 74 M 398, 240 P 825 (1925).

28-1-1502. Kinds of novation.

Case Notes

Summary Judgment on Breach of Contract Affirmed — Wrongful Discharge Claim Reversed for Determination of Whether Claimant Was Employee or Independent Contractor: Tvedt brought a claim for breach of contract, wrongful termination, and indemnification of expenses, alleging that defendant group had breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, waived the at-will clauses in their employment agreement, and mischaracterized Tvedt as an independent contractor, rather than an employee. Defendant group moved for summary judgment and filed a contingent counterclaim stating that in the event that Tvedt was found to be defendant group's employee, then defendant group's obligation to pay Tvedt the contract value should cease and all payments made to Tvedt should be returned. The District Court determined that Tvedt was not an employee and granted summary judgment to defendant group on all claims, and Tvedt appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed summary judgment on the breach of covenant issue because Tvedt was given adequate notice of termination, defendant group was exercising the specific language of the at-will termination provision of the contract, and Tvedt did not demonstrate that defendant group had waived the right to enforce that provision. However, the court reversed summary judgment on the wrongful discharge claim because the District Court incorrectly applied defendant group's novation argument and because genuine issues of fact remained whether Tvedt was an employee or independent contractor and whether a manager's agreement that recognized Tvedt individually was in effect at the time of termination. Remand was ordered because the District Court never considered whether Tvedt was entitled to relief for wrongful discharge as a matter of law and, if so, whether the claim for indemnification was appropriate. Tvedt v. Farmers Ins. Group of Co., 2004 MT 125, 321 M 263, 91 P3d 1 (2004).

Subordination Agreement — Novation Not Found: A subordination agreement signed by the parties did not constitute a novation of the original promissory note. When the borrowers defaulted, the creditor could still sue on the original promissory note. There was no new consideration for a novation, and the subordination agreement did not disclose any intent by the parties to extinguish the old obligation. Waite v. Andreassi, 249 M 149, 813 P2d 987, 48 St. Rep. 647 (1991).

Consent to Contractual Assignment Refused — Breach of Contract: A contract for sale of real property provided that assignment could be accomplished only with written consent of the seller and that such consent could not be unreasonably withheld. The District Court properly found that the contract was breached by the seller's failure to provide a sufficient reason for refusing to consent to an assignment and that seller was therefore responsible for damages. Erban v. Monforton, 227 M 531, 740 P2d 677, 44 St. Rep. 1290 (1987).

Novation of Lease — New Lessee's Obligation Not Affected by His Ownership Rights: Franchisor took possession of franchise after franchisee indicated a desire to sell the franchise. To make the franchise more attractive to prospective purchasers, franchisor agreed with Godwin, who had leased equipment to the franchise, to make the rental payments on the equipment if Godwin would forgo repossession of the equipment. In a proceeding involving right to possession of the equipment and recovery of rental payments, although franchisor claimed a right under the Uniform Commercial Code to possession of the equipment under its security agreement with franchisee, the lower court correctly found franchisor liable for rent. That franchisor may have been entitled to possession did not preclude it from making a binding agreement with Godwin to take over franchisee's rental payments. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

Novation Not Found: Defendant Mastersons was the original obligee in a contract with plaintiff and simply wanted his money for the building and property, not a substitute contract with another person when plaintiff defaulted by nonpayment. Plaintiff attempted to secure additional buyers for the property when he was in default and induced Mastersons to allow plaintiff to enter a buy-sell agreement as a seller with third parties. However, the buy-sell failed to effectuate a binding contract. There was no substituted contract and, therefore, no novation. Management, Inc. v. Mastersons, Inc., 189 M 435, 616 P2d 356, 37 St. Rep. 1601 (1980).

Assignment of Contract: Novation resulted where remodeling contract was assigned to contracting company's manager, who was superintending the work and paid all bills presented even though charged to the company. The owner consented to the substitution and was in no position, in a mechanics' and materialmen's lien (now construction lien) foreclosure action, to question assignee's right to include in his claim money expended for labor and materials on the property before the assignment, but was estopped from denying that the assignee was the original contractor. Smith v. Gunniss, 115 M 362, 144 P2d 186 (1943).

Substitution of New Debtor for Old:

In determining whether substitution of new debtor for old one constituted a novation, intent to release original debtor is of vital importance. There must have been a clear and definite intention on the part of all concerned in that behalf, since novation is never to be presumed. Harrison v. Fregger, 88 M 448, 294 P 372 (1930).

To constitute novation by substitution of new debtor for old one with intent to release the latter, there must be a mutual agreement between the three parties and creditor must have consented to discharge of original debtor and accepted promise of new one; such consent and acceptance need not necessarily be shown by express words to that effect but may be implied from attendant facts and circumstances and subsequent conduct of parties. Kenison v. Anderson, 83 M 430, 272 P 679 (1928); McAllister v. McDonald, 40 M 375, 106 P 882 (1910).

Acceptance of new note from defendants for one executed by their father resulted in novation which barred plaintiff payee from thereafter enforcing the trust which he might otherwise have relied upon to secure payment of the original note. Larsen v. Marcy, 61 M 1, 201 P 685 (1921).

Agreements Not Constituting Novation:

In action for rent, it was held that where plaintiffs leased business property to one who covenanted to pay rent for full term of 6½ years and thereafter assigned lease to another, he in turn subleasing to a third, all with the consent of the lessors, contention of defendant (original lessee) that novation resulted from his assignment of lease with consent of lessors, their acceptance of rent from assignee, and their recognition of the latter's right to sublease was not upheld, nothing appearing from acts of plaintiffs enumerated inconsistent with their intention to continue to look to defendant for rent in case of default of his assignee. Harrison v. Fregger, 88 M 448, 294 P 372 (1930).

No cause of action in novation was stated where complaint failed to allege either that defendant company agreed that contract claimed to have been made with its promoters should be its own, with the understanding that original obligor be released, or that it agreed to carry out terms of contract in place of original obligor, agreed to by the parties to the original contract. Kirkup v. Anaconda Amusement Co., 59 M 469, 197 P 1005, 17 ALR 441 (1921).

General Essentials: In action on notes the defense to which was novation, defendant had burden of proving that payee bank agreed to release him from all liability on the notes and to accept alleged new debtor as its debtor instead of defendant, that alleged new debtor agreed to pay notes, and that defendant to whom the new debtor was indebted released the latter from payment of an amount equal to total due on notes. First St. Bank v. Larsen, 65 M 404, 211 P 214 (1922).

Agreements Constituting a Novation: Where purchaser of building had agreed with seller immediately upon completion of sale, and with plaintiff, that he would assume a debt due the latter from seller for a lighting plant installed by him in the building prior to the sale, the transaction amounted to a "novation" within meaning of subsection (2) of this section and rendered purchaser liable on obligation assumed by him. Sullivan v. Marshall, 56 M 568, 187 P 1013 (1919).

28-1-1503. How novation accomplished.

Case Notes

Consideration Essential: A novation, like other valid contracts, must be supported by consideration, which may be discharge of original debt or release of original debtor. Proof of novation may be by parol. Kenison v. Anderson, 83 M 430, 272 P 679 (1928). See also Bose v. Sullivan, 87 M 476, 288 P 614 (1930).

Mutual Agreement Between Parties: To constitute a novation by substitution of debtors, there must be a mutual agreement between the three (or more) parties involved and "the creditor must have consented to the discharge of the original debtor and have accepted the promise of the new debtor. It is not essential that the assent to and acceptance of the terms of novation be shown by express words to that effect, but the same may be implied from the facts and circumstances attending the transaction and the conduct of the parties thereafter." Kenison v. Anderson, 83 M 430, 272 P 679 (1928); Silver v. Morin, 74 M 398, 240 P 825 (1925); First St. Bank v. Larsen, 65 M 404, 211 P 214 (1922); McAllister v. McDonald, 40 M 375, 106 P 882 (1910).

Debtor Signed Release Provided by Creditor — Creditor Did Not Refund Surplus — Debtor Sought Surplus — Release Did Not End Article 9 Protections for Creditor: The District Court erred in granting summary judgment to the defendant creditor and in determining that a release agreement the plaintiff debtor signed terminated any further application of the Uniform Commercial Code. The plaintiff entered into an installment sale contract and security agreement to purchase a mobile home with a company that assigned the contract to the defendant. Six years later, the plaintiff voluntarily vacated the mobile home and allowed the defendant to take possession of it. When the plaintiff returned the mobile home to the defendant, she owed $39,791.80. The plaintiff signed a full release of contract, under which she released all rights to the mobile home. The defendant resold the mobile home 1 month later, without notice to the plaintiff, for $53,500, which the plaintiff alleged was $13,708.20 more than the principal she owed when she returned the mobile home. The defendant did not refund any surplus to the plaintiff and disputed that a surplus was in fact realized. The plaintiff argued that the execution of the release did not terminate the defendant's duty under 30-9A-608 to pay her the surplus proceeds from the resale of the mobile home. The Supreme Court determined that despite the release, Article 9 of the U.C.C. (Title 30, ch. 9A) may still require the creditor to account for a surplus realized from the collection of an account or from the disposition of the collateral. The plaintiff's relationship to the defendant was one of debtor to creditor through a secured transaction governed by Article 9. When the plaintiff defaulted on her obligations under the contract, the defendant's rights and responsibilities as a creditor also were governed by Article 9. The defendant's argument that Article 9 no longer governed the parties' relationship following execution of the release was based on its representation that it agreed in the release to absolve the plaintiff from any further contractual obligation she owed to the defendant. The release did not, by its express terms, lift the parties' relationship from that of debtor and creditor under Article 9 or render obsolete the protections afforded a debtor under 30-9A-608 and 30-9A-615. Kapor v. RJC Inv., Inc., 2019 MT 41, 394 Mont. 311, 434 P.3d 869.

Successor in Interest Bound Only to Extent of Underlying Interests: The Leonards granted 36% of the interest in a log home to the Johnstons. After certain defects with the log home were found, the Leonards signed a general release of liability in favor of the log cabin construction company. Subsequently, more extensive structural defects were found in the cabin. In addition, both the Johnstons and the Leonards sold their interest in the property to a third party, the Johnston Trust. The District Court found that the release applied to the entire interest owned by the Johnston Trust. The Supreme Court reversed with respect to the Johnstons, finding that although the Johnston Trust was the successor to both interests, the release was binding only on the interests owned by the Leonards at the time that they signed it. Johnston v. Centennial Log Homes & Furnishings, Inc., 2013 MT 179, 370 Mont. 529, 305 P.3d 781.

Insurance Release Voided by Rescission — Insurer Not Entitled to Rely on Effect of Release Prior to Rescission: Six days after an auto accident, plaintiff signed a release and settled with defendant insurer for $3,500. About 1 month later, plaintiff asked defendant to rescind the release because plaintiff experienced additional pain, but defendant refused to rescind the release. Plaintiff then retained counsel, and defendant rescinded the release and settled the claim for about $200,000. Plaintiff then filed a Montana Unfair Trade Practices Act common-law bad faith claim. At trial the District Court granted plaintiff's motion to exclude evidence of the legal effect of the release and refused defendant's proposed jury instruction regarding the release. Defendant appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Because defendant's rescission of the release effectively voided the release from the beginning, defendant was not, as a matter of law, entitled to rely on the legal effect of the release prior to rescission. Jacobsen v. Allstate Ins. Co., 2009 MT 248, 351 M 464, 215 P3d 649 (2009). See also Westfall v. Motors Ins. Corp., 140 M 564, 374 P2d 96 (1962).

Absence of Evidence of Rescission, Release, Waiver, or Accord and Satisfaction of Contract — Reversal Warranted: Plaintiffs owned shares in defendant's corporation and sought to sell the shares back to the corporation. The corporation sent a letter offering to purchase the shares for $64,933.60, and plaintiffs were instructed that to accept the offer, they were to sign the back of the stock certificate and mail it to the corporation. Plaintiffs did so, but included with the certificate a letter stating that by accepting the offer, plaintiffs reserved their rights under federal and state law. The corporation found the language unacceptable and declined to purchase the shares, instead returning the certificate to plaintiffs. Concerned about possessing a signed stock certificate, plaintiffs ultimately visited the corporation and surrendered the endorsed certificate in exchange for a new one. Plaintiffs then brought a breach of contract suit claiming $64,933.60 in damages, asserting that the corporation had breached its offer to repurchase the stock. The corporation denied that a contract offer existed, arguing that plaintiffs' reply was not an acceptance but rather a counteroffer, and asserted that even if a contract did exist, plaintiffs had waived their rights under it by forfeiting the endorsed certificate in favor of a new one and by failing to immediately assert their rights under the contract. A jury found that the corporation had breached its contract, causing damages in the amount of $64,933.60, but then entered a verdict for the corporation on grounds that the corporation had proved at least one of its affirmative defenses of rescission, release, waiver, or accord and satisfaction. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that only in rare cases should a jury verdict be set aside but reversed the verdict nevertheless on grounds that, even drawing all legitimate inferences in favor of the corporation, there was a complete absence of probative evidence supporting any of the corporation's affirmative defenses. The case was remanded for entry of judgment of $64,933.60 in favor of plaintiffs. Benson v. Diverse Computer Corp., 2004 MT 114, 321 M 140, 89 P3d 981 (2004), followed in Harland v. Anderson Ranch Co., 2004 MT 132, 321 M 338, 92 P3d 1160 (2004).

Unfair Trade Practice to Require Full and Final Release of Liability Before Claim Paid Within Policy Limits — "Settlement" Distinguished From "Release": Guaranty National Insurance Co. (Guaranty) provided a minimum motor vehicle liability policy for Moore, who was clearly liable for injuring the Watterses' in a car accident. Guaranty offered to settle the Watterses' claim to the extent of the policy coverage, but not without an absolute release of all liability. The Watterses declined the offer, eventually bringing an unfair trade action against Guaranty for failing to promptly pay damages for which Moore was liable. Guaranty argued that the full release from liability was necessary to effectuate a settlement, citing Thompson v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 161 M 207, 505 P2d 423 (1973), and Juedeman v. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co., 253 M 278, 833 P2d 191 (1992), and contended that because no settlement was proffered from the Watterses, Guaranty could not, as a matter of law, have violated 33-18-201. The Supreme Court instead applied Ridley v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 286 M 325, 951 P2d 987 (1997). The court clarified the relevant terms, noting that in accord with the general governing principles of contract law from which the law of settlements is derived, in the context of the Unfair Trade Practices Act, a settlement is synonymous with an enforceable bilateral contract that discharges a future or existing obligation, while a release, as a matter of law, is nothing more than an accord and satisfaction or one of several ways in which an obligation may contractually be discharged or settled for less than or for something different than from what is owed. The court concluded that a settlement between Guaranty and the Watterses was legally possible without the Watterses executing a full and final release of all liability, as evidenced by Guaranty's settlement of the Watterses' property damage claims within the limits of Moore's policy without a release. Thus, when liability resulting from an automobile accident is reasonably clear and a third-party claimant's damages undisputedly exceed mandatory minimum policy limits pursuant to 61-6-103, it is an unfair trade practice per se under 33-18-201 for an insurer to condition the payment of the owed mandatory minimum policy limits on the third party's agreement to provide a full and final release of all liability in favor of an insured. An insurer who pays mandatory minimum policy limits under these circumstances does not act in bad faith per se against its insured by not obtaining a full and final liability release on the insured's behalf. Unfortunately for the Watterses, under the case law in effect at the time, Guaranty had a reasonable basis under Juedeman upon which to deny payment of policy limits, so Guaranty's cross-motion for summary judgment was granted. Watters v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 2000 MT 150, 300 M 91, 3 P3d 626, 57 St. Rep. 588 (2000), overruling Thompson v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 161 M 207, 505 P2d 423 (1973), and Juedeman v. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co., 253 M 278, 833 P2d 191 (1992), and overruled in Shilhanek v. D-2 Trucking, Inc., 2003 MT 122, 315 M 519, 70 P3d 721 (2003), to the extent that Watters implies that an insurer's obligation under Ridley is limited to the minimum coverage required by the Motor Vehicle Safety-Responsibility Act. Promise to Hold Hearing — Requirement of Independent Consideration: Plaintiff, a custodian at the Yellowstone County Courthouse for 18 years, was discharged. His employment was "at will". After discharge, he was told by the County Commissioners that he would be given a grievance hearing. A letter was later sent to plaintiff, informing him that no hearing would be held. The promise to hold a hearing was not supported by independent consideration. Therefore, it was not an enforceable promise under contract law. Section 39-2-503 (now repealed) was, in effect, a part of the employment contract between plaintiff and the county. A promise to hold a hearing, given at a later date, could not modify that part of the contract without independent consideration unless consented to by both parties in writing. Reiter v. Yellowstone County, 192 M 194, 627 P2d 845, 38 St. Rep. 686 (1981), distinguished in Boreen v. Christensen, 267 M 405, 884 P2d 761, 51 St. Rep. 1014 (1994).

Rescission of Release: A release, being a contract, is subject to rescission for same reasons as other contracts, including fraud or mistake of fact. Westfall v. Motors Ins. Corp., 140 M 564, 374 P2d 96 (1962).

Joint Obligors — Modern View of Release of Party: Plaintiff, defendant, and another individual entered a written agreement for co-ownership of an airplane. The agreement contained a provision for the costs of usage, repair, and maintenance to be divided among the parties. Defendant was in arrears in his contributions. In early 1980, the parties decided to sell the plane. Defendant executed a blank bill of sale and delivered it to plaintiff. The third-party owner transferred his interest to plaintiff on May 16, 1980, in satisfaction of the amount owed the co-ownership. The plane was sold to a party other than that originally contemplated on October 30, 1980. Defendant contended the sale of the plane and the release of the third-party owner had the effect of releasing him from any obligation to plaintiff. There was no evidence to support this contention. The parties agreed to sell the plane, and defendant delivered a blank bill of sale to be used in the sale. The modern view of release of joint obligors is that where two or more obligors are jointly liable for a breach of contract, a release of one does not necessarily release the other. The question of whether the other is released depends upon: (1) the intention of the parties to the release instrument; and (2) whether the injured party has in fact received full compensation. Nothing in the transaction between the other owners indicated an intent to release defendant. Sunbird Aviation, Inc. v. Anderson, 200 M 438, 651 P2d 622, 39 St. Rep. 1855 (1982).

Comparison With Rule on Joint Tortfeasors: Where plaintiff compromised an action against Sheriff for false arrest and imprisonment for $1,000 and executed a release captioned "Release in full of all claims", reciting that he accepted said sum as "complete compensation for all injuries sustained in connection with" the matters set forth in the complaint, the release barred subsequent action against County Attorney, and it was held that even if tort liability was governed by statutes on joint debtors, the release would operate the same. Beedle v. Carolan, 115 M 587, 148 P2d 559 (1944).

Part Case Notes

Questions of Fact Regarding Ambiguous Contract and Damages — Summary Judgment Inappropriate: Upon remand of a breach of contract action in Bradley v. Crow Tribe of Indians, 2003 MT 82, 315 M 75, 67 P3d 306 (2003), the District Court granted Bradley's motion for summary judgment a second time without considering the merits of defendant's defense to the breach of contract. However, because questions of fact still existed regarding ambiguous language in the contract and potential damages, summary judgment was inappropriate, so the case was again reversed and remanded for further consideration. Bradley v. Crow Tribe of Indians, 2005 MT 309, 329 M 448, 124 P3d 1143 (2005).

Assumption of Risk Inapplicable to Contract Action — Harmless Error: Garrison sued Averill, a real estate broker, in contract for defrauding him by failing to disclose the true facts concerning an easement on real property purchased by Garrison. The District Court found that Garrison had "assumed the risk" of subsequent damages by failing to read the terms of the easement. The Supreme Court held that assumption of risk is ordinarily a tort term associated with personal injury actions, but held that because the District Court did not continue with any more analysis or conclusion after its reference to assumption of risk and because the District Court found that Averill did not breach his duty of care to Garrison, the reference by the District Court to assumption of risk was harmless error. Garrison v. Averill, 282 M 508, 938 P2d 702, 54 St. Rep. 454 (1997).

Survey Services Provided — No Breach of Contract — Judicial Determination of Survey Locations Not Warranted: Property developers contracted with professional surveyors to survey several parcels of property into 20-acre lots. A subsequent unofficial government survey concluded that the results of the contracted work may have been in error, resulting in a potential encroachment of adjacent property. The developers brought an action for breach of contract, contending that if the corners were located where the government survey located them, some lots would be less than the 20-acre units they contracted for. The District Court properly found no breach of contract because, taking into consideration the inexact nature of surveying generally and the fact that the surveyors relied on approved standards and the best available information, the developers in fact received the services they contracted for. Yellowstone Basin Properties, Inc. v. Burgess, 255 M 341, 843 P2d 341, 49 St. Rep. 1051 (1992).

Unambiguous Contract — No Interpretation Needed: When the words of a contract are clear, certain, and unambiguous, the language alone controls and there is nothing for the courts to interpret or construe. In the construction of contracts, the courts may look not only to the language employed but also to the subject matter and the surrounding circumstances and may avail themselves of the same light that the parties possessed when the contract was made. The District Court did not err when it found that the term "concrete" included, specifically, precast concrete panels. Morning Star Enterprises, Inc. v. R.H. Grover, Inc., 247 M 105, 805 P2d 553, 48 St. Rep. 112 (1991), followed in Nyquist v. Nyquist, 255 M 149, 841 P2d 515, 49 St. Rep. 927 (1992).

Existence of Contract Question for Trier of Fact: If the existence of an oral contract is contested and the evidence is conflicting, the existence of the contract is a question for the trier of fact. In re Marriage of Dalley, 237 M 287, 773 P2d 295, 46 St. Rep. 808 (1989).

No Unilateral Resumption of Contract Terms Following Breach of Contract: Once a contract has been breached, its terms may not be unilaterally resumed. The breaching party cannot claim entitlement to the contract benefits, and the nonbreaching party has no duty to perform under the contract terms. W. Media, Inc. v. Merrick, 232 M 480, 757 P2d 1308, 45 St. Rep. 1212 (1988), followed, with regard to performance under a construction contract, in James Talcott Constr., Inc. v. P&D Land Enterprises, 2006 MT 188, 333 M 107, 141 P3d 1200 (2006).

Use of Plats to Induce Purchasers: In order to sell lots, a subdivider prepared and recorded subdivision plat maps that designated common areas and roadways. The purchase and sale contracts did not state who would construct roads or common areas. The issue of whether purchasers of lots have any legally enforceable right to have roads constructed depends not on their designation in the plats but on the subdivider's use of the plats in inducing purchasers. The instruments in question do not comprise a promise, express or implied, to construct roads. The purchasers did acquire an easement for the designated use. The case was remanded to determine factual issues relating to the use of the plats in inducing purchasers. Majers v. Shining Mtns., 219 M 366, 711 P2d 1375, 43 St. Rep. 16 (1986).

Lease — Lessor to Renovate — Bilateral Contract: Plaintiff and defendant signed a lease under which plaintiff was to renovate the leased office space and the two were to confer on the renovation and mutually agree on the final plans. Disagreements as to the plans arose. Plaintiff claimed he had increasing difficulties in contacting defendant. Defendant rescinded the lease on the ground that it had continually invested more time and money than plaintiff and thus from a business standpoint the lease was no longer feasible. Plaintiff's attempt to contact defendant's president failed, and plaintiff sent a notice of default and sued. The lease was not an executory unilateral contract; it was a bilateral obligation under which defendant was required to work with plaintiff in designing and approving plans and act reasonably if defendant disapproved the plans. The verdict for plaintiff and denial of defendant's motions for a directed verdict and judgment notwithstanding the verdict were affirmed. Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 1822 (1985).

Distributorship Contract — No Termination Date — When Terminable: In deciding an issue never before decided by the court, the Supreme Court, in action by distributor for breach of wine distributorship contract by wine broker who terminated the contract, which had no termination provision, adopted the "modern majority rule" that when a distributorship contract has no termination provision, it is terminable at will only after a reasonable amount of time and upon reasonable notice. The court held that the rule applied where, as in the case at hand, the distributor had made a substantial investment in establishing or furthering the distributorship. The court deferred to the trier of fact on the issue of what a reasonable amount of time is, stating that absent an abuse of discretion the Supreme Court would not interfere. In the present case, the court upheld the lower court's decision that 24 months was a reasonable amount of time. Bronken's Good Time Co. v. J. W. Brown & Associates, 203 M 427, 661 P2d 861, 40 St. Rep. 549 (1983), followed in Moats Trucking Co., Inc. v. Gallatin Dairies, Inc., 231 M 474, 753 P2d 883, 45 St. Rep. 772 (1988).

Engagement Ring Given in Contemplation of Marriage Not Considered Gift — Conditional Gift Analysis: Albinger gave Harris a $29,000 diamond engagement ring when the two promised to marry. The relationship was strained, resulting in breakups and the return of the ring to Albinger several times, but each time the couple reconciled, and the ring was returned to Harris. Following their final separation, Albinger told Harris to "take the car, the horse, the dog, and the ring", so Harris moved to Kentucky, marriage plans evaporated, and Harris refused to return the ring. Albinger filed in District Court to settle ownership of the ring. The District Court found the ring to be a gift in contemplation of marriage, implying that the existence of a condition attached to the gift, and held that Albinger was entitled to return of the ring upon failure of the condition of marriage. Harris appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The rights and duties of parties regarding property exchanges in contemplation of marriage are determined by existing law and common-law principles. A gift is a transfer of personal property made voluntarily and without consideration, and the essential elements of an inter vivos gift are donative intent, voluntary delivery, and acceptance by the recipient. Delivery, which manifests the intent of the giver, must turn over dominion and control of the property to the recipient, and when made without condition, such a gift becomes irrevocable upon acceptance, so the Supreme Court will not void the transfer when the giver experiences a change of heart. The only revocable gift recognized under Montana law is a gift in view of death, and a gift causa mortis may be revoked by the giver at any time and is revoked by the giver's recovery from the illness or escape from the peril under which the gift was made. However, the Supreme Court declined to analogize gifts in contemplation of marriage with a gift in contemplation of death. Further, a purported gift that is part of the inducement for an agreement to do or not do a certain thing becomes the consideration essential to contract formation. An exchange of promises creates a contract to marry, albeit an unenforceable one, so when an engagement ring is given as consideration for the promise to marry, a contract is formed and legal action to recover the ring is barred by the abolition of breach of promise actions in 27-1-602. Here, the engagement ring was an unconditional, completed gift upon acceptance, and a completed gift is not revocable. Thus, the ring remained in Harris's ownership and control. Albinger v. Harris, 2002 MT 118, 310 M 27, 48 P3d 711 (2002).

Contract Principles Inapplicable to Lease: The Supreme Court rejected an argument that the lease in issue should have been treated as a contract rather than a conveyance of an interest in land, stating that the case involved a lease, not a contract to make a lease. Knight v. OMI Corp., 174 M 72, 568 P2d 552 (1977).

Letter as Contract: A letter signed by contractor and written to owner of property stating the maximum cost of the construction of a house for purpose of permitting the owner to obtain a G.I. loan constituted a contract. Higby v. Hooper, 124 M 331, 221 P2d 1043 (1950).

Allegation of Contract: Complaint alleging that defendants agreed to sell for a specified consideration and that plaintiffs agreed to purchase, together with other averments in the complaint, contained a sufficient allegation of a contract. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

A Contract as a Voluntary Obligation: The terms "contracts" and "engagements" have much the same meaning, the latter being sometimes defined as quasi contracts. Each denotes a voluntarily assumed obligation and does not include torts. Capital Nat'l Bank of St. Paul v. Bartley, 101 M 591, 56 P2d 728 (1936).

Quasi-Contract: Where one has received money which, though not bound to do so by express contract, he in equity and good conscience ought to turn over to him from whom he received it, the law implies a promise on his part to that effect, and the obligation thus created or implied by law is termed a "quasi-contract", as distinguished from a contract as defined in this section and 28-2-102. Schaeffer v. Miller, 41 M 417, 109 P 970 (1910), distinguished in Keith v. Kottas, 119 M 98, 172 P2d 306 (1946).

Common-Law Definition: This section contains nothing more than the common-law definition of the term contract, and is manifestly intended to apply only to those obligations which arise immediately out of dealings between the parties, and not to that sort of contract which arises remotely out of the compact of government. Oppenheimer v. Regan, 32 M 110, 79 P 695 (1905).

Attorney General's Opinions

Deed Not a Contract: A contract, as defined in this section, is "an agreement to do or not do a certain thing". A deed, on the other hand, is not a contract. A deed is a written conveyance of realty, signed by the grantor, whereby title to realty is transferred from one to another. 35 A.G. Op. 65 (1974).

PARTIES

Persons Not Parties to Contract — Right to Attorney Fees Under Contract Granting Them: When suit is brought under a contract providing for attorney fees to the prevailing party, persons who are not parties to the contract are not entitled to attorney fees, either under the contract or a statutory attorney fees provision. Where persons who were not parties to a contract by which a business was sold guaranteed payment of the purchase price, a guarantee which they had no intention of honoring, it was error to award them attorney fees upon finding that they were not liable under the guarantee because they received no consideration from plaintiff seller of the business for their guarantee. Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163, 39 St. Rep. 1923 (1982).

Meeting of Minds: It is axiomatic that a person cannot contract with himself. There must be the meeting of two separate and independent minds, at least two parties to a contract, and each must be competent. Gordon Campbell Petroleum Co. v. Gordon Campbell-Kevin Synd., 75 M 261, 242 P 540 (1926).

CONSENT

Meeting of Minds Required: Parties to a quiet title action engaged in a settlement discussion that caused one party to believe they had reached a settlement agreement. The District Court enforced the agreement as a contract. The Supreme Court reversed, finding that there was not a meeting of the minds. Jarussi v. Sandra L. Farber Trust, 209 MT 181, 396 Mont. 488, 445 P.3d 1226.

Termination of Policy — Express Disclaimer in Manual and Handbook — Policy Not Part of Employment Contract: A hospital discontinued a policy whereby it paid employees for their sick leave after 25 years of service. Employees with less than 25 years of service sued the hospital for breach of their employment contract. The hospital moved for summary judgment, arguing that the policy was not a part of the employment contract. It emphasized that the hospital's policy and procedure manual, as well as its employee handbook, explicitly provided that its policies could be amended, modified, or terminated at any time. The District Court granted the hospital summary judgment and the plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that the express disclaimers in the hospital's manual and handbook clearly expressed its intention not to be contractually bound to the policy. Chipman v. NW. Healthcare Corp., 2014 MT 15, 373 Mont. 360, 317 P.3d 182.

Letters of Offer and Acceptance on Real Property Sale Exchanged — Terms of Response Immaterial — Contract for Sale Enforced by Specific Performance: Two sisters owned 78 acres as tenants in common. The defendant sister, who held a majority interest, sent a letter to the plaintiff sister, offering to sell her the majority interest or to purchase the minority interest. The letter set a deadline for a response and requested it be sent to a specified third party. Before the deadline expired, the plaintiff sister wrote back directly to her sister and agreed to purchase the majority interest. However, the defendant sister claimed she had decided to sell the property to their brother. The plaintiff sister sued, seeking specific performance of the contract. The defendant sister argued that the plaintiff had not accepted the original offer because she had not responded to the third party as requested. The District Court concluded that, as phrased in the letter, the request to direct the response to the third party was not a condition precedent to acceptance. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the letters exchanged by the sisters formed a contract and that the mode of acceptance was not a condition precedent. The court affirmed the District Court's grant of specific performance ordering the defendant sister to sell her majority interest to the plaintiff. Olsen v. Johnston, 2013 MT 25, 368 Mont. 347, 301 P.3d 791.

Question Whether Parties Consented to Contract — Material Fact Precluding Summary Judgment: The District Court determined that defendant did not consent to a title policy, so the contract was invalid and defendant was entitled to summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the issue of whether and when plaintiff instructed defendant to issue the title policy in plaintiff's name was a material fact that was disputed by the parties. The extent and nature of the parties' consents are questions of fact that must be first determined, so summary judgment was inappropriate and the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Amerimont, Inc. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2009 MT 212, 351 M 292, 210 P3d 691 (2009).

Change in Credit Agreement Via "Bill Stuffer" Insufficient Notice on Which Unilateral Change to Contract Acceptable — Enforcement of Arbitration Clause: Defendant issued plaintiff a credit card and subsequently sent a "bill stuffer" with plaintiff's monthly statement that significantly changed the terms of the credit agreement. The change provided for arbitration of all credit disputes and prohibited jury trials and class actions. When plaintiff later filed a claim against defendant for multiple fair debt collections, defendant attempted to compel arbitration, asserting that plaintiff agreed to the credit agreement change through plaintiff's continued use of the credit card. The District Court agreed with defendant, issued an order compelling arbitration, and dismissed plaintiff's action. Plaintiff appealed and the Supreme Court reversed. Making a change in the credit agreement through use of a "bill stuffer" did not provide sufficient consumer notice on which acceptance of a unilateral change to a contract of adhesion could expressly or implicitly be found, including plaintiff's waiver of the fundamental constitutional right to a jury trial. The case was reversed for further proceedings. Kortum-Managhan v. Herbergers NBGL, 2009 MT 79, 349 M 475, 204 P3d 693 (2009), followed in Riehl v. Cambridge Ct. GF, LLC, 2010 MT 28, 355 Mont. 161, 226 P.3d 581, and following Keesun Partners v. Ferdig Oil Co., Inc., 249 M 331, 816 P2d 417 (1991). See also Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002).

No Entitlement to Severance Benefits Following Rejection of Severance Package: Patterson's job was eliminated through a corporate restructuring, and Patterson was offered a severance package that was conditioned upon the release of all claims against the employer. Patterson declined the severance package and instead filed an employment discrimination claim against the employer. When the claim failed about 1 year later, Patterson signed the severance agreement and mailed it to the employer, who refused to honor it. Patterson then sued, claiming entitlement to the severance benefits. Following discovery, the District Court granted summary judgment for the employer. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The severance contract offer could no longer be considered valid because there was no mutual consent between the parties and because Patterson sought to accept the severance contract after violating the release provision. An acceptance upon terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer. Unless the party who made the original offer renews it or assents to a modification, an offeree cannot later revive a contract through acceptance after rejecting the offer. Patterson's purported acceptance was at best a counteroffer that the employer did not accept, so no contract arose between the parties as to severance, and Patterson was not entitled to severance benefits. Patterson v. Verizon Wireless, 2005 MT 261, 329 M 79, 122 P3d 1193 (2005).

Contract to Arbitrate Not Formed by Employee Handbook and Employee's Acknowledgment — Ambiguous Arbitration Provisions: When Hubner began working for defendant communications company, she signed an acknowledgment in an employee handbook that contained an arbitration provision. The arbitration clause provided that all controversies would be subject to binding arbitration, but the clauses in the handbook specified that the handbook did not constitute a contract of employment or create any relationship other than an employment-at-will relationship. When Hubner's employment was subsequently terminated, she brought a state claim for wrongful discharge, and defendant moved for a summary disposition compelling arbitration pursuant to 27-5-115. The District Court agreed with Hubner that there was no agreement to arbitrate and denied the motion, so defendant appealed. Defendant argued that because the arbitration clause was separable, it could be independently enforced. A state contract law defense that goes to the entire contract rather than specifically to an arbitration clause does not defeat a motion to compel arbitration; however, when a defense is aimed directly at the arbitration provision rather than the entire contract, state law contract defenses may be applied to hold that no enforceable agreement to arbitrate was made. Further, acceptance or consent by the party against whom a contract is sought to be enforced is required before a contract is enforceable. The language in the handbook was ambiguous and construed against the drafter. The ambiguity prevented Hubner from knowing and accepting that she was agreeing to binding arbitration by signing the handbook. Thus, no contract to arbitrate was formed by virtue of the handbook and Hubner's acknowledgment, even when the arbitration provision was considered separately from the rest of the handbook. The District Court was affirmed. Hubner v. Cutthroat Communications, Inc., 2003 MT 333, 318 M 421, 80 P3d 1256 (2003).

Mental Weakness Short of Incapacity Not Sufficient to Invalidate Premarital Agreement: When Mary and Larry were married, Mary was 21 and developmentally disabled and Larry was 62 and in poor health. Larry had three children from a previous marriage. Two days before the marriage, Mary and Larry signed a prenuptial agreement prepared by Larry's attorney that provided that each would keep the individual's separate property, whether owned then or acquired thereafter, free from any claim of the other by virtue of the marriage. Two years later, Larry died, and Mary brought an action to challenge the enforcement of the premarital agreement on grounds that, because of her disability, she was incapable of understanding the agreement and thus could not have given the required consent. The District Court found that Mary was mentally competent to understand the agreement when she signed it and that the contract was valid. The Supreme Court applied Gen. Motors v. Jackson, 900 P2d 345 (Nev. 1995), for the proposition that a person is mentally defective for purposes of capacity when the party, for any reason, is incapable of understanding the force and effect of the agreement, but that a mere mental weakness short of incapacity does not invalidate the agreement because capacity deals with the ability to understand the terms of the agreement, not a person's actual understanding. Capacity relates to the status of the person rather than the circumstances surrounding the transaction. Mary attended special education classes, but nevertheless graduated from high school. She could read and write, although poorly, and could drive a car, although she had no license. Absent any medical or expert testimony regarding Mary's level of competency, the District Court relied on lay testimony, including Mary's, to determine whether Mary met the burden of establishing incompetence. Substantial evidence supported the court's conclusion that Mary failed to meet her burden of proof, and the Supreme Court affirmed the validity of the premarital contract. Wilkes v. Estate of Wilkes, 2001 MT 118, 305 M 335, 27 P3d 433 (2001).

Lack of Consent by All Owners to Purchase Real Property — Contract Unenforceable: Thornton offered to purchase certain real property by executing a buy/sell agreement. The evidence showed that Thornton knew that half of the property was held in trust by Norwest and half was owned by Songstad and her sisters. Thornton obtained the signature of Songstad (representing her sisters) on the buy/sell agreement, but not that of Norwest. Citing Weigand v. Mt. Land & Real Estate Inv., Inc., 223 M 137, 724 P2d 194 (1986), and Rase v. Castle Mtn. Ranch, Inc., 193 M 209, 631 P2d 680 (1981), the Supreme Court held that even though Thornton intended to purchase 100% of the interests in the property, he did not obtain consent for the sale of 100%. Therefore, no contract was formed and specific performance was unavailable to require the sale of the property. Thornton v. Songstad, 263 M 390, 868 P2d 633, 51 St. Rep. 104 (1994), followed in Austin v. Cash, 274 M 54, 906 P2d 669, 52 St. Rep. 1119 (1995).

Claim of Economic Duress — Showing of Lack of Free Will Necessary: A claim of economic duress requires a showing that the contract at issue was made under circumstances evincing a lack of free will on the part of the contracting parties. It is not sufficient to show that consent was secured by the pressure of financial circumstances or that one of the parties merely insisted on its legal right. Aldrich & Co. v. Donovan, 238 M 431, 778 P2d 397, 46 St. Rep. 1393 (1989), following Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988), and followed in Hoven v. First Bank (N.A.)-Billings, 244 M 229, 797 P2d 915, 47 St. Rep. 1563 (1990), and Stanley v. Holms, 1999 MT 41, 293 M 343, 975 P2d 1242, 56 St. Rep. 178 (1999). See also Somersille v. Columbia Falls Aluminum Co., 255 M 101, 841 P2d 483, 49 St. Rep. 904 (1992), and Hughes v. Pullman, 2001 MT 216, 306 M 420, 36 P3d 339 (2001).

Offer and Acceptance:

Wife offered to convey shares of stock to husband to satisfy a dissolution judgment, but husband did not accept her offer; he merely agreed to consider it. Husband subsequently rejected wife's offer because of negative tax consequences associated with the transfer. There can be no binding contract without the mutual consent of the parties, and consent is established if there has been an offer and an acceptance of that offer. In re Marriage of Dalley, 237 M 287, 773 P2d 295, 46 St. Rep. 808 (1989).

In order to effect a contract there must be an offer by one party and an unconditional acceptance of it by the other party. Kuchinski v. Sec. Gen. Ins. Co., 141 M 515, 380 P2d 889 (1963).

Economic Duress Not Established: Economic duress is not established merely by proof that consent was secured by the pressure of financial circumstances or by the fact that one party insisted upon a legal right and the other party yielded to such insistence. Where plaintiffs were forced to continue to refinance because of inability to pay their loans and consequent threat of bank foreclosure, there is no "economic duress" that will void the loan contract. Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, Inc., 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988).

Ignorance of Contract Contents Not Grounds for Relief From Liability: One who executes a written contract is presumed to know its contents and to assent to them. Ignorance of the contents is not grounds for relief from liability. Johnson v. Estate of Shelton, 232 M 85, 754 P2d 828, 45 St. Rep. 887 (1988), citing Quinn v. Briggs, 172 M 468, 565 P2d 297 (1977).

Buyer Failed to Sign Closing Agreement — No Consent: The court properly granted specific performance of the buy-sell agreement to the sellers of real property without reference to the proposed closing agreement. That agreement was not signed by the buyer and is not enforceable without his consent. Hillstrom v. O'Neil, 226 M 452, 736 P2d 126, 44 St. Rep. 795 (1987).

"Earnest Money Receipt and Agreement to Sell and Purchase" — Not Legally Enforceable Contract Without Consent: Plaintiffs made an offer to purchase certain property, provided $1 earnest money, and signed an "Earnest Money Receipt and Agreement to Sell and Purchase". Sellers never signed the agreement, acquired another prospective buyer, and returned the earnest money. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's finding that since the sellers never accepted the offer to purchase, under this section no contract existed. The court further noted that to find the offer to be a contract would be contrary to black letter contract law and would "wreck [sic] havoc on the real estate business". Weigand v. Mont. Land & Real Estate Inv., Inc., 223 M 137, 724 P2d 194, 43 St. Rep. 1595 (1986), followed in Thornton v. Songstad, 263 M 390, 868 P2d 633, 51 St. Rep. 104 (1994).

Later Agreement on Alleged Ambiguity — Ratification: Plaintiff offered to buy defendants' ranch. After much negotiation, plaintiff paid earnest money, for which he received a receipt, and the parties entered into a buy-sell agreement on April 20, 1981. The April 20, 1981, buy-sell agreement contained all the essential elements of a contract. The closing documents prepared by defendants' attorney did not correspond to the April 20 agreement. On May 15, 1981, the parties met and plaintiff was again presented with closing documents not corresponding to the April 20 agreement. A dispute arose over a clause releasing a parcel of land up to 320 acres to plaintiff for building purposes on the date of closing. Plaintiff agreed to defendants' interpretation at the May 15 meeting. On May 20, 1981, plaintiff received a third set of closing documents not reflecting the April 20 or May 15 meetings. On June 2, the parties met and defendants presented new terms, one of which was transferring title to the real property in 1981 rather than in 1982, destroying plaintiff's planned income tax advantages, one of his reasons for buying the ranch. Defendants claimed the land was required to be transferred at the time the cattle were transferred or grazing permits would be lost. A Forest Service official informed defendants in a June 3, 1981, letter that three alternatives existed. At the end of a June 5, 1981, meeting, plaintiff's attorney prepared a contract based on the April 20 buy-sell, the May 15 interpretation of the release, and the June 5 meeting. On June 12, plaintiff signed the contract and attached a check for the downpayment. Defendants refused to sign, and suit was filed on July 2, 1982. The District Court held that a valid contract existed and that defendants had breached the contract. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the buy-sell contained all the essential elements of a contract. The court held that the release clause appeared unambiguous. The evidence presented showed that the parties' differing interpretations of the language were resolved and agreement on the clause was reached at the May 15, 1981, meeting. Under 28-2-304, a contract voidable for want of due consent may be ratified by subsequent consent. The May 15 agreement was held to be a ratification. Any delay in performance on plaintiff's part was due to defendants' failure to prepare documents conforming to the agreed-upon contract. The District Court was affirmed. Ehly v. Cady, 212 M 82, 687 P2d 687, 41 St. Rep. 1611 (1984).

Novation of Lease — New Lessee's Obligation Not Affected by His Ownership Rights: Franchisor took possession of franchise after franchisee indicated a desire to sell the franchise. To make the franchise more attractive to prospective purchasers, franchisor agreed with Godwin, who had leased equipment to the franchise, to make the rental payments on the equipment if Godwin would forgo repossession of the equipment. In a proceeding involving right to possession of the equipment and recovery of rental payments, although franchisor claimed a right under the Uniform Commercial Code to possession of the equipment under its security agreement with franchisee, the lower court correctly found franchisor liable for rent. That franchisor may have been entitled to possession did not preclude it from making a binding agreement with Godwin to take over franchisee's rental payments. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

Written Public Contract Bid — Oral Acknowledgment of Part — Meeting of Minds: The State's solicitation for bids for construction of building provided that the bid acknowledge receipt of any addenda. The State accepted the bid of a contractor that did not make the acknowledgment in its bid. The evidence that the State phoned the contractor regarding two addenda and contractor stated it knew of them and had begun preparation for fulfilling them was adequate to show that contractor had actual knowledge of the addenda and showed there was a meeting of the minds as to their existence and the requirements for fulfillment of their terms. Martel Constr., Inc. v. Bd. of Examiners, 205 M 332, 668 P2d 222, 40 St. Rep. 1340 (1983).

Executed Oral Agreement — Meeting of Minds Required: The parties entered into an agreement for the lease of a truck. The lease agreement contained a noncancellation provision and provided alternative remedies to the lessor in the event of a default. Lessee returned the truck with current payments to lessor prior to the termination date of the lease. Lessor had to make repairs to the truck. Lessee contended the return was a fully executed oral contract to terminate the lease. Lessor contended that termination was dependent on the condition of the truck. There was substantial evidence to support the finding that there was no meeting of the minds and therefore no agreement to terminate the lease. Diede v. Davis, 203 M 205, 661 P2d 838, 40 St. Rep. 394 (1983).

Claims Examiner Not Authorized to Make Final Workers' Compensation Settlement for State Fund: Claimant was injured at work in 1973. Her employer was enrolled under Workers' Compensation Plan No. 3. State fund accepted liability and paid some compensation to claimant. For 1½ years state fund negotiated with claimant to reach a final settlement of claimant's disability benefits. Claimant was represented by counsel, and the negotiations were conducted through a claims examiner with state fund who was supervised by the state fund bureau chief. In March 1981, the parties reached a tentative settlement. Claimant and her lawyer signed a petition for full and final compromise settlement. When the petition was presented to the state fund bureau chief, he rejected it as being excessive and beyond the liability of the state as an insurer. Claimant brought the matter to the Workers' Compensation Court where she claimed that she had entered into a binding final agreement with state fund. The Supreme Court affirmed the Workers' Compensation Court ruling that no binding contract was created because the state fund bureau chief had not consented to the terms and the claims examiner had neither actual nor ostensible authority to bind the state fund to a settlement contract. Christenson v. Billings Livestock Comm'n Co., 201 M 207, 653 P2d 492, 39 St. Rep. 2060 (1982).

Option Agreement — Sufficiency of Consent and Consideration: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that the writing involved was not an option agreement because it failed to meet the essential requirements for the validity of a contract. In particular, he contended that there was a lack of consent and that the consideration was legally insufficient. The Supreme Court found the actual payment of $1 and actual participation in a family corporate dissolution sufficient consideration for the agreement. A memorandum here acted as an offer, and a binding agreement resulted from action on that offer by the offeree. The trial court was affirmed. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981), followed in Hetherington v. Ford Motor Co., 257 M 395, 849 P2d 1039, 50 St. Rep. 325 (1993), which was distinguished in Murphy v. The Home Depot, 2012 MT 23, 364 Mont. 27, 270 P.3d 72.

Finality of Workers' Compensation Decision — Grounds for Overturning: A full and final compromise settlement agreement between an injured worker and the Workers' Compensation State Fund was set aside because of mutual mistake of material fact by both parties. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), distinguished in Sollie v. Travelers Indem. Co., 212 M 197, 686 P2d 920, 41 St. Rep. 1684 (1984). A petition for rehearing was filed. The Supreme Court reaffirmed the decision. The petitioner argued the Workers' Compensation Court had no power to alter or rescind the agreement 4 years after its execution. The Supreme Court pointed out that it, not the Workers' Compensation Court, set aside the agreement. It noted the scope of its appellate power and also the code provision on lack of consent through mutual mistake of material fact. The Supreme Court was not broadening the possibilities of reopening such settlements; it merely found that no contract existed initially. Kienas v. Peterson, 38 St. Rep. 320 (1981) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports or Pacific 2d Reporter).

Mutual Assent on Elements of Contract — Raising at Trial Level: Plaintiff and defendants entered a buy-sell agreement for a parcel of land owned by defendants. From the filing of the complaint to eventual trial, both parties contended that the buy-sell was valid and enforceable against the other. The issue at trial was not the validity of the contract but whether it included certain alleged easements. Plaintiff was granted specific performance. On appeal, defendants contended that the parties had never agreed on the same terms, that there was no mutual assent or meeting of the minds, and therefore no enforceable contract. Because this contention had not been raised at the trial level, it could not be considered on appeal. Chadwick v. Giberson, 190 M 88, 618 P2d 1213, 37 St. Rep. 1723 (1980).

Contract Barred at Law as in Equity: The legal deficiencies of inadequacy of consideration and lack of consent are equally applicable to bar enforcement of a written contract at law as in equity. Schlegel v. Moorhead, 177 M 456, 582 P2d 336 (1978).

Bilateral Agreement: To constitute a bilateral agreement, the parties must have given their free and voluntary assent to the terms, which is a question of fact. Babcock v. Engel, 58 M 597, 194 P 137 (1920).

OBJECT

Limited Exceptions for Only One Party Insufficient to Render Arbitration Clause Facially Unconscionable: A contract between the defendant-appellee and a third-party provider ("TPP") of home automation products allowing remote control over property access, HVAC, and hot water systems included a clause requiring the parties to arbitrate disputes, with two narrow exceptions, both of which would allow the TPP to seek relief in court in lieu of arbitration. The District Court held that the arbitration clause was unenforceable because the exceptions unreasonably favored the TPP, resulting in a lack of mutuality. The Supreme Court disagreed and upheld the arbitration clause. The two exceptions allowed the TPP to join the defendant-appellee as a third-party defendant for purposes of enforcing the contract indemnification provisions and allowed the TPP to seek injunctive relief if the defendant-appellee breached the contract with respect to the TPP's intellectual property, proprietary rights, or business reputation. The Supreme Court held that the defendant-appellee and TPP were dissimilarly situated such that the defendant-appellee had no need for either of the narrow exceptions. Therefore, the limited exceptions being available only for the TPP was insufficient to show the arbitration agreement was lacking in mutual consideration or was otherwise unconscionable. Stowe v. Big Sky Vacation Rentals, Inc., 2019 MT 288, 398 Mont. 91, 454 P.3d 655.

Sufficient Evidence of Implied Contract to Preclude Summary Judgment — City Ordinance Not Bar to Liability: The plaintiffs sued the city of Dillon for damages after their water service was interrupted, claiming breach of contract, negligence, and infliction of emotional distress. The District Court granted summary judgment to the city, reasoning that no contract existed between the parties because the city commission never approved a contract for the plaintiffs' water service, as required by a city ordinance, and the plaintiffs' claims were barred by a city ordinance that provided that the city could shut off water and avoid liability for the resulting interruption of water service. The Supreme Court reversed. The city's conduct manifested the existence of a contract to furnish water to the plaintiffs' lot, and therefore the city was estopped from asserting that no contract existed. Because the city ordinance that bars claims arising from a break in water service applies only to situations in which the city decides to shut off water services, rather than when water is shut off from a creek and main line freezing as occurred in this case, summary judgment for the city was not appropriate. Conner v. Dillon, 2012 MT 21, 364 Mont. 8, 270 P.3d 75.

Timely Exercise of Third-Party Option to Purchase Real Property — No Breach of Buy-Sell Agreement: A provision in a buy-sell agreement between Palmer and Bahm allowed a third party 72 hours after the Palmer-Bahm agreement was signed to decide whether to purchase a strip of land from Bahm that was contained in the parcel covered by the agreement. Although the third party did not complete the transaction or enter into a separate buy-sell agreement within 72 hours, the buy-sell agreement required only that a purchase decision be made within 72 hours. Uncontroverted evidence showed that the third party made a timely decision to purchase the strip and communicated that decision to Bahm, so Bahm did not violate the agreement with Palmer or break the covenant of good faith and fair dealing by selling the strip to the third party. Palmer v. Bahm, 2006 MT 29, 331 M 105, 128 P3d 1031 (2006).

Failure of Teacher to Exhaust Grievance Procedures Required Under Unambiguous Contract — Estoppel Inapplicable Absent Factual Representation of Material Fact — Summary Judgment Proper: When Wurl's speech-language pathology contract was not renewed, Wurl brought an action against the school district alleging that termination procedures were not followed pursuant to a collectively bargained master agreement and also brought claims for wrongful discharge and due process violations. The parties disagreed whether the master agreement applied because Wurl was not certified. The District Court found that the master agreement did not apply and granted summary judgment to the school district, and Wurl appealed. The Supreme Court found that the language of the employment contract unambiguously incorporated the entirety of the master agreement by reference, so the District Court erred in holding otherwise. Wurl also contended that because the District Superintendent had stated that the master agreement did not apply, collateral estoppel should bar the district from asserting that Wurl failed to go through the collectively bargained grievance procedure. On this point, the Supreme Court disagreed. The superintendent's statement was a legal interpretation rather than a factual representation of a material fact, so Wurl failed to prove the first required element of collateral estoppel, and the district was therefore allowed to argue that Wurl's claims should be barred by failure to exhaust the grievance procedure. Because the master agreement applied and Wurl failed to implement the mandatory grievance procedure, Wurl's claims were barred. The Supreme Court affirmed the summary judgment. Wurl v. Polson School District No. 23, 2006 MT 8, 330 M 282, 127 P3d 436 (2006), following Elk Park Ranch, Inc. v. Park County, 282 M 154, 935 P2d 1131 (1997).

Interest Owed on State Highway Right-of-Way Condemnation Agreement Pursuant to Clear Language of Stipulation: The Department of Transportation filed a condemnation action against defendants in connection with a highway construction project. As part of the action, the parties entered a stipulation granting the Department possession of the right-of-way in exchange for $35,780, $11,000 payable immediately and $24,780 still owing, plus interest, at 10% a year, on the final award or settlement from the date of service of summons until the date of withdrawal by defendants. A dispute arose over the amount of interest owed. The District Court applied 70-30-302 and determined that the Department owed interest on $7,187 of the total remainder, the amount of land-leveling costs, which the Department paid. Defendants appealed the order, contending that interest was actually owed on the entire $24,780 remaining settlement. The Supreme Court agreed. The language in the stipulation was clear and unambiguous and required the Department to pay interest on the excess of the final settlement award, which was $24,780. The District Court erred in applying the statute to the exclusion of the actual stipulation language to which the parties agreed. The clear language of the stipulation and the intent of the parties controlled. The case was remanded with instructions to order the Department to pay interest on the entire final settlement, with credit for amounts already paid. St. v. Asbeck, 2003 MT 337, 318 M 431, 80 P3d 1272 (2003).

Modification of Nonexistent Contract Impossible — Minutes of Preconstruction Meeting Inadmissible Extrinsic Evidence Absent Ambiguity in Subsequent Contract: Keeney Construction (Keeney) subcontracted to perform certain construction work for James Talcott Construction Co., Inc. (Talcott). The subcontract stated that time was of the essence, but contained no specific date of completion, Rather, Keeney was to complete the work as directed by Talcott and on Talcott's completion schedule. Keeney asserted that the parties intended a 1996 completion date, but the project was not finished until 1997. Keeney sued for damages for delay and extra work, contending that extrinsic evidence in the form of minutes from a preconstruction meeting, held 2 days before the contract was finalized, would verify the parties' intent and represented an executed oral agreement that modified the written contract. The Supreme Court found no ambiguity in the written contract to warrant further examination of the intent of the parties. Because the intent of the contract was clear, the extrinsic evidence was inadmissible to support the contention that a specific completion date was intended. Keeney could not assert a claim for damages based on Talcott's direction of the timing of the completion of the project when the contract authorized Talcott to do so. Further, because an oral agreement cannot modify a contract that does not yet exist, the meeting and conversations held prior to the contract signing could not be interpreted as a modification of the subsequent written contract. Keeney Constr. v. James Talcott Constr. Co., Inc., 2002 MT 69, 309 M 226, 45 P3d 19 (2002).

Mistaken Valuation of Stock Insufficient Grounds for Rescission of Contract: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds of mistake of fact, arguing that both parties had mistakenly valued stock exchanged during the purchase of another business. The District Court could not rescind a validly formed contract simply because Bitterroot undervalued the stock. A mutual mistake as to value is not necessarily sufficient to rescind a contract (see 17A C.J.S. Contracts §149). The District Court did not err in dismissing the affirmative defense of mistake of fact because the law does not protect a business from its improvident valuation of stock. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Truth Regarding Value of Stock Discoverable by Party Claiming Estoppel — Defense Not Available: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds of equitable estoppel, arguing that stock had been mistakenly valued during the purchase of another business, that Spencer, majority shareholder and president of both Bitterroot and the company that was acquired, relied on Knutson's valuation to Spencer's detriment, and that Spencer was unaware of factors that Knutson failed to consider. Spencer may have been mistaken about the value of the stock, but he was in a position to discover all the information necessary to value it and participated in its valuation. The truth regarding the stocks' value was as discoverable to Spencer as to anyone else, and the District Court did not err in dismissing Bitterroot's defense of equitable estoppel. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000), following Elk Park Ranch, Inc. v. Park County, 282 M 154, 935 P2d 1131 (1997).

Mutual Mistake of Any Material Fact as Warranting Rescission of Workers' Compensation Settlement: South injured her back on the job and underwent surgery twice to correct the problems. She entered into a full and final compromise settlement agreement with her insurer. The agreement listed seven jobs that both parties felt were acceptable for South to do. One of the jobs was massage therapy. South began training as a massage therapist but began experiencing back pain again, forcing her to quit the training and to undergo back surgery a third time. South then petitioned the Workers' Compensation Court to rescind the settlement agreement on grounds of mutual mistake of fact. The court denied her petition, treating the current problem as a new and different injury. The Supreme Court clarified Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1 (1980), in holding that under fundamental contract principles for rescission, a mutual mistake regarding the nature or extent of a claimant's injury is not the only mutual mistake sufficient to set aside a final settlement agreement. Rather, if a party can show a mutual mistake of any material fact that impacts the contract to such an extent that the intended bargain of the parties is defeated, the contract may be rescinded. The operative question is whether a mutual mistake existed that justified rescission, without limitation to how or when the mistake was made. Even though the parties were not mistaken regarding the nature and extent of South's injury at the time that the contract was formed, both parties mistakenly believed that massage therapy was an appropriate job for South to pursue, and she relied on that fact to her detriment. It was error for the Workers' Compensation Court to fail to consider South's contention of mutual mistake regarding the propriety of the job approved for her to do; thus, she was entitled to rescission of the settlement agreement. South v. Transp. Ins. Co., 275 M 397, 913 P2d 233, 53 St. Rep. 196 (1996).

Performance Combined With Terms — Valid Contract: An agreement for development of a mineral interest did not include every item that might have been included with respect to operational aspects; however, the parties performed under the agreement for 3 years. The Supreme Court cited Wilkerson v. School District, 216 M 203, 700 P2d 617, 42 St. Rep. 745 (1985), in holding that a contract is not invalid simply because it does not contain all the provisions or conditions the parties might have incorporated into it. Therefore, performance under the agreement, combined with the actual terms provided, demonstrated the existence of a valid contract. Somont Oil Co., Inc. v. Nutter, 228 M 467, 743 P2d 1016, 44 St. Rep. 1685 (1987).

Option Agreement Upheld — Minor Variations Not Fatal: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. The defendant claimed on appeal that the tender and demand under the option agreement were not a legal tender. Specifically, he contended that the claimed tender actually was a counteroffer, and therefore he was at liberty to ignore it or to impose other terms in response to it. A number of attacks on the actual terms of the "tender and demand" sent by him to the plaintiffs were included in this issue on appeal. Matters that are subsidiary, collateral, or which do not go to the performance of the contract are not essential and do not have to be expressed in the contract. Accordingly, the plaintiffs' obtaining a warranty deed and the signature of the defendant's wife on the deed here, when they had no right to obtain either, was not a fatal variance from the terms of the option agreement. The option agreement did not specify the kind of deed, and in such cases it is presumed that a fee simple is intended to pass. The court noted that the plaintiffs were ready, willing, and able to perform. The demand that the defendant's wife also sign the deed was not such a material variance from the option agreement as to defeat specific performance. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981).

Real Estate Commission — Setting Chain in Motion Required to Collect Commission: Defendant contended that the requirements of a listing agreement were not sufficiently met by plaintiff to allow the collection of her commission. Plaintiff placed an ad in the newspaper, which named an erroneous price. As a result of that ad, the eventual buyer called plaintiff and obtained the location and identification of the property and the sellers. Plaintiff called defendant and advised her of this development. Defendant then negotiated with the buyer and closed the sale. A broker is entitled to his commission if his efforts set in motion a chain of events which finally culminate in the sale of the property. Here, plaintiff set that chain in motion. Barrett v. Ballard, 191 M 39, 622 P2d 180, 37 St. Rep. 2038 (1980), followed in Lane v. Smith, 255 M 218, 841 P2d 1143, 49 St. Rep. 974 (1992), and in Hall & Hall, Inc. v. Hyde, 264 M 190, 870 P2d 1362, 51 St. Rep. 257 (1994).

Application of Liquor Statutes: The sale of an interest in the operation of a bar in which there was no intent to transfer any interest in the liquor license was not contrary to the provisions of liquor statutes and did not constitute an illegal contract. Johnstone v. Svejkovsky, 170 M 504, 554 P2d 1329 (1976).

CONSIDERATION

Arbitration Requirement Not Void or Unconscionable Under Circumstances: A former financial advisor sought to have an arbitration agreement set aside under theories of lack of mutuality, lack of explicit waiver of Montana constitutional rights, and unconscionability. Upon review of the case and after extensive discussion of its circumstances, the Supreme Court disagreed with all such contentions. Bucy v. Edward Jones & Co., 2019 MT 173, 396 Mont. 408, 445 P.3d 812.

Easement Road Maintenance Agreement — Essential Elements of Contract — Agreement Enforceable: Easement owners and landowners entered into a road maintenance agreement for which the landowners did not receive any remuneration. Later, when the easement owners filed suit against the landowners for breach of the agreement, the District Court ruled that the agreement was not enforceable because of a lack of consideration. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that the District Court had erred when it concluded that the agreement was not enforceable. The Supreme Court concluded that because the landowners also used the easement road, they received a conferred benefit in its maintenance, and therefore the agreement contained the essential elements of a contract. Low v. Reick, 2016 MT 167, 384 Mont. 101, 376 P.3d 777.

Landowner Subdivision Rights Precluded by Restrictive Covenants — No Oral Contract Without Consideration — Statute of Frauds Applied: Plaintiffs subdivided about 80 acres into a 40-acre water ski lake and five residential lots. Restrictive covenants provided that no more than six landowners would be allowed to use the lake, that five landowners would be owners of lots in the subdivision, and that one landowner would be the owner of a single family dwelling built on property immediately west of the lake. Plaintiffs initially intended to build on the west side of the lake and become the sixth landowner but changed their minds, sold the west side property, and decided to build on the south side instead. Four of the five landowners filed an affidavit that when they purchased their lots, they understood that plaintiffs would be the sixth landowner and that they had orally approved the relocation of plaintiffs' residence to the south shore. After plaintiffs' home was built on the south side, they sought a declaratory judgment that they were the sixth landowner under the restrictive covenants and thus had the right to use the lake. One dissenting landowner opposed the declaratory judgment and moved for summary judgment on grounds that the restrictive covenants prohibited plaintiffs from use of the lake. The District Court agreed and granted summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that there was no evidence of consideration given to the landowners for modification of the covenants and that as a result, the modification benefited plaintiffs only. The right to use the lake ran with the land and was therefore a real property interest, and under the statute of frauds, any transfer of the right from one parcel to another had to be in writing or altered by an executed oral agreement. However, without consideration, there could be no oral contract, and without an oral contract, there could be no executed oral contract. Plaintiffs' argument that because they relied on oral agreements, equitable estoppel should prohibit defendants from denying plaintiffs' use of the lake also failed because equitable estoppel does not apply under the statute of frauds except when the statute would operate to perpetuate a fraud. The District Court was affirmed. Hanson v. Water Ski Mania Estates, 2005 MT 47, 326 M 154, 108 P3d 481 (2005).

Reciprocal Rights and Obligations Considered Sufficient Consideration to Sustain Shareholders' Agreement: Following his termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay on grounds of insufficient consideration, contending that the essential consideration for the shareholders' agreement was the exchange of stocks of equal value—an argument based on the premise that the stock exchange and the shareholders' agreement were one agreement. However, the shareholders' agreement was enforceable independent of the stock exchange between the parties, and the creation of reciprocal rights and obligations among the shareholders was sufficient consideration to sustain the shareholders' agreement; thus, the District Court did not err in concluding that the consideration was sufficient. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Materiality of Claim of Failure of Consideration to Contract Required Before Rescission Available as Remedy — Partial Failure of Consideration — Meltdown of Ice Cream Distributorship Agreement: Under Johnson v. Meiers, 118 M 258, 164 P2d 1012 (1946), a breach that goes to only part of the consideration, that is incidental and subordinate to the main purpose of the contract, and that may be compensated in damages does not warrant rescission. The injured party is still bound to perform that party's part of the contract, and the only remedy for the breach consists of the damages suffered from the breach. By contrast, under Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990), a party may rescind if, through the fault of the other party, consideration fails in whole or in part. In clarifying the disparate holdings, the Supreme Court noted that the term "failure of consideration", as either a claim or an affirmative defense, does not relate to the absence of consideration or whether there is good consideration for the formation of a valid, enforceable contract, but rather the term pertains to the failure of one party's performance, which then suspends or excuses the performance of the other party pursuant to the terms of a valid contract. Failure of consideration is generally synonymous with a material breach of performance of a contract, rather than whether a contract was enforceable because of the absence of the essential element of consideration. Thus, a claim or affirmative defense of failure of consideration that gives rise to the equitable remedy of rescission requires a showing by the claiming party that the other party's failure to perform was, in fact, material to the contract, and whether consideration was sufficient or good is immaterial. To reconcile this holding with 28-2-1711, the court went on to hold that failure of part of a promised performance may warrant rescission, but only if the claiming party proves that the deficient part of the other party's performance was material to the contract. If the failure to perform was not material, rescission is not an available remedy, performance cannot be excused, and the claiming party "may only be entitled to money damages for breach". Here, the District Court erred when it did not determine whether Norwood's failure to assign an ice cream distributor agreement to Service Distributing, Inc. (SDI), was material to the transaction as a whole. Absent that finding, SDI could not as a matter of law rescind the contract and be excused from further performance of its obligation to Norwood, so the case was remanded to determine whether a material breach occurred. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000). See also Flaig v. Gramm, 1999 MT 181, 295 M 297, 983 P2d 396, 56 St. Rep. 710 (1999).

Consideration Under Contract Creating Relationship of Lender and Approved Dealer for Making Housing Loans: A contract between the parties created a relationship of Green Tree Financial Corporation (Green Tree) as "lender" and Larson, doing business as Majestic Homes, Inc. (Majestic), as "approved dealer", for purposes of making federal housing loans pursuant to federal Housing and Urban Development (HUD) regulations. Majestic submitted an application to become an approved dealer, and Green Tree then approved Majestic as a dealer and required Majestic to enter into a dealer agreement that included terms expressly provided for by HUD regulations. In order to become and remain an approved dealer, Majestic promised to operate pursuant to HUD regulations—something that it was not otherwise obligated to do in the course of its business. Complying with HUD regulations and meeting other requirements of Green Tree constituted good consideration on the part of Majestic. In return for Majestic's conformance to federal regulations and a security interest in Majestic's assets, Green Tree agreed to perform a service for Majestic by reviewing and approving or rejecting credit applications that Majestic submitted on behalf of its customers. Majestic was allowed to hold itself out as an approved dealer, which provided a competitive advantage in the manufactured home business. The arrangement constituted a contractual relationship whereby the parties exchanged valuable consideration and was enforceable. This relationship is distinguishable from an indefinite requirements or output contract in which there is no exchange of obligations and no establishment of a lender-dealer relationship. Larson v. Green Tree Financial Corp., 1999 MT 157, 295 M 110, 983 P2d 357, 56 St. Rep. 618 (1999). See also Linn v. City County Health Dept., 1999 MT 235, 296 M 145, 988 P2d 302, 56 St. Rep. 922 (1999).

Equipment Rental Agreement Creating Presumption of Consideration — Burden of Proof: Carl Weissman & Sons (CWS) agreed to rent a rock drill to D&L Thomas Equipment (D&L). A clause in the rental agreement required D&L to inspect the drill and notify CWS within 10 days specifying any defects and provided that if CWS was not notified, the drill would be conclusively presumed to have been accepted in its condition at the time of receipt. D&L contended that there were problems with the drill immediately after it was received, but did not notify CWS in writing within the 10-day period specified in the rental agreement. D&L asserted that because the drill malfunctioned and overheated, there was failure of consideration on CWS's part, rendering the agreement void. Under this section, the burden to prove failure of consideration was borne by D&L. Absent notification of defects, D&L accepted the drill in its condition upon receipt, so the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's decision that there was sufficient consideration in the contract between the parties. Carl Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. D&L Thomas Equip. Corp., 1998 MT 213, 290 M 433, 963 P2d 1263, 55 St. Rep. 896 (1998).

Agreement to Convey Partnership Property Void for Lack of Consideration — Agreement to Fund and Forbearance in Dissolving Partnership Held Insufficient: Marsha and Mac formed M&M Walkers, a partnership for the breeding, raising, training, and marketing of Tennessee Walker horses. Their partnership agreement was oral and was sealed with a handshake. When Marsha became concerned about the amount of time and money that she was putting into the partnership, Mac executed a written conveyance of his share of partnership property, which said that if anything happened to him, Marsha was to get all the partnership property. After Mac died, Marsha tried to enforce Mac's written statement against his estate, but the District Court held the statement to be invalid for lack of consideration. The Supreme Court held that while the written instrument is presumptive evidence of consideration, that presumption could be rebutted by Mac's estate, which sought to invalidate the statement. Marsha contended that her agreement to continue funding the partnership was sufficient consideration, but the Supreme Court held that because she had a legal duty to contribute to the partnership in accordance with her share of the profits, her "agreement" was not sufficient consideration. Marsha also argued that her forbearance from dissolving the partnership was also sufficient consideration. Citing Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163 (1982), the Supreme Court noted that it had held that forbearance is sufficient consideration only if there is an agreement to forbear, and in this case, there was no evidence in the record that Marsha had made such an agreement with Mac. The Supreme Court therefore affirmed the District Court's finding that there was insufficient consideration to support Mac's written conveyance of the partnership's property to Marsha. Nitzel v. Wickman, 283 M 304, 940 P2d 451, 54 St. Rep. 684 (1997). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999).

Foregoing Advantage or Benefit — Consideration Found: When the plaintiff refused the Montana Power Company's offer of $35,000 to buy out a power purchase agreement based on the plaintiff's understanding that the defendant would pay the plaintiff $35,000 for rights to develop a power project, the change of the plaintiff's legal position constituted consideration, thus creating a contract. It is not essential that consideration imposes a gain or loss to either party, it is sufficient that a party in whose favor the contract is made foregoes some advantage or benefit. Ragland v. Sheehan, 256 M 322, 846 P2d 1000, 50 St. Rep. 83 (1993). See also Larson v. Green Tree Financial Corp., 1999 MT 157, 295 M 110, 983 P2d 357, 56 St. Rep. 618 (1999).

Receiving Reduced Monthly Benefits After Settlement Not Evidence of Lack of Consideration: The claimant argued that after settling his claim with the State Fund, he received less in monthly benefits than he had prior to settling and that therefore the agreement should be void for lack of consideration. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that the claimant had received other consideration, including the fact that after the settlement his benefits would continue to be paid to his estate. Hartfield v. St. Comp. Ins. Fund, 246 M 259, 805 P2d 1293, 47 St. Rep. 2001 (1990).

Promise Supported by Past Consideration Unenforceable: The defendant claimed to have a personal service contract with the plaintiff. The consideration for the contract was past service in assisting the plaintiff in obtaining construction contracts. The Supreme Court found that the contract was unenforceable because it was based upon past consideration. Tindall v. Konitz Contracting, Inc., 240 M 345, 783 P2d 1376, 46 St. Rep. 2182 (1989).

Corporation Owners' Personal Guarantee of Corporation's Contract Obligation: Defendant corporation purchased plaintiff's business under a contract which provided that the inventory of the business would not be reduced in value below the amount still owed plaintiff under the contract. When plaintiff became worried about corporation's plan to carry out such a reduction, the owners of the corporation personally guaranteed payment of that part of the sale price still due plaintiff. There was consideration for the guarantee, in that plaintiff, in return for the guarantee, relinquished various legal rights of action which he would otherwise have had upon reduction of the value of the inventory. Therefore, the guarantee was not void for lack of consideration. Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163, 39 St. Rep. 1923 (1982), followed, with regard to sufficiency of mutual promises as valid consideration, in Kephart v. Portmann, 259 M 232, 855 P2d 120, 50 St. Rep. 771 (1993).

Promissory Note — Lack of Consideration: Where respondent executed a mortgage and promissory note payable to appellant (the victim of alleged theft by the respondent's son), under belief that the note was to provide for her son's bail bond, and the son was later released on his own recognizance, the court held that the promissory note was unenforceable for lack of consideration. Bartmess v. Bourassa, 196 M 231, 639 P2d 1147, 39 St. Rep. 56 (1982).

Option Agreement — Sufficiency of Consent and Consideration: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that the writing involved was not an option agreement because it failed to meet the essential requirements for the validity of a contract. In particular, he contended that there was a lack of consent and that the consideration was legally insufficient. The Supreme Court found the actual payment of $1 and actual participation in a family corporate dissolution sufficient consideration for the agreement. A memorandum here acted as an offer, and binding agreement resulted from action on that offer by the offeree. The trial court was affirmed. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981).

Workers' Compensation Settlement — Mutual Mistake: Plaintiff injured his back when he fell in the restaurant where he worked and a rack of dishes fell on him. He submitted his claim to the Workers' Compensation Division but was not represented by an attorney. He was examined by physicians who found him to be 5% disabled. Plaintiff entered into a full and final compromise settlement. Later examinations by physicians showed that plaintiff's fall had aggravated his preexisting cerebral palsy condition. This information was not available to either party at the time the settlement was entered into. Both parties were mistaken as to a fact material to the contract. The court found that the need to fairly compensate the injured worker is the intent and purpose of the Workers' Compensation Act. The full and final compromise settlement was set aside for mutual mistake of a material fact as to the nature and extent of the injury caused by claimant's accident. The case was remanded to the Workers' Compensation Court to determine the extent of claimant's disability. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), followed in Kimes v. Pac. Employers Ins. Co., 233 M 175, 759 P2d 986, 45 St. Rep. 1402 (1988), Weldele v. Medley Dev., 227 M 257, 738 P2d 1281, 44 St. Rep. 1062 (1987), and Keller v. Liberty NW., Inc., 2010 MT 279, 358 Mont. 448, 246 P.3d 434.

Counterclaim on Contract — Fulfillment of Preexisting Duties Not Consideration — Effect of Lack of Consideration: Plaintiffs contracted with defendant to build their log home. Before and after occupancy of the home, structural problems requiring repair occurred. At trial, defendant counterclaimed against the plaintiffs for his expenses in installing tie rods in the walls of the home. The plaintiffs had authorized the installation of the tie rods after a windstorm had shown the home to be unstable. Although noting the ratification of the agreement after the rods were installed, the Supreme Court also noted that the home remained unstable and that the rods may have been improperly installed. It said that defendant had a common-law duty to construct the home in a workmanlike manner, in a manner as to assure stability. The duty was not fulfilled even after the installation of the tie rods. Because a promise to perform a preexisting legal or contractual obligation is insufficient consideration for a promise made in return, consideration was lacking in the supplemental (tie rod installation) agreement. Under former Rule 41, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), a counterclaim may be dismissed where, upon the facts and the law, the claimant has shown no right to relief. With consideration lacking, the contract was unenforceable and the defendant had no right to relief on his counterclaim. Estoppel will not support the defendant's claim without a showing of detrimental reliance, and it has no application when the omissions of the party claiming estoppel brought about the problem. Carroccia v. Todd, 189 M 172, 615 P2d 225, 37 St. Rep. 1437 (1980), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Lack of Consideration: The court found that a "letter of instruction and joint assignment of funds" was unenforceable because it was not supported by consideration. The issuers, a bank and the purchaser of a modular home, were not bound because no benefit was conferred on them by the plaintiff manufacturer of the home and the plaintiff did not incur any detriment. The consideration recited in the letter was "inducement . . . to begin production" of the home. At the time of the execution of the letter, the home had already been manufactured and delivered to the plaintiff's authorized dealer. No dealings occurred between the plaintiff and the bank; the lending arrangement was rather between the bank and the dealer. Boise Cascade Corp. v. First Sec. Bank of Anaconda, 183 M 378, 600 P2d 173 (1979).

Oral Promise to Pay Insufficient Consideration: A mere oral promise to pay, as in this case, is not sufficient consideration to support a contractual obligation. Such a promise must be binding and impose some legal obligation on the one making it. A contract is not made so long as, in the contemplation of both parties thereto, something remains to be done in order to establish contract relations. Schwedes v. Romain, 179 M 466, 587 P2d 388 (1978).

Contract Barred at Law as in Equity: The legal deficiencies of inadequacy of consideration and lack of consent are equally applicable to bar enforcement of a written contract at law as in equity. Schlegel v. Moorhead, 177 M 456, 582 P2d 336 (1978).

Bills of Sale From Bankruptcy Trustee as Consideration: Bills of sale from a trustee in bankruptcy for a reclaimed ranch and personal property were proper consideration for promissory notes by the persons reclaiming the property. Double X Ranch v. Savage Bros., 167 M 231, 536 P2d 1176 (1975).

Failure of Consideration: In a sharecropper agreement, under which the plaintiff allowed defendant to go upon his land and farm it in return for a share in the crops that were grown, the consideration going from the plaintiff to the defendant tenant was the right whereby he was permitted to go upon the farm and farm it. When plaintiff lost his lease upon the land, the contract terminated, because the existence of such consideration was essential to the existence of the contract and written agreement. White v. Saby, 127 M 241, 260 P2d 1116 (1953).

Valuable Consideration: While consideration is an essential element of a valid contract, the contract here involved is a negotiable instrument, which is deemed prima facie to have been issued for a valuable consideration and to which the signer is deemed to have become a party for value. Alley v. Butte & W. Min. Co., 77 M 477, 251 P 517 (1926).

MISCELLANEOUS

Inmate Death From Alcohol Withdrawal Syndrome — County Not Vicariously Liable for Hospital's Medical Negligence: An inmate died from alcohol withdrawal syndrome while in county police custody after being treated and released by a hospital while he was in custody. The inmate's estate sued the county and the hospital. After the hospital settled with the plaintiff, the plaintiff filed a motion for summary judgment, arguing that the county was vicariously liable for the hospital's medical negligence. The District Court granted the plaintiff's motion, and the county appealed, arguing that it could not be held vicariously liable for the hospital's actions. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that none of the exceptions in Beckman v. Butte-Silver Bow County, 2000 MT 112, 299 Mont. 389, 1 P.3d 348, applied and therefore the county could not be held vicariously liable. The Supreme Court remanded for entry of summary judgment in the county's favor. Stricker v. Blaine County, 2019 MT 280, 398 Mont. 43, 453 P.3d 897.

Promissory Estoppel Does Not Require Showing of Intent to Mislead: The elements of promissory estoppel are distinct from the elements of estoppel by silence. Promissory estoppel does not require a showing of an intent to mislead. S & P Brake Supply, Inc. v. STEMCO LP, 2016 MT 324, 385 Mont. 488, 385 P.3d 567. See also NW. Potato Sales, Inc. v. Beck, 208 Mont. 310, 678 P.2d 1138 (1984), and Turner v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2012 MT 213, 366 Mont. 285, 291 P.3d 1082.

Waiver of Preemption Defense Pursuant to Settlement Agreement — Terms Enforced: Due to the franchisor motor vehicle manufacturer's bankruptcy restructuring, the petitioner car dealership lost its franchise agreement to a competing car dealership. The petitioner successfully pursued arbitration of its franchise termination under federal law. The franchisor then named the petitioner in a declaratory judgment action in federal court in Detroit. Ultimately, the franchisor and the petitioner entered into a settlement agreement in which the petitioner agreed not to assert the defense that federal law preempted Montana law. When the petitioner later raised the defense in the Montana proceedings, the competing dealership argued the petitioner was barred under the settlement agreement from doing so. The District Court agreed and the petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court. The court affirmed, holding that the petitioner had waived its right to raise the defense by executing the settlement agreement. Rimrock Chrysler, Inc. v. St., 2016 MT 165, 384 Mont. 76, 375 P.3d 392.

No Breach When Defendant Failed to Object to Field Conditions on Inspection: Failure to achieve consistent seed placement did not constitute a material breach under the conditions, and substantial credible evidence supported the court's determination that the defendant met its obligations under the agreement. CNJ Distrib. Corp. v. D&F Farms, Inc., 2013 MT 267, 372 Mont. 28, 309 P.3d 1002.

Purchaser's Failure to Conduct Title Search — Promissory and Equitable Estoppel Properly Denied: A husband and wife took out a line of credit secured by the husband's real property. The couple later decided to sell the property to the husband's brother without the brother conducting a title search. They used the funds from the sale to pay off the line of credit. The bank, however, did not close the account, even though an agent for the bank noted that the payment reflected a "mortgage payoff". Later, and without the husband's knowledge, the wife borrowed $170,000 on the line of credit. The couple subsequently divorced. After the brother learned of the wife's debt and that it was secured by his real property, he filed suit against the bank to release the deed of trust based on the doctrines of promissory and equitable estoppel. The District Court refused to apply either doctrine and the brother appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the brother could not satisfy the elements of either doctrine. Turner v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2012 MT 213, 366 Mont. 285, 291 P.3d 1082.

Grantor-Support Agreement Implied in Pleadings — Trial Properly Allowed: Defendant children contended that plaintiff parents should not have been allowed to proceed to trial on a grantor-support theory when the parents failed to explicitly raise the theory in the pretrial order. The Supreme Court disagreed. A grantor-support agreement is implied when parents transfer assets to their children in consideration for support. The pretrial order stated that the parents transferred corporate stock to the children as long as the children included the father in corporate decisionmaking and continued to meet the parents' physical and financial needs and asserted that the children breached the agreement. Although the parents did not include the theory in the pretrial order, the elements of the theory were set forth, and the District Court did not err in allowing the parents to proceed to trial Hjartarson v. Hjartarson, 2006 MT 273, 334 M 212, 147 P3d 164 (2006).

Three-Year Statute of Limitations Applicable to Breach of Bailment Obligation: Pursuant to a breach of a bailment agreement related to the transfer of 10 horses and tack, plaintiff filed a claim for the value of the property, asserting that under 27-2-202(2), 5 years were allowed to bring the claim as a breach of contract. The District Court concluded that the voluntary bailment agreement was not a contract, but rather an obligation, which was governed by the 3-year statute of limitations in 27-2-202(3), and because the claim was not brought within 3 years, summary judgment for defendants was appropriate. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Regardless of the fact that plaintiff characterized the claim as a breach of contract, there was no evidence of an expressed agreement for sale of the property, so defendants were obligated but not contractually required to account for the property. Plaintiff's election to sue on a contract theory did not operate to grant 2 additional years for plaintiff to assert her rights. The District Court's conclusion that plaintiff's action was not timely was correct. Demarest v. Broadhurst, 2004 MT 147, 321 M 470, 92 P3d 1168 (2004).

Engagement Ring Given in Contemplation of Marriage Not Considered Gift — Conditional Gift Analysis: Albinger gave Harris a $29,000 diamond engagement ring when the two promised to marry. The relationship was strained, resulting in breakups and the return of the ring to Albinger several times, but each time the couple reconciled, and the ring was returned to Harris. Following their final separation, Albinger told Harris to "take the car, the horse, the dog, and the ring", so Harris moved to Kentucky, marriage plans evaporated, and Harris refused to return the ring. Albinger filed in District Court to settle ownership of the ring. The District Court found the ring to be a gift in contemplation of marriage, implying that the existence of a condition attached to the gift, and held that Albinger was entitled to return of the ring upon failure of the condition of marriage. Harris appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The rights and duties of parties regarding property exchanges in contemplation of marriage are determined by existing law and common-law principles. A gift is a transfer of personal property made voluntarily and without consideration, and the essential elements of an inter vivos gift are donative intent, voluntary delivery, and acceptance by the recipient. Delivery, which manifests the intent of the giver, must turn over dominion and control of the property to the recipient, and when made without condition, such a gift becomes irrevocable upon acceptance, so the Supreme Court will not void the transfer when the giver experiences a change of heart. The only revocable gift recognized under Montana law is a gift in view of death, and a gift causa mortis may be revoked by the giver at any time and is revoked by the giver's recovery from the illness or escape from the peril under which the gift was made. However, the Supreme Court declined to analogize gifts in contemplation of marriage with a gift in contemplation of death. Further, a purported gift that is part of the inducement for an agreement to do or not do a certain thing becomes the consideration essential to contract formation. An exchange of promises creates a contract to marry, albeit an unenforceable one, so when an engagement ring is given as consideration for the promise to marry, a contract is formed and legal action to recover the ring is barred by the abolition of breach of promise actions in 27-1-602. Here, the engagement ring was an unconditional, completed gift upon acceptance, and a completed gift is not revocable. Thus, the ring remained in Harris's ownership and control. Albinger v. Harris, 2002 MT 118, 310 M 27, 48 P3d 711 (2002).

Sale of Property Contingent on Financing — Financing Contingent on Grant of Contract — Oral Agreement to Purchase Additional Property Contingent on Initial Sale — Summary Judgment Proper Absent Genuine Issue of Fact: Community, Counseling, and Correctional Services, Inc. (Community), agreed to purchase Albright's property for a prerelease center. An additional oral agreement provided that Community would also purchase furnishings on the property when the sale was completed. The sale was contingent on Community's ability to obtain financing, and financing was contingent upon a grant for the prerelease center to Community from the Department of Corrections. Ultimately, the Department declined to issue the contract for prerelease services, Community was unable to obtain financing, and Albright was unable to sell the property or furnishings. Albright sued Community for breach of contract. The District Court granted summary judgment to Community, holding that under the plain language of the contract, the offer terminated when the Department did not issue the contract. Albright appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. No question of fact existed with respect to the conditions for the agreement because the agreement conditioned formation of any contract to buy the real property on Community's ability to obtain financing and Community could not obtain financing without the Department contract. Further, Albright's own affidavit stated that the oral agreement to purchase the furnishings was contingent on purchase of the property, so no issue of fact existed regarding the sale of the furnishings either, and that issue was also properly disposed of by summary judgment. Albright v. Community, Counseling, & Correctional Serv., Inc., 2001 MT 272, 307 M 289, 37 P3d 675 (2001).

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977), and Mont. Conflicting Evidence Whether Indemnity Note on Bail Bond Considered Valid Contract — District Court's Finding Not Clearly Erroneous: Rohrich signed an indemnity agreement with Anderson, who owned a bail bond business, to secure a bond posted for the release of Brummer. When signing the indemnity note, Rohrich did not question Anderson about the note and signed it without discussion regarding the effect of his signature. The note provided that should Anderson become liable for the forfeiture of the bail bond, the indemnitor would indemnify Anderson, with interest, and also pay reasonable attorney fees in the event that a suit was necessary to collect the amount owed. Brummer subsequently fled the state, and the County Attorney moved for bail forfeiture. The District Court ordered that judgment in the full amount of bail be entered against Brummer and against Anderson as the surety. After Anderson satisfied the judgment, he waited to see if Rohrich would indemnify him, but Rohrich did not do so; therefore, Anderson brought an action to enforce the indemnity note. At trial, Rohrich maintained that the note was blank when he signed it and that therefore he did not sign a valid contract. Rohrich also contended that the date on the note, which was 1 year after Brummer was released from prison, was further evidence that Anderson did not complete the terms of the note prior to Rohrich's signature. Anderson testified that the note did contain all essential terms when Rohrich signed it, and that testimony was affirmed by Anderson's assistant. Anderson also testified that the date was a typographical error and that as a matter of business practice, he would not provide an indemnitor with a blank note. Further, Rohrich was familiar with indemnity notes, having signed notes on three prior occasions with Anderson, including two that he signed for himself. After weighing the conflicting evidence, the District Court ordered Rohrich to pay the full amount, plus attorney fees, interest, and costs. Rohrich appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed, paying substantial deference to the trial court because as the factfinder, the trial court was in the best position to evaluate the testimony and judge the credibility of the witnesses. Anderson v. Rohrich, 2001 MT 106, 305 M 274, 26 P3d 99 (2001).

Statement of Present Intent to Perform or Not Perform Not Considered Contract — Lease Not Altered by Gratuitous Promise: Defendants had a 99-year lease on a ranch owned by Earl. The lease provided that in case of need, it was subject to recall on demand by Earl. When Earl had to be placed in a nursing home without the assets to bear her expenses and needed to liquidate the property in order to qualify for federal benefits, defendants were notified that the lease was being terminated. Defendants objected, citing a letter from Earl purporting to gift to them all interest in the ranch. However, to be a gift, a transfer of property must be irrevocable, complete, without adequate or full consideration, and unmistakably intended to divest the donor of title, dominion, and control over the property. The District Court concluded that sufficient need existed to terminate the lease and denied defendants' motion to resolve any effect that the letter had on the original lease. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the letter was a mere statement by Earl of present intent to perform or not perform an act in the future and that such a gratuitous promise did not constitute a valid written modification of the original lease. Earl v. Beager, 2001 MT 44, 304 M 258, 20 P3d 788 (2001).

Real Estate Sale — Disclosure Statement Not Susceptible to Violation — Standard Listing Agreement Violation: In an action against a realtor for breach of contract, May alleged violation of both a document entitled "Disclosure Regarding Types of Real Estate Agency Relationships Available" (disclosure statement), listing the duties of a real estate agent, and a "Standard Listing Contract". The Supreme Court held that the disclosure statement was not a contract and could not serve as the basis for a breach of contract action. The Supreme Court also held that the Standard Listing Contract could be violated and that May had sufficiently alleged breach of a specific provision of that contract, that provision being one that the broker was employed to find a buyer ready and willing to acquire the property on the terms stated in the contract, to survive a motion for summary judgment. May v. ERA Landmark Real Estate of Bozeman, 2000 MT 299, 302 M 326, 15 P3d 1179, 57 St. Rep. 1256 (2000).

Broker to Produce Ready, Willing, and Able Buyer to Be Entitled to Commission: Aasheim argued that he was entitled to a commission for the sale of Reum's property on the basis that the failure of the sale being consummated was due to wrongful acts on Reum's part. The Supreme Court held that there was substantial evidence to support the lower court's ruling that the sale was not completed because of the financial inability of the purchaser to close the transaction and therefore Aasheim was not entitled to a broker's commission. Aasheim v. Reum, 277 M 471, 922 P2d 1167, 53 St. Rep. 771 (1996).

Incomplete Form Contract When Signed — Unenforceable Contract: Pearson was responsible for placement of youths in need of supervision (now youth in need of intervention) for Youth Court services and sought to place a youth with Findleys in their foster home. Findley told Pearson that they would need $41 a day to care for the youth and asked Pearson to sign a written contract so that Youth Court services would ensure their $41-a-day payment. Findley produced a form contract with blank spaces for the child's name, name of the contracting party, and rate of compensation for the placement. The extent to which the blanks were filled in was disputed, but Pearson testified that he told the Findleys that he was responsible only for placement, that reimbursement was administered through the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services), and that he could not guarantee a daily payment rate. The Department informed Findleys that the standard daily rate was $11.63. Findleys later brought a claim for contract damages against Youth Court services. The District Court properly held that the form contract was not enforceable because it was substantially incomplete when the parties signed it, with neither the date nor the rate amount having been filled in. There was no evidence that Youth Court services ratified the contract. Equitable estoppel did not apply because Findleys knew within 1 month that they would not be paid $41 a day, but instead of terminating the foster care relationship, they continued for nearly 5 years with no assurance that they would ever receive more than the standard rate for foster care. Findley v. District Court, 277 M 242, 921 P2d 870, 53 St. Rep. 627 (1996).

Oral Estate Settlement Agreement Not Binding: An estate settlement agreement reached by the parties' attorneys over the telephone was not binding on the parties because the agreement was not in writing and was not filed with the Clerk of Court or entered upon the minutes of the court. In re Estate of Goick, 275 M 13, 909 P2d 1165, 53 St. Rep. 12 (1996), overruled, to the extent that a client is not bound to a settlement agreement unless the agreement is filed with the District Court or entered in the court's minutes, in Lockhead v. Weinstein, 2003 MT 360, 319 M 62, 81 P3d 1284 (2003).

Standard Real Estate Buy/Sell Form a Binding Contract: The parties executed a standard form agreement provided by the real estate agent for the sale and purchase of real estate. The agreement contained a clause allowing the buyers to have the home inspected. The buyers informed the sellers that the inspection had raised a few areas of concern that needed to be addressed and negotiated. Ultimately, the sellers refused to change the purchase price or to agree to have any needed repairs made. The buyers then informed the sellers that they were willing to proceed under the terms of the original agreement, at which time the sellers' attorney informed the buyers' attorney in writing that the original agreement was no longer in effect and that the sellers did not intend to sell the property to the buyers. The buyers sued for specific performance. The sellers argued that the agreement was only an option contract and did not constitute a binding buy/sell agreement. The Supreme Court held that the agreement contained the essential elements of a contract and was a binding contract. Klawitter v. Dettmann, 268 M 275, 886 P2d 416, 51 St. Rep. 1296 (1994), following Cady v. Burton, 257 M 529, 851 P2d 1047 (1993), and distinguishing Pollard v. Bozeman, 228 M 176, 741 P2d 776 (1987).

Covenant Limiting Structures to Single-Family Residences Not Restriction of Commercial Use: The McClains argued that the Kannons were violating subdivision covenants by operating a bed and breakfast in their home. The Supreme Court held that a restrictive covenant limiting buildings to single-family residences limited the type of structure and did not limit use of the structure, so that a bed and breakfast operation did not violate the covenant. Patton v. Madison County, 265 M 362, 877 P2d 993, 51 St. Rep. 536 (1994).

Lower Court's Finding of Substituted Contract Reversed: The parties were involved in litigation concerning a development's covenants and informed the District Court that they had reached an agreement conditioned upon approval of the appropriate settlement documents. The lower court subsequently granted summary judgment for one side based upon the oral agreement presented to the District Court. The Supreme Court held that an accord or substitute contract had not been established because there was no unconditional offer, no acceptance, and no meeting of the minds. The proposed settlement was subject to approval of the settlement documents, and they were ultimately not agreed upon by the parties. Patton v. Madison County, 265 M 362, 877 P2d 993, 51 St. Rep. 536 (1994).

Real Estate Sale Not Occurring — Broker Entitled to Commission Based on Terms of Contract: Language in a listing agreement was clear and unambiguous in stating that a broker was entitled to a commission upon procuring a buyer who was "ready and willing to purchase" and who entered into a written agreement to make the purchase. The District Court did not err in granting summary judgment in favor of the broker when the seller was obligated to pay the commission even though the proposed sale did not go through. Sayegusa v. Rogers, 256 M 269, 846 P2d 1005, 50 St. Rep. 89 (1993), followed in Johnson v. Nyhart, 269 M 379, 889 P2d 1170, 52 St. Rep. 37 (1995).

Application of Procuring Cause Doctrine to Exclusive Listing Agreements: The procuring cause doctrine, which permits a broker to show that the broker's part of the contract was performed and that the principal reaped a benefit from the efforts, is not confined to consideration of nonexclusive listing agreements. It applies in all situations unless the parties agree otherwise in the listing contract. Lane v. Smith, 255 M 218, 841 P2d 1143, 49 St. Rep. 974 (1992), clarifying Flinders v. Gilbert, 141 M 442, 378 P2d 385 (1963), and followed in Hall & Hall, Inc. v. Hyde, 264 M 190, 870 P2d 1362, 51 St. Rep. 257 (1994).

Date of Lease-Purchase Agreement as Effective Date of Sale in Determining Broker's Commission: When negotiated within the time parameters of a listing agreement, the date on which a lease-purchase agreement is entered into is the effective date of sale for purposes of determining a broker's commission. Lane v. Smith, 255 M 218, 841 P2d 1143, 49 St. Rep. 974 (1992).

Essential Terms: A letter between landlord and tenant was not an enforceable lease on which the tenant could bring a contract action because it failed to set forth material and essential terms necessary for the enforcement of the renewal provisions of a lease. Therefore, only a month-to-month lease existed. Drug Fair NW. v. Hooper Enterprises, Inc., 226 M 31, 733 P2d 1285, 44 St. Rep. 435 (1987).

Reliance on Insurance Coverage — Elements of Promissory Estoppel Met: Where an insurance company treated son as an insured when it paid prior medical bills and when it represented to a medical center that he was insured, these acts constituted a promise to pay medical bills. Father and son were injured by their reliance on the promise when the company later refused coverage of medical center bills. As reliance was reasonable and foreseeable, these facts constituted ample evidence for a jury finding of promissory estoppel. Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115, 43 St. Rep. 2243 (1986).

Lack of Appeal of Federal Agency Decision Not to Affect Contract Rights: Popp had an oral agreement to plant and harvest land owned by Frank and Gountanis. Popp attempted to enroll the land in the federal payment in kind program (PIK) but was informed by the Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) that he must have a written lease to be eligible. He never appealed the ASCS decision. Frank later contended that the failure to appeal precluded Popp from collaterally attacking that determination in District Court. The Supreme Court held that Popp's filing of a lawsuit was not a collateral attack on the ASCS decision but rather that the amended complaint showed it was a breach of contract action. The court supported the finding that the PIK program could not be used to destroy Popp's contract rights. Popp v. Gountanis, 221 M 267, 718 P2d 340, 43 St. Rep. 801 (1986).

Oral Contract for Purchase of House — Part Performance — Statute of Frauds Inapplicable — No Refund to Purchasers on Default: Defendant agreed to sell home to friends upon a $10,000 downpayment and assumption of defendant's loan. Plaintiffs did not qualify for assumption, so defendant prepared lease for plaintiffs' signature. They refused to sign because it was not a contract for deed. Defendant allowed plaintiffs to take occupancy, and they made sporadic payments for 4 years. Defendant's patience waned when the bank exercised acceleration provision for delinquencies. Plaintiffs sued for refund of payments. The court found an oral contract for deed. The Statute of Frauds was inapplicable because defendant was, at all times, willing to effect sale and transfer of the home. He was not required to refund plaintiffs' payments. Since no lease was ever signed and no rental relationship created, landlord and tenant law was inapplicable. Hayes v. Hartelius, 215 M 391, 697 P2d 1349, 42 St. Rep. 457 (1985).

Public Contract Bid — Submission Binds Bidder: State's solicitation for bids provided that all written addenda would become part of the contract documents, that all bidders would be bound by the addenda, whether or not they were received by the bidder, and that the owner reserved the right to reject all bids and waive any informality or irregularity in any bid. One bid did not acknowledge receipt of certain addenda, though the bidder stated during a phone conversation with the State that he knew of the addenda. The solicitation provisions bound the bidder to full performance of the contract documents, including all addenda, whether received or not, and in submitting its bid the bidder bound itself to the full performance of the contract documents, including the addenda. Martel Constr., Inc. v. Bd. of Examiners, 205 M 332, 668 P2d 222, 40 St. Rep. 1340 (1983).

Effect of Unanticipated Condition on Contractor's Obligation: Even though a contract incorporates by reference federal, state, or local laws, a contractor is not required to alter construction plans to comply with health standards when the condition to be alleviated is abnormal, unanticipated, or substantially different from those in the contract plans and drawings. Ace Plumbing & Heating, Inc. v. School District, 204 M 81, 662 P2d 1327, 40 St. Rep. 678 (1983).

Late Payment — Waiver of Payment Date — Time Not of the Essence: Defendants, on behalf of plaintiff, exercised their option to purchase a ranch, with plaintiff paying $10,000 downpayment required by ranch owner and agreeing to pay defendants $15,000 on November 1 and $15,000 after the following January 1. The timing of the two $15,000 payments was requested by defendants, time was not stated to be of the essence, and there was no forfeiture provision. Plaintiff paid $2,000 on November 2, and defendants accepted it, gave numerous extensions for payment of the remainder of the first $15,000 payment, and did not notify plaintiff that he had a time limit for payment or his interest would be forfeited. Prior to December 12, at least three tenders of payment were refused by defendant, and on that date plaintiff filed suit for specific performance. Defendant could not forfeit plaintiff's interest and waived strict compliance with the payment date. Time was not of the essence, plaintiff's tender was timely, and plaintiff was entitled to specific performance. Stoddard v. Gookin, 203 M 435, 661 P2d 865, 40 St. Rep. 554 (1983).

Grantor Support Agreement Enforceable as Contract: Over a period of years, grantor, a 95-year-old woman, had deeded various parcels of land near her home to several relatives. She filed a complaint against grantees, alleging that the land had been conveyed in return for their promise to support her and that they had failed to live up to their agreement. As relief, grantor sought either damages or, in the event that the agreement was determined to be unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds, return of the land. Grantees denied the existence of any agreement and pleaded the Statute of Limitations as a defense. The District Court granted grantees' motion for summary judgment and further ruled that grantor's claims were barred by the Statute of Limitations. The Supreme Court reversed in part, ruling that grantor was entitled to present evidence on two of her claims because Montana law provides for the enforcement of a grantor support agreement, that there was a genuine issue of fact as to whether or not such an agreement had been made, and that the trial court's ruling on the Statute of Limitations was premature. Additionally, the court ruled that grantor had no claim for return of the land since, if an agreement existed, grantor's partial performance of that agreement rendered the Statute of Frauds inapplicable, and if no agreement existed, grantor was not entitled to any relief. Sands v. Nestegard, 198 M 421, 646 P2d 1189, 39 St. Rep. 1101 (1982).

Existence of Contract — Payment of Tort Judgment as Precluding Determination: Plaintiffs sued defendant for damages claimed to have occurred to their farmlands when a seismograph hole drilled and shot by defendant brought a continuous water flow to the surface, damaging farmland. Defendants left the area and later tried unsuccessfully to plug the hole. The jury found for plaintiffs and awarded actual and punitive damages. Defendant paid the award for actual damages and appealed the award of punitive damages. Defendant claimed the case involved a contract and that punitive damages were not properly allowable. By satisfying the judgment for actual damages, defendant acceded to the correctness of the judgment and accepted its benefits. When a judgment is paid, it passes beyond the review of a superior court. The question of whether a contract existed was submitted to the jury. Their judgment was based on a tort theory, comparative negligence. Because this judgment was satisfied, the Supreme Court could not rule on whether a contract was involved. Dahl v. Petroleum Geophysical Co., 194 M 294, 632 P2d 1136, 38 St. Rep. 1474 (1981).

Contract by Promissory Estoppel — Requirements of Promise: In an action involving a pump delivered and set up by plaintiff, based upon a phone conversation mentioning only "prevailing rates", followed 6 days later by a written agreement prepared by plaintiff and signed by both parties, detailing specific rates and terms such as duration, maintenance, fuel, and accessories, defendant could not rely upon the doctrine of promissory estoppel to create a contract from the transaction prior to the written agreement. Citing section 90, Restatement of Contracts, the Supreme Court found that the need for a promise clear and unambiguous in its terms was not met. The earlier transaction was a mere agreement to agree at a further date (i.e., negotiation), lacking specifics such as those in the written agreement, and hence there was no valid contract prior to the written agreement. Keil v. Glacier Park, Inc., 188 M 455, 614 P2d 502, 37 St. Rep. 1151 (1980), followed in Keesun Partners v. Ferdig Oil Co., Inc., 249 M 331, 816 P2d 417, 48 St. Rep. 710 (1991). See also Turner v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2012 MT 213, 366 Mont. 285, 291 P.3d 1082.

Attempted Assignment of Void Option Agreement — Judicial Notice: The District Court did not err in finding appellant was not entitled to exercise an option, which had been assigned to appellant, because the original option agreement between the respondent and the assignor was void. The District Court could take judicial notice of a separate action that had determined the invalidity of the option agreement at the time of the attempted assignment, and there was sufficient independent evidence that the option agreement was void. Berry v. Mann, 188 M 71, 610 P2d 1180 (1980).

EXPRESS CONTRACTS

Proper Quantum for Architect's Services: Under a contract with a landowner who wished to build housing units on the land, an architect prepared plans and specifications that were approved by landowner. Under the contract, the architect was to receive 5% of the construction cost. Following abandonment of the project, he was entitled to a fee based on quantum meruit. The proper recovery was the number of hours of service, 600, times the architect's hourly rate, $30, or $18,000. It was improper for the court to hold that the architect was entitled to only $10,000 based on the value of his services. Kenneth D. Collins Agency v. Hagerott, 211 M 303, 684 P2d 487, 41 St. Rep. 1375 (1984).

Quantum Meruit: One having an express contract which he has performed may sue in quantum meruit and use the contract as proof of the reasonable value of his services; however, it is a fatal variance to allege an implied contract (quantum meruit) and to prove an express contract except where full performance of the contract was prevented by the defendant. Here, plaintiff is not entitled to a remedy in quantum meruit because he has not been prevented from full performance, since under the termination provisions he has no enforceable contract to continue employment. Keneally v. Orgain, 186 M 1, 606 P2d 127 (1980).

Special Agreement Overrides Implied Contract: The law will not imply a promise to pay the value of services rendered and accepted if there is a special agreement to pay a particular amount or in a particular manner for the service rendered. St. James Community Hosp., Inc. v. Dept. of Social and Rehabilitation Services, 182 M 80, 595 P2d 379 (1979).

IMPLIED CONTRACTS

Sufficient Evidence of Implied Contract to Preclude Summary Judgment — City Ordinance Not Bar to Liability: The plaintiffs sued the city of Dillon for damages after their water service was interrupted, claiming breach of contract, negligence, and infliction of emotional distress. The District Court granted summary judgment to the city, reasoning that no contract existed between the parties because the city commission never approved a contract for the plaintiffs' water service, as required by a city ordinance, and the plaintiffs' claims were barred by a city ordinance that provided that the city could shut off water and avoid liability for the resulting interruption of water service. The Supreme Court reversed. The city's conduct manifested the existence of a contract to furnish water to the plaintiffs' lot, and therefore the city was estopped from asserting that no contract existed. Because the city ordinance that bars claims arising from a break in water service applies only to situations in which the city decides to shut off water services, rather than when water is shut off from a creek and main line freezing as occurred in this case, summary judgment for the city was not appropriate. Conner v. Dillon, 2012 MT 21, 364 Mont. 8, 270 P.3d 75.

Promissory Note Enforceable: A promissory note from husband to wife acknowledging that he owed her for a loan that she obtained for him and that was secured by her home is enforceable as an implied contract at law in a dissolution proceeding. In re Marriage of Rock, 257 M 476, 850 P2d 296, 50 St. Rep. 369 (1993).

Implied Contract -— Test: The elements required to establish an implied contract, as set out in Daniels v. Thomas, Dean & Hoskins, Inc., 246 M 125, 804 P2d 359 (1990), are: (1) identifiable parties; (2) consent; (3) a lawful object; and (4) consideration. Presence of all elements constituted sufficient evidence to establish an implied contract. CB&F Dev. Corp. v. Culbertson St. Bank, 256 M 1, 844 P2d 5, 49 St. Rep. 1122 (1992).

Law of Implied Contract as Applied to Grazing Fees: In a dispute between two brothers as to the amount owing for grazing fees, John contended that because there was never any agreement with Glenn that rent would be charged for three horses kept with his cattle, no charges could be made for grazing the horses. The Supreme Court applied the law of implied contracts in holding that John should be required to pay Glenn for the pasturing of the horses after Glenn told John to either pay for their grazing or remove them. Heitz v. Heitz, 244 M 12, 795 P2d 486, 47 St. Rep. 1393 (1990).

Insufficient Evidence to Imply Contract: Defendant bank and plaintiffs loaned money to purchasers of restaurant. When bank accelerated the note due from the purchasers and sold the restaurant's assets, plaintiffs claimed breach of an implied contract between bank and themselves. Letter from bank to plaintiffs did not establish implied contract but merely an attempt by the bank to collect a loan from one of the plaintiffs. Lythgoe v. First Sec. Bank of Helena, 222 M 163, 720 P2d 1184, 43 St. Rep. 1140 (1986).

Value of Completed Implied Contract Proved by Value of Completed Express Contract: Where the defendant property owner made an agreement with the plaintiff photographer in May for aerial photos of two parcels of property after receiving an estimate for those services and in October directed the plaintiff to proceed with photographing two other sites as well, the District Court erred in holding that proof of the later agreement, an implied contract, could not be introduced as it was at variance with the first agreement, an express contract. It is fatal to allege an implied contract and prove an express one, but what the defendant attempted to do was prove the value of an implied contract by introducing proof of the express contract. The District Court's limitation on the plaintiff's recovery was in error. Survco v. Kenyon Noble Ready-Mix, 204 M 411, 664 P2d 943, 40 St. Rep. 971 (1983).

Union Contract as Implied Part of Employment Relationship: Bishop was hired by petitioner to be head of his wine department. The specifics of the employment were not discussed. Bishop was given a copy of a union contract covering other employees although he was not a union member. After his discharge, Bishop filed a wage claim with the Department of Labor and Industry. The hearings officer found the union contract to be the best indicator of the employment relationship and awarded back wages. The District Court reversed, saying there was no mutual consent as to overtime or holiday pay. On appeal, the Supreme Court reinstated the hearing officer's findings because they were supported by substantial evidence. There were a number of correlations between the parties' actual conduct and the union contract. The union contract was held to be an implied part of the employment relationship between Bishop and the petitioner. Bronken's Goodtime Co. v. Bishop, 201 M 360, 664 P2d 292, 39 St. Rep. 2165 (1982).

Witness Testimony — Substantial Evidence to Support Implied Fee Agreement: The trial court's determination that an oral agreement was entered into between the parties but that no express agreement was reached as to the fee to be paid plaintiff for architectural services and that there was an implied agreement at law to pay the reasonable value of those services was supported by substantial evidence. Most of the evidence consisted of witness testimony, and where the credibility of the witnesses is of prime importance, the determination of weight given to testimony is the primary function of the trial judge sitting without a jury. Knight & Co. v. Manaras, 184 M 448, 603 P2d 675 (1979).

Implied Contract — Medicaid Payments: The principle underlying the implied contract doctrine is that one person should not be permitted to be unjustly enriched at the expense of another but should be required to make restitution for property or benefits received where it is just and equitable that such restitution be made and where such action involves no violation or frustration of law or opposition to public policy, either directly or indirectly. The circumstances on the record do not justify payment be made on any formula other than the "reasonable costs" formula as set forth in federal Medicaid statutes and regulations. Flathead Health Center v. Flathead County, 183 M 211, 598 P2d 1111 (1979).

Employee Status Based on Implied Contract: A husband and wife who were working as managers of a bar under an express contract for money remaining from bar revenues after operating and fixed costs were paid became employees for purposes of a suit for wages under 39-3-214 when they stayed on as managers because of representations by the agent of the corporate defendant that gave rise to an implied contract for reasonable compensation that revoked the express contract. McNulty v. Bewley Corp., 182 M 260, 596 P2d 474 (1979).

Service Contract: Evidence that it was understood plaintiff should be paid for her services and that plaintiff maintained a detailed record of services and expenses, even though including contrary indications, was sufficient under this section to support plaintiff's claim under an implied contract. Cartwright v. Joyce, 155 M 478, 473 P2d 515 (1970).

Implied Contract — Defined: An implied contract is one the terms and existence of which are manifested by the conduct of the parties; the element of consideration for such a contract is furnished by the benefit conferred upon the promisor and the prejudice suffered by the promisee, and the element of intention on the part of the former may be furnished by his conduct and declarations. Erie v. Wahl, 116 M 515, 155 P2d 201 (1945); Rentfro v. Dettwiler, 95 M 391, 26 P2d 992 (1933).

Creation by Law: Contracts implied by law, or quasi or constructive contracts, are a class of obligations which are imposed or created by laws without regard to the assent of the party bound, on the ground that they are dictated by reason and justice, and may be enforced by an action ex contractu. French v. County of Lewis & Clark, 87 M 448, 288 P 455 (1930).

One Signator: A contract which is signed by only one party but which is acted upon by the other party is binding on both. Steinbrenner v. Minot Auto Co., 56 M 27, 180 P 729 (1919).

MISCELLANEOUS

Dispute Over Contract to Deliver Log Home — No Requirement That Seller Provide Name of Third Party Boom Truck Operator — Rescission Proper Remedy for Material Breach of Contract: Anderson agreed to purchase a log home from Eschenbacher. The home was designed to be constructed on Anderson's homesite. Eschenbacher drafted the purchase contract, which provided that Eschenbacher would act only as a manufacturer, not as a building contractor, and also required Anderson to coordinate and ensure availability of a boom truck to assemble the structure at the site. Anderson contacted a third party to supply a boom truck instead of using Eschenbacher's truck. Eschenbacher then refused to deliver the logs unless Anderson supplied the name of the other boom truck operator. Both parties sued for breach of contract. The District Court concluded that Anderson was under no duty to provide Eschenbacher with the name of the boom truck operator, and the Supreme Court agreed. The contract clearly placed the responsibility for acquiring a boom truck with Anderson, but did not require Eschenbacher to use it, because other language required Anderson to pay any expenses incurred by Eschenbacher for waiting once the logs were delivered, if, for instance, the boom truck that Anderson provided was inadequate. Construing the contract most strongly against the drafter, Eschenbacher, the court found that Eschenbacher could easily have inserted provisions in the contract regarding specifications of an adequate boom truck, but he did not. Eschenbacher materially breached the contract by refusing to deliver the logs until the boom truck dispute was settled. The contract did not specify a remedy; thus, the District Court did not err in granting Anderson rescission of the contract. Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Limited Agreement Not to Prosecute for Deviate Sexual Conduct — Not Grant of Statutory Immunity — Independently Derived Evidence Applicable: The Jefferson County Attorney contractually agreed not to prosecute Myrhow for criminal acts related to an investigation of deviate sexual conduct by Marks, of which Myrhow had knowledge. However, until other incidents came to light as part of a separate investigation, Myrhow at no time related that he was involved in other unrelated incidents of deviate sexual conduct, including an incident committed prior to the contractual agreement. Myrhow contended that the immunity granted for his information regarding Marks's conduct also extended to his own conduct. The District Court properly found that Myrhow had been granted de facto immunity from prosecution for acts directly related to the Marks investigation, but that immunity was a limited, contractual, transactional immunity arising solely from the agreement not to prosecute, rather than from 46-15-331. The statutory immunity provided by 46-15-331 did not apply because that immunity is granted only when a witness is compelled to testify by court order, a circumstance inapplicable to this case. Because the evidence used to convict Myrhow was derived independently of the Marks investigation and independently of any immunized evidence Myrhow provided through his agreement with the County Attorney, the District Court correctly convicted Myrhow for deviate sexual conduct committed prior to the immunity agreement. St. v. Myrhow, 262 M 229, 865 P2d 231, 50 St. Rep. 1528 (1993).

Accountant's Duty Based on Whether Employment Contract Express or Implied: The defendant argued that only an implied contract had existed between it and the plaintiff and therefore its duty to the plaintiff was defined by its conduct toward the plaintiff and the plaintiff's acceptance of that conduct. The Supreme Court held that although the duty of an accountant may vary depending on whether a contract is express or implied, the jury's factual determination that the defendant had breached its duty made the distinction irrelevant. Billings Clinic v. Peat Marwick Main & Co., 244 M 324, 797 P2d 899, 47 St. Rep. 1464 (1990).

Unjust Enrichment — Misconduct by Defendant Required — Denial of Restitution to Defaulting Purchaser: Upon default by purchasers, seller resold the property. Purchasers sought restitution, contending it was unfair to allow seller to be unjustly enriched by selling the property twice. However, restitution is normally denied to a defaulting purchaser. (See Contract Damages in Montana Part II: Reliance and Restitution, Burnham, 45 Mont. L. Rev. 1 (1984).) Further, in order for the equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment to apply, plaintiff must show some element of misconduct or fault on the part of defendant. Schweigert v. Fowler, 240 M 424, 784 P2d 405, 47 St. Rep. 1 (1990). See also Owen v. Skramovsky, 2013 MT 348, 372 Mont. 531, 313 P.3d 205.

Parties' Dealings Creating Neither Express nor Implied Contract: The plaintiffs argued that the dealings between themselves and the bank showed the existence of either an express or implied contract, requiring the bank to make the necessary loans to finance the plaintiffs' farming operation. The Supreme Court held that no agreement existed between the parties that obligated the bank to continue to make loans to the plaintiffs. The court went on to say that a series of promissory notes had been entered into by the parties and that under the doctrine of merger, even if the bank had made any oral representations, those representations would merge with the terms of the notes that would then represent the contract reached by the parties. Blome v. First Nat'l Bank of Miles City, 238 M 181, 776 P2d 525, 46 St. Rep. 1186 (1989).

Use of Plats to Induce Purchasers: In order to sell lots, a subdivider prepared and recorded subdivision plat maps that designated common areas and roadways. The purchase and sale contracts did not state who would construct roads or common areas. The issue of whether purchasers of lots have any legally enforceable right to have roads constructed depends not on their designation in the plats but on the subdivider's use of the plats in inducing purchasers. The instruments in question do not comprise a promise, express or implied, to construct roads. The purchasers did acquire an easement for the designated use. The case was remanded to determine factual issues relating to the use of the plats in inducing purchasers. Majers v. Shining Mtns., 219 M 366, 711 P2d 1375, 43 St. Rep. 16 (1986).

Unjust Enrichment Measure of Damages — Quantum Meruit or Value of Enhancement to Land: Where the plaintiffs failed to make a final payment to the defendant under a lease of property upon which the plaintiffs expended considerable time and effort to grow wheat and the defendant wrongfully terminated the lease, the District Court erred in awarding damages to the plaintiffs consisting of a composite of enhanced land value, custom work, fixed costs, and/or crop value. The measure of damages for unjust enrichment is either the quantum meruit value of the plaintiffs' labor or the value of the enhancement to the defendant's property, whichever is greater. In this case the total unjust enrichment as measured by the enhancement to the defendant's property was more than the quantum meruit measure of unjust enrichment, but both measures of damages cannot be used. The damages awarded to the plaintiffs were therefore reduced. Robertus v. Candee, 205 M 403, 670 P2d 540, 40 St. Rep. 1391 (1983), followed in Storms v. Bergsieker, 254 M 130, 835 P2d 738, 49 St. Rep. 655 (1992).

Valuation of Plaintiffs' Work in Unjust Enrichment Claim — Substantial Evidence Found: Where the plaintiffs brought an action for damages against the defendant on the theory of unjust enrichment of the defendant by the plaintiffs' work in breaking and planting land leased to them by the defendant, the Supreme Court found that there was substantial evidence to support the District Court's valuation of the plaintiffs' groundbreaking work. The trial court properly considered the plaintiffs' expert testimony and exhibits, which were based on assumptions in evidence, and properly considered the profit margin included in the plaintiffs' calculations. Under the rationale of Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), the court refused to disturb the District Court findings because they were based on substantial, though conflicting, evidence. Robertus v. Candee, 205 M 403, 670 P2d 540, 40 St. Rep. 1391 (1983).

Conduct and Declarations: The intention of the parties to a contract may be furnished by their conduct and declarations. Stensvad v. Miners & Merchants Bank of Roundup, 196 M 193, 640 P2d 1303, 39 St. Rep. 27 (1982).

Existence of Contract — Payment of Tort Judgment as Precluding Determination: Plaintiffs sued defendant for damages claimed to have occurred to their farmlands when a seismograph hole drilled and shot by defendant brought a continuous water flow to the surface, damaging farmland. Defendants left the area and later tried unsuccessfully to plug the hole. The jury found for plaintiffs and awarded actual and punitive damages. Defendant paid the award for actual damages and appealed the award of punitive damages. Defendant claimed the case involved a contract and that punitive damages were not properly allowable. By satisfying the judgment for actual damages, defendant acceded to the correctness of the judgment and accepted its benefits. When a judgment is paid, it passes beyond the review of a superior court. The question of whether a contract existed was submitted to the jury. Their judgment was based on a tort theory, comparative negligence. Because this judgment was satisfied, the Supreme Court could not rule on whether a contract was involved. Dahl v. Petroleum Geophysical Co., 194 M 294, 632 P2d 1136, 38 St. Rep. 1474 (1981).

No Express or Implied Contract — Same Subject: There cannot be an express and implied contract for the same thing existing at the same time. It is only when parties do not expressly agree that the law imposes and raises a promise. No agreement can be implied where there is an express one existing. McNulty v. Bewley Corp., 182 M 260, 596 P2d 474 (1979), following Keith v. Kottas, 119 M 98, 172 P2d 306 (1946).

Bank Deposit: Where a special administratrix had a deposit as such in a bank, and another, claiming to have been appointed special administrator, made demand on the bank for the payment of the deposit, and the bank notified the depositor of the demand and was requested to refuse the demand and retain the deposit in the depositor's name, thereupon the demandant sued the bank. After the removal of the depositor, demandant recovered judgment against the bank for the deposit and interest from the date of the demand. The depositor was not liable to the bank for the interest, since there was no implied contract to indemnify the bank. Murphy v. Nett, 51 M 82, 149 P 713 (1915).

28-2-104. Executed versus executory contracts.

Case Notes

Executed Oral Agreement — Meeting of Minds Required: The parties entered into an agreement for the lease of a truck. The lease agreement contained a noncancellation provision and provided alternative remedies to the lessor in the event of a default. Lessee returned the truck with current payments to lessor prior to the termination date of the lease. Lessor had to make repairs to the truck. Lessee contended the return was a fully executed oral contract to terminate the lease. Lessor contended that termination was dependent on the condition of the truck. There was substantial evidence to support the finding that there was no meeting of the minds and therefore no agreement to terminate the lease. Diede v. Davis, 203 M 205, 661 P2d 838, 40 St. Rep. 394 (1983).

Oral Modification of Written Property Settlement — Effect on Debts: An alleged oral modification of a written property settlement agreement could not have the effect of altering a written agreement to repay a loan made to spouses prior to divorce. Thus, payment by one obligor (purportedly in the form of a loan to the obligee) of part of the balance was considered as a discharge of the other obligor's obligation to pay that portion. Davidson v. Lewis, 177 M 55, 579 P2d 762 (1978).

Revocation of Executory Contract: Parol contracts for the sale of growing timber do not convey an interest in the land, but are executory contracts for the sale of the timber after severance, together with a license to cut and remove the timber, and while such license is irrevocable as to that part of timber which has been severed it remains executory as to timber not yet severed, and is revocable at the will of the owner, by his death, or his conveyance of the land without reservation. Gullicksen v. Shadoan, 124 M 56, 218 P2d 714, 18 ALR 2d 1142 (1950).

Executed Oral Agreement:

An oral agreement altering a written agreement is not an executed oral agreement within the statute authorizing modification of a written contract by an executed oral agreement unless its terms have been fully performed, and performance on one side is not sufficient. Ikovich v. Silver Bow Motor Car Co., 117 M 268, 157 P2d 785 (1945).

In an action to foreclose a chattel mortgage securing some promissory notes, in which the defense was that the maturity of the notes had been extended 2 years by an executed oral agreement and payment of $1,000 in consideration of that agreement, immediately upon payment of that consideration, the agreement became fully executed and effective to modify the written contract of the parties. Griffiths v. Thrasher, 95 M 210, 26 P2d 995 (1933).

Contract Partially Executed and Executory: An executory contract conveys a chose in action, while an executed contract conveys a chose in possession. A contract may be partly executed and partly executory and may be executory as to one party and executed as to the other. Lewis v. Lambros, 58 M 555, 194 P 152 (1920).

Part Case Notes

Prior Incorrect Surveys — Plaintiffs Not Intended Third-Party Beneficiaries to Contract — No Standing to Sue for Breach: Plaintiffs sued a surveying company and its owner for misrepresenting the boundaries of their property. They alleged that they had met with an employee of the surveying company prior to buying the parcel and he told them that the property consisted of waterfront property. Relying on his information, the plaintiffs purchased the parcel and built a structure on property belonging to a neighboring landowner. The plaintiffs sued for breach of contract and negligent misrepresentation. The plaintiffs successfully argued to the District Court they were third-party beneficiaries to at least one of two prior surveys performed by the surveying company for previous land owners. On appeal, however, the Supreme Court disagreed, concluding that the plaintiffs were incidental beneficiaries who were not specifically contemplated at the time the prior surveys were completed. Because they were strangers to the contracts, they lacked standing to sue for breach of contract. Kurtzenacker v. Davis Surveying, Inc., 2012 MT 105, 365 Mont. 71, 278 P.3d 1002. See also St. John v. Lewistown, 2017 MT 126, 387 Mont. 444, 395 P.3d 486.

Shareholder Cannot File Claim Belonging to Corporation — Stranger to Contract — No Standing to Seek Damages — Summary Judgment Affirmed: A majority shareholder of a corporation filed suit for damages arising from the termination of the corporation's food services contract with the federal government against the defendants who sold a coffee urn for the corporation's use. The District Court properly granted summary judgment in favor of the defendants because the shareholder did not have standing to file claims that belonged to the corporation; he was not a party to the contract between the corporation and the federal government; and the deadline to amend his pleadings to include the corporation as a party had expired. Weaver v. Advanced Refrigeration, 2011 MT 174, 361 Mont. 233, 257 P.3d 378.

Lack of Standing of Stranger to Contract to Bring Action to Enforce Contract: A stranger to a contract who is not an intended third-party beneficiary lacks standing to bring an action based on a violation of the contract, including compliance with the statute of frauds. Palmer v. Bahm, 2006 MT 29, 331 M 105, 128 P3d 1031 (2006), followed in Dick Anderson Constr., Inc. v. Monroe Constr. Co., LLC, 2009 MT 416, 353 M 534, 221 P3d 675 (2009). See also Ludwig v. Spoklie, 280 M 315, 930 P2d 56 (1996), Kurtzenacker v. Davis Surveying, Inc., 2012 MT 105, 365 Mont. 71, 278 P.3d 1002, and Turner v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2012 MT 213, 366 Mont. 285, 291 P.3d 1082.

Corporation Considered Real Party in Interest on Claim for Lost Corporate Profits — No Exception for S. Corporations: Gullett paid $10,000 earnest money for the purchase of real property. The money was drawn on the account of Gullett's corporation. When defendants refused to return the money after the purchase agreement failed, Gullett filed a complaint for return of the money and for profits allegedly suffered by the corporation's business through lack of the funds. Although the money was ultimately repaid to Gullett, the District Court summarily dismissed the claim for lost business profits on grounds that the corporation, not Gullett, was the real party in interest. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The cause of action for recovery of lost business profits belonged to the corporation, not to a shareholder. Gullett's argument that he should not be barred from the claim because the corporation was an S. corporation also failed because even though an S. corporation is treated differently for taxation purposes, it remains a corporation in all other ways, and the corporation and its shareholders remain separate entities. Gullett v. Van Dyke Constr. Co., 2005 MT 105, 327 M 30, 111 P3d 220 (2005), following Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045 (1991), and followed in Cleveland v. Ward, 2016 MT 10, 382 Mont. 118, 364 P.3d 1250. See also Smith Setzer & Sons, Inc. v. S.C. Procurement Review Panel, 20 F3d 1311 (4th Cir. 1994).

No Duty of Care Absent Relationship Between Plaintiff and Insurance Agent: Seal sold saddles and tack to Hart. Hart was to procure insurance on the goods to protect against casualty loss and theft, so Hart contracted with a South Dakota insurance agent for property insurance. Seal was not named in the policy as a loss payee. The goods were subsequently stolen, but the insurer refused to pay on grounds that Hart was not a common carrier and, as owner of the property, was not hauling the property of another. Seal sued the insurance agent for breach of contract and failure to procure insurance on Seal's behalf. The District Court concluded that Seal did not contract with the agent to insure any person, property, or risk in Montana, so no relationship existed between the parties to establish a duty on the agent's behalf to procure insurance for Seal. The Supreme Court affirmed. The question of duty is a problem of the relationship between individuals that imposes upon one a legal obligation for the benefit of the other. Here, the only conversations regarding the procurement of insurance occurred between Hart and the agent. Seal never contacted the agent, so no relationship existed between Seal and the agent that gave rise to a corresponding duty to allow Seal to recover on the claim. The certificate of insurance alone did not constitute a contract to procure insurance or impose a duty on the certificate issuer to procure insurance. Seal v. Hart, 2002 MT 149, 310 M 307, 50 P3d 522 (2002). See also Lu-An-Do, Inc. v. Kloots, 721 NE 2d 507 (Ohio Ct. App. 1999).

No Authority to Contract — Contract Not to Be Ratified or Enforced: Defendants entered into an installment contract to buy land from plaintiffs. The contract was entered by directors of the corporation acting without authority who were defrauding the corporation at the time. When the rightful stockholders came into control, they brought an action to nullify the contract and were awarded summary judgment. Defendant contends that by its actions, plaintiff ratified the contract. A contract entered into without the power to contract cannot be ratified or enforced, and the incapacity to contract cannot be removed by estoppel. Larry C. Iverson, Inc. v. Bouma, 195 M 351, 639 P2d 47, 38 St. Rep. 1911 (1981).

Case Notes

Surviving Spouse's Agreement to Sell Daughter's Interest in Decedent's Business Invalid: The surviving spouse entered into an agreement to sell her daughter's interest in the decedent's business. The Supreme Court held that the contract was void at its inception because it was prior to the surviving spouse being appointed conservator for her minor daughter and that therefore she had no authority to act on behalf of her child. In re Estate of Griffin, 248 M 472, 812 P2d 1256, 48 St. Rep. 517 (1991).

Workers' Compensation — Disaffirmation of Settlement Agreement by Minor: A minor was injured while working and filed for workers' compensation benefits. He subsequently signed a settlement agreement after negotiating with a claims adjuster. The claimant's filing of a petition to reopen his claim resulted in a hearing and the conclusion that the case was closed. The claimant appealed, based on his minority status at the time of the settlement and his concomitant right to disaffirm contracts. The Supreme Court held that the close relationship and continuing awareness of the claimant's mother during the claims negotiations were of no avail to the defendants because only the minor claimant had signed the settlement. The defendant should have required the claimant's legal guardian to sign as well as the claimant. Accordingly, the final compromise settlement was set aside. Parrent v. Midway Toyota, 192 M 118, 626 P2d 848, 38 St. Rep. 559 (1981).

Annulment of Marriage Contract: To justify annulment of a marriage contract because of mental incompetency of one of the parties, there must be clear and convincing proof that the party was incompetent at the time the contract was entered into. Murphy v. La Chapelle, 95 M 36, 24 P2d 131 (1933).

Case Notes

Validity of Contract: Contract made with person who is entirely without understanding is void ab initio, while one made with person of unsound mind "but not entirely without understanding" is voidable only at suit of one seeking to rescind on one of grounds mentioned in laws on rescission. Fleming v. Consol. Motor Sales Co., 74 M 245, 240 P 376 (1925).

Restoration of Consideration: Where plaintiff based her action on ground that deceased grantor did not have capacity to make a contract under this section, and not on ground that she was entitled to rescind under 28-2-203, an allegation that she had restored or offered to restore everything of value deceased had received from defendant was not required. Kiley v. Danahey, 61 M 608, 202 P 1110 (1921).

Overpowering Will of Grantee: In action by administratrix to set aside deed on ground that when her intestate executed it she was without understanding sufficient to make a valid contract, complaint was examined and held sufficient to permit of proof from which inference could properly be drawn that grantor in putting her cross to and delivering the deed acted in obedience to the overpowering will of grantee. Kiley v. Danahey, 61 M 608, 202 P 1110 (1921).

Modification Proper Despite Wife's Limited Capacity: After the parties' divorce, the husband, Arthur, was given an opportunity to retire early from the railroad. He contacted his ex-wife, Shirley, and the parties modified the divorce settlement to allow him to take early retirement. At the hearing to modify the decree, Shirley's attorney argued that the modification was inequitable and that Shirley had been diagnosed with a schizoaffective disorder so that she was unable to give an informed consent to the modification. The Supreme Court held that the evidence indicated that Shirley was better off under the new agreement and that the evidence also showed that the modification negotiations between the parties were amiable and that Shirley had consulted with her adult children and parents prior to signing the agreement. In re Marriage of Brownell, 263 M 78, 865 P2d 307, 50 St. Rep. 1714 (1993).

Undue Influence: Where defendant in an action on a note pleaded in defense undue influence and lack of consideration, and in addition relied upon this section, the fact that he did not proceed to have the note rescinded after evidence was found insufficient to warrant a verdict in his favor as to undue influence and lack of consideration was immaterial. Stagg v. Stagg, 96 M 573, 32 P2d 856 (1934).

Validity of Contract: Contract made with person entirely without understanding is void ab initio under 28-2-202, while one made with person of unsound mind "but not entirely without understanding" is voidable only at suit of one seeking to rescind on one of grounds mentioned in laws on rescission. Fleming v. Consol. Motor Sales Co., 74 M 245, 240 P 376 (1925).

Restoration of Consideration: Where plaintiff based her action on ground that deceased grantor did not have capacity to make a contract under 28-2-202, and not on ground that she was entitled to rescind under this section, an allegation that she had restored or offered to restore everything of value deceased had received from defendant was not required. Kiley v. Danahey, 61 M 608, 202 P 1110 (1921).

Case Notes

Prior Incorrect Surveys — Plaintiffs Not Intended Third-Party Beneficiaries to Contract — No Standing to Sue for Breach: Plaintiffs sued a surveying company and its owner for misrepresenting the boundaries of their property. They alleged that they had met with an employee of the surveying company prior to buying the parcel and he told them that the property consisted of waterfront property. Relying on his information, the plaintiffs purchased the parcel and built a structure on property belonging to a neighboring landowner. The plaintiffs sued for breach of contract and negligent misrepresentation. The plaintiffs successfully argued to the District Court they were third-party beneficiaries to at least one of two prior surveys performed by the surveying company for previous land owners. On appeal, however, the Supreme Court disagreed, concluding that the plaintiffs were incidental beneficiaries who were not specifically contemplated at the time the prior surveys were completed. Because they were strangers to the contracts, they lacked standing to sue for breach of contract. Kurtzenacker v. Davis Surveying, Inc., 2012 MT 105, 365 Mont. 71, 278 P.3d 1002. See also St. John v. Lewistown, 2017 MT 126, 387 Mont. 444, 395 P.3d 486.

Third-Party Administrators Not Liable for Made-Whole Violation Under State Employee Benefit Plan: Insureds under the state of Montana employee benefit plan sued the state and the third-party administrators (TPAs) who administer the state benefit plan, alleging violations of the subrogation statutes, Title 2, chapter 18, part 9. The District Court determined the subrogation statutes did not apply to the TPAs. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the TPAs are not "insurers" under Title 2, chapter 18, part 9, and therefore could not be held independently liable under the subrogation statutes in this case. In addition, the TPAs were not liable under a third-party beneficiary theory because the insureds failed to demonstrate that the benefits they received from the expertise of the TPAs in administering claims were anything but incidental, rather than a benefit that the state and the TPAs intended to bestow upon the insureds when they contracted for administrative services. Diaz v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield of Mont., 2011 MT 322, 363 Mont. 151, 267 P.3d 756.

Lack of Standing of Stranger to Contract to Bring Action to Enforce Contract: A stranger to a contract who is not an intended third-party beneficiary lacks standing to bring an action based on a violation of the contract, including compliance with the statute of frauds. Palmer v. Bahm, 2006 MT 29, 331 M 105, 128 P3d 1031 (2006), followed in Dick Anderson Constr., Inc. v. Monroe Constr. Co., LLC, 2009 MT 416, 353 M 534, 221 P3d 675 (2009). See also Ludwig v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2012 MT 213, 366 Mont. 285, 291 P.3d 1082.

Third-Party Materialman — Action Against Surety: A third-party materialman was not entitled to recover on a cause of action against a surety on its surety bond that named the general contractor as the sole obligee and when the general contractor, subcontractor, and surety did not intend to benefit or protect any third-party materialmen by the execution of the bond. Treasure St. Indus., Inc. v. Welch, 173 M 403, 567 P2d 947 (1977).

Employment Contract: Employee was not third-party beneficiary, within the meaning of statute, of a contract between his employer and United States providing that employer should at all times be fully responsible for and exercise reasonable precaution for health and safety of his employees engaged in performance of work under contract; hence employee was not entitled to maintain action for employer's breach of safety clauses in the absence of express promise in contract to pay damages in addition to employee's rights to Workers' Compensation. Hensley v. U.S., 279 F. Supp. 548 (D.C. Mont. 1968). See also West v. Morrison-Knudsen Co., 294 F. Supp. 1336 (D.C. Mont. 1969), affirmed in 451 F2d 493 (9th Cir. 1971).

Surety Contract for the Sale of Grain: When grain buyers entered into a surety contract for the benefit of grain sellers as required by statute, and not for the benefit of the state, the grain sellers and not the Department of Agriculture were the real parties in interest in an action for the purchase price of the grain, although the Department of Agriculture had a statutory right and duty to protect the grain sellers' interest. State ex rel. Farmers Elev. Co. v. District Court, 147 M 72, 410 P2d 160 (1966).

Contracts for Hospitalization Under Workmen's Compensation Act: A contract made pursuant to the Workmen's Compensation Act for supplying hospital, medical, and surgical care to all employees assenting thereto is one made for the benefit of third persons, the employees, who, upon its acceptance by them, become entitled to enforce it in accordance with its terms under this section. Kelly v. Mont. Power Co., 111 M 118, 106 P2d 339 (1940).

Where Plaintiff Was Not the Benefited Party: Where the manager of a motor car company fraudulently filled in a conditional sales contract signed by a customer in blank, the manager and company were liable for the fraud, but when the manager afterward sold his interest in the company to another under an agreement stating that such other should not be responsible for obligations of the company "due to outsiders", the latter contract was not made for the benefit of the defrauded customer so as to enable him to maintain suit against the buyer of the manager's interest to recover what he paid the finance company to release his conditional sales contract. Koontz v. Sharon, 109 M 180, 94 P2d 668 (1939).

Description of Beneficiary: The party for whose benefit the contract is made must be named or otherwise sufficiently described or designated. However, if the contract was made expressly for the benefit of a class of persons to which class the party seeking enforcement belongs, he may obtain the benefit of it. Conley v. USF&G Co., 98 M 31, 37 P2d 565 (1934).

Contractor's Bonds:

Mere statement of duties to be discharged by highway contractor which may incidentally benefit third party or class to which latter belongs, without more, does not make surety liable to third person for contractor's failure to discharge duty. Nat'l Sur. Co. of New York v. Ulmen, 68 F2d 330 (9th Cir. 1933). See also Ulmen v. Nat'l Sur. Co. of New York, 3 F. Supp. 348 (D.C. Mont. 1933); Ulmen v. Nat'l Sur. Co. of New York, 4 F. Supp. 194 (D.C. Mont. 1933).

Surety on state highway contractor's bond was held not liable to pay unsatisfied judgment against contractor and in favor of driver of automobile which hit culvert along highway under construction, notwithstanding contractor's failure to maintain danger and warning signs as required by contract. Nat'l Sur. Co. of New York v. Ulmen, 68 F2d 330 (9th Cir. 1933).

Stranger to highway contract or bond securing performance thereof cannot recover against surety even though referred to in contract or bond, in absence of specific promise to pay such third person. Nat'l Sur. Co. of New York v. Ulmen, 68 F2d 330 (9th Cir. 1933). See also Ulmen v. Nat'l Sur. Co. of New York, 3 F. Supp. 348 (D.C. Mont. 1933); Ulmen v. Nat'l Sur. Co. of New York, 4 F. Supp. 194 (D.C. Mont. 1933).

Statutory action by laborers and materialmen against surety on contractor's bond was held distinct from obligee's action for benefit of laborers and materialmen, and therefore former decision is not res judicata. Cove Irrigation District v. Am. Sur. Co. of New York, 42 F2d 957 (9th Cir. 1930), reversing Cove Irrigation District v. Am. Sur. Co. of New York, 35 F2d 933 (9th Cir. 1929).

Decision on former appeal holding materialman not entitled to recover under highway contractor's bond obligating contractor to furnish labor and material at his own expense should be adhered to on second appeal, though decision was based on construction of state law. The intermediate decision of state Supreme Court held that materialman could recover under the statute, permitting enforcement by third person of contract made expressly for his benefit, where contract there involved contained promise of contractor to pay for labor and material used; agreement of contractor to furnish labor and material at his own expense not being expressly for benefit of materialman, since "express" means made known distinctly and explicitly and not left to inference. Minn. Steel & Mach. Co. v. Fed. Sur. Co., 34 F2d 270 (9th Cir. 1929).

Where the State Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) requires a road construction contractor to promise in the contract awarded to him that he will pay laborers and materialmen, and the surety on his bond for the faithful performance of the work agrees to pay persons furnishing material and labor if the contractor fails to do so, laborers and materialmen may sue the surety directly in their own names as on a contract made for their benefit, as third parties, under this section; it being otherwise where the contract is silent as to paying such claims, though the surety promises to pay them, the bond in that regard then being unenforceable because not supported by a consideration. Gary Hay & Grain Co., Inc. v. Carlson, 79 M 111, 255 P 722 (1927), distinguished in Minn. Steel & Mach. Co. v. Fed. Sur. Co., 34 F2d 270 (9th Cir. 1929).

Burglary Insurance: In action against surety on robbery and burglary policy issued to County Treasurer to recover for loss of county money and securities stolen from Treasurer, the county was a proper, though not a necessary, party plaintiff, where the surety agreed to pay assured for loss sustained by assured or by owner, and county paid premiums on policy and was owner of property stolen. Nat'l Sur. Co. v. Sheridan County, 33 F2d 473 (9th Cir. 1929).

Incidental Beneficiary:

To entitle a person not a party to a contract between two others to recover thereunder, the contract must under this section have been made expressly for his benefit, the fact that it may incidentally benefit him being insufficient to bring him within the terms of this section. Martin v. Am. Sur. Co., 74 M 43, 238 P 877 (1925), overruled on another point in Gary Hay & Grain Co., Inc. v. Carlson, 79 M 111, 225 P 722 (1927), explained in Cove Irrigation District v. Am. Sur. Co. of New York, 35 F2d 933 (9th Cir. 1929); Conley v. USF&G Co., 98 M 31, 37 P2d 565 (1934).

Under this section, providing that "a contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person may be enforced by him at any time before the parties thereto rescind it", as construed by the Supreme Court of the state, which construction is binding on the federal courts, a contract, to come within the scope of the statute, must be one where the promisor undertakes to pay or discharge some debt or duty which the promisee owes to the third person. Where no consideration passes from the third person, but the provision for his benefit is voluntary on the part of the promisee, he cannot maintain an action for its enforcement. McNaught v. Hoffman, 274 F 918 (9th Cir. 1921).

Sufficiency of Complaint:

To entitle a third person to enforce a contract made between two others under this section, the complaint must show that it was expressly made for his benefit, or for the benefit of a class of persons to which he belongs, i.e., he, or they, either must be named therein or otherwise sufficiently described or designated; the fact that the contract may incidentally benefit him or them being insufficient. McKeever v. Oregon Mortgage Co., Ltd., 60 M 270, 198 P 752 (1921).

The complaint in an action by the vendors of land to recover the balance of the purchase price from a mortgage company which loaned the money to the vendee, setting forth the mortgage contract and alleging that the company had arranged with one of plaintiffs to hold the balance due until patent for the land should be received and recorded and then pay it directly to her, was insufficient, under this section, in the absence of an averment that the contract contained a provision that the mortgage was made expressly for the benefit of plaintiffs or either of them. McKeever v. Oregon Mortgage Co., Ltd., 60 M 270, 198 P 752 (1921).

Executory Contracts: The executory contract made expressly for the benefit of a third person must be one whereby the promisor undertakes to pay or discharge some debt or duty which the promisee owes to the third person. Tatem v. Eglanol Min. Co., 45 M 367, 123 P 28 (1912); McDonald v. Am. Nat'l Bank, 25 M 456, 65 P 896 (1901).

Application of Section: Plaintiffs were not entitled to enforce a contract for the payment of the balance of the purchase price as a contract made for their benefit, since this section does not apply to executory contracts without consideration. McDonald v. Am. Nat'l Bank, 25 M 456, 65 P 896 (1901).

Case Notes

Ambiguous Assignment — Construction of Document as a Whole: Peterson sold property to the Blairs under a contract for deed that reserved one-half the mineral rights in Peterson. Peterson then assigned her rights under the contract to Hopkins. The Blairs paid Hopkins and recorded. Peterson sued Hopkins to quiet title when the lessee of Peterson's one-half mineral rights claimed Peterson had assigned them to Hopkins by mistake. Hopkins was granted summary judgment because the assignment conveyed all of Peterson's right, title, and interest in the property, together with the contract for deed. The judgment was reversed, and judgment was granted Peterson. The assignment stated that it was subject to the contract for deed, thus creating an ambiguity. Taken as a whole, it appeared that the assignment was of the contract for deed and was not itself a deed of the entire surface and mineral interests to Hopkins. This was supported by the conduct of the parties, for Peterson leased her reserved interest for the 22 years following the assignment until lessee raised the alleged mistake, and at no time up to his death in the 17th year of the 22 years did Hopkins claim all the mineral rights or demand Peterson's one-half interest. Peterson v. Hopkins, 210 M 429, 684 P2d 1061, 41 St. Rep. 1140 (1984).

Ambiguous Assignment — Explanatory Evidence Admissible: A contract for deed reserved one-half the mineral rights in seller. Seller's subsequent assignment was ambiguous where it assigned all of seller's right, title, and interest in the property, together with the contract for deed, yet also stated that it was subject to the contract for deed. Therefore, the evidence was admissible to explain the ambiguity and the intent of seller and assignee of seller's rights under the contract for deed. Peterson v. Hopkins, 210 M 429, 684 P2d 1061, 41 St. Rep. 1140 (1984).

Assignor Not Liable for Breach by Debtor: Plaintiffs, tribal members, obtained a loan from the Blackfeet Tribe. Plaintiffs defaulted, and the tribe obtained a judgment in tribal court. The tribe filed notice with the Clerk and Recorder and the District Court. Plaintiffs agreed to sell their ranch to Robertson and to provide title insurance. A portion of the purchase price was placed in escrow to cover the amount owing the tribe. The escrow agreement contained a provision assigning pasturage fees to which plaintiffs were entitled to Robertson. Plaintiffs later filed suit against the tribe and Robertson. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that it is an established rule of contract law that the assignor does not guarantee that the obligor will pay and that the assignor is not liable to the assignee for breaches of the assignment by the debtor. Robertson could not recover pasturage fees from the plaintiffs, because plaintiffs did not owe them. Wippert v. Blackfeet Tribe, 201 M 299, 654 P2d 512, 39 St. Rep. 2117 (1982), overruled in part on other grounds by Green v. Gerber, 2013 MT 35, 369 Mont. 20, 303 P.3d 729.

Chattel Mortgage: Assignee of chattel mortgage given by buyer of automobile took the mortgage subject to buyer's defenses and equities existing at time of assignment. Sonnek v. Univ. C.I.T. Credit Corp., 140 M 503, 374 P2d 105 (1962).

What Contracts Assignable: As a general rule contracts between private individuals are assignable even in the absence of words making them so, subject, however, to the exceptions, among others, that they are not contracts wherein rights are coupled with liabilities, or for personal services, or which involve the relation of personal confidence. Standard Sewing Mach. Co. v. Smith, 51 M 245, 152 P 38 (1915).

No Conflict With or Expansion of Other Statute: This section is not in conflict with 27-1-503, and neither in any way enlarges the scope of the other nor the purpose which it was intended to accomplish. Cornish v. Woolverton, 32 M 456, 81 P 4 (1905); Stadler v. First Nat'l Bank, 22 M 190, 56 P 111 (1899).

Purpose:

The purpose of this section is to protect assignee of nonnegotiable contract against counterclaims, including setoffs, alleged as defenses, unless they are in existence and available at date of assignment. Cornish v. Woolverton, 32 M 456, 81 P 4 (1905); Stadler v. First Nat'l Bank, 22 M 190, 56 P 111 (1899).

Demand against assignor of nonnegotiable contract could not be set off against assignee, unless due and payable when assignment was made, and notice was unnecessary to prevent setoff of demand becoming payable subsequently. Cornish v. Woolverton, 32 M 456, 81 P 4 (1905); Stadler v. First Nat'l Bank, 22 M 190, 56 P 111 (1899).

Part Case Notes

Bodily Injury in Insurance Policy May Include Mental or Psychological Injury Accompanied by Physical Manifestations — Jacobsen Overruled: Defendant caused an automobile accident that injured two brothers, one of whom suffered severe trauma and was hospitalized for an extended period. The boys' mother filed a negligence action against defendant claiming emotional and physical injuries to herself and the brother who was not struck by the vehicle, including the mother's stress, migraine headaches, pain, depression, and a rapid heartbeat when hearing sirens, and the brother's withdrawal. Defendant sought liability coverage from her insurer, and the District Court, relying on Jacobsen v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 72, 320 M 375, 87 P3d 995 (2004), granted the insurer's motion for a declaratory judgment on grounds that the insurer was not obligated to provide a defense or coverage to defendant because defendant's policy did not cover the claimed emotional injuries or physical injuries resulting from the emotional injuries within the definition of bodily injury. On appeal, the Supreme Court reexamined the Jacobsen analysis in light of subsequent case law and overruled Jacobsen. Bodily injury as construed in an insurance policy includes a mental or psychological injury that is accompanied by physical manifestations. Defendant's insurance policy provided general coverage for damages that the insured was legally obligated to pay because of a bodily injury sustained by any person, which in this case included the physical manifestations that accompanied the mother's and brother's mental and psychological injuries. Allstate Ins. Co. v. Wagner-Ellsworth, 2008 MT 240, 344 M 445, 188 P3d 1042 (2008), followed in Tucker v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 2009 MT 247, 351 M 448, 215 P3d 1 (2009).

Bodily Injury Not Inclusive of Emotional or Psychological Injury Within Terms of Uninsured Motorist Policy: Jacobsen was driving a car insured by defendant when he stopped to assist another motorist who was unconscious with a bleeding head wound. Despite Jacobsen's ministrations, the motorist died a few days later, and the cause was determined to be suicide. The next year, Jacobsen began seeking treatment for emotional distress suffered as a result of the incident and filed a claim with defendant to recover uninsured motorist benefits and medical pay benefits. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendant, and Jacobsen appealed on grounds that his policy for uninsured motorist coverage included damages for bodily injury sustained by the insured caused by an accident. The Supreme Court held that the term "bodily injury" was not ambiguous and was limited to physical injury caused by an accident but did not include emotional or psychological injuries. Thus, Jacobsen's emotional injury, including resulting physical manifestations, did not constitute bodily injury as defined in the insurance contract and was not compensable. Jacobsen v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2004 MT 72, 320 M 375, 87 P3d 995 (2004), following Bain v. Gleason, 223 M 442, 726 P2d 1153 (1986), and Aetna Life & Cas. Co. v. First Sec. Bank of Bozeman, 662 F. Supp. 1126 (D.C. Mont. 1987). Jacobsen was overruled in Allstate Ins. Co. v. Wagner-Ellsworth, 2008 MT 240, 344 M 445, 188 P3d 1042 (2008), to the extent that bodily injuries include mental or psychological injuries that are accompanied by physical manifestations.

Contract to Arbitrate Not Formed by Employee Handbook and Employee's Acknowledgment — Ambiguous Arbitration Provisions: When Hubner began working for defendant communications company, she signed an acknowledgment in an employee handbook that contained an arbitration provision. The arbitration clause provided that all controversies would be subject to binding arbitration, but the clauses in the handbook specified that the handbook did not constitute a contract of employment or create any relationship other than an employment-at-will relationship. When Hubner's employment was subsequently terminated, she brought a state claim for wrongful discharge, and defendant moved for a summary disposition compelling arbitration pursuant to 27-5-115. The District Court agreed with Hubner that there was no agreement to arbitrate and denied the motion, so defendant appealed. Defendant argued that because the arbitration clause was separable, it could be independently enforced. A state contract law defense that goes to the entire contract rather than specifically to an arbitration clause does not defeat a motion to compel arbitration; however, when a defense is aimed directly at the arbitration provision rather than the entire contract, state law contract defenses may be applied to hold that no enforceable agreement to arbitrate was made. Further, acceptance or consent by the party against whom a contract is sought to be enforced is required before a contract is enforceable. The language in the handbook was ambiguous and construed against the drafter. The ambiguity prevented Hubner from knowing and accepting that she was agreeing to binding arbitration by signing the handbook. Thus, no contract to arbitrate was formed by virtue of the handbook and Hubner's acknowledgment, even when the arbitration provision was considered separately from the rest of the handbook. The District Court was affirmed. Hubner v. Cutthroat Communications, Inc., 2003 MT 333, 318 M 421, 80 P3d 1256 (2003).

Blank Security Agreement Signed by Borrower and Filled Out by Bank: Borrower signed a blank security agreement that bank then filled out and mailed to her. The record shows that she had the agreement in her possession in December 1985; thus, she had the means to discover the fraud that she alleged bank committed in setting the agreement's terms. Because she did not file a claim until December 1988, her claim was barred by the 2-year statute of limitations. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

Method of Acceptance of Bid by County Commissioners — Recorded Vote Held Sufficient: Where the Commissioners of the defendant county voted to accept the plaintiff's bid for a rock crusher but did not issue a written notice of bid award, as was usually done, informing the successful bidder of the acceptance of his bid, the Supreme Court held that the acceptance motion approved by the Commission and recorded in the Commission minutes constituted an acceptance of the bid and that there was no statutory provision for the procedure argued by the county. Modern Mach. v. Flathead County, 202 M 140, 656 P2d 206, 39 St. Rep. 2383 (1982).

Option Agreement — Sufficiency of Consent and Consideration: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that the writing involved was not an option agreement because it failed to meet the essential requirements for the validity of a contract. In particular, he contended that there was a lack of consent and that the consideration was legally insufficient. The Supreme Court found the actual payment of $1 and actual participation in a family corporate dissolution sufficient consideration for the agreement. A memorandum here acted as an offer, and a binding agreement resulted from action on that offer by the offeree. The trial court was affirmed. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981).

Case Notes

No Entitlement to Severance Benefits Following Rejection of Severance Package: Patterson's job was eliminated through a corporate restructuring, and Patterson was offered a severance package that was conditioned upon the release of all claims against the employer. Patterson declined the severance package and instead filed an employment discrimination claim against the employer. When the claim failed about 1 year later, Patterson signed the severance agreement and mailed it to the employer, who refused to honor it. Patterson then sued, claiming entitlement to the severance benefits. Following discovery, the District Court granted summary judgment for the employer. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The severance contract offer could no longer be considered valid because there was no mutual consent between the parties and because Patterson sought to accept the severance contract after violating the release provision. An acceptance upon terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer. Unless the party who made the original offer renews it or assents to a modification, an offeree cannot later revive a contract through acceptance after rejecting the offer. Patterson's purported acceptance was at best a counteroffer that the employer did not accept, so no contract arose between the parties as to severance, and Patterson was not entitled to severance benefits. Patterson v. Verizon Wireless, 2005 MT 261, 329 M 79, 122 P3d 1193 (2005).

Offer and Acceptance as Elements of Consent: To have consent, there must be both an offer and an acceptance of that offer. The Supreme Court reversed a lower court finding of consent when testimony was insufficient to establish that an offer for purchase of stock had been made and a lack of evidence existed showing that any offer was ever accepted. Daniels v. Thomas, Dean & Hoskins, Inc., 246 M 125, 804 P2d 359, 47 St. Rep. 2293 (1990).

No Mutual Mistake in Workers' Compensation Settlement: Claimant sought to have his workers' compensation settlement reopened on grounds of mutual mistake. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial of the request after finding: (1) claimant was capable of understanding the terms of the settlement agreement; (2) although claimant may have experienced an increased level of pain, there was no evidence to indicate the parties were mutually mistaken about the condition of claimant's back at the time of settlement; (3) there was no evidence to link claimant's personality disorder to his back injury; and (4) the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Whitcher v. Pac. Employers Ins. Co., 236 M 289, 769 P2d 1215, 46 St. Rep. 367 (1989).

Ignorance of Contract Contents Not Grounds for Relief From Liability: One who executes a written contract is presumed to know its contents and to assent to them. Ignorance of the contents is not grounds for relief from liability. Johnson v. Estate of Shelton, 232 M 85, 754 P2d 828, 45 St. Rep. 887 (1988), citing Quinn v. Briggs, 172 M 468, 565 P2d 297 (1977).

Undue Influence: Undue influence negates the free consent necessary for the proper formation of the contract. Adams v. Allen, 209 M 149, 679 P2d 1232, 41 St. Rep. 610 (1984).

Meeting of Minds — Oral Acknowledgment of Part of Written Contract Bid Specifications: The State's solicitation for bids for construction of building provided that the bid acknowledge receipt of any addenda. The State accepted the bid of a contractor that did not make the acknowledgment in its bid. The evidence that the State phoned the contractor regarding two addenda and contractor stated it knew of them and had begun preparation for fulfilling them was adequate to show that contractor had actual knowledge of the addenda and showed there was a meeting of the minds as to their existence and the requirements for fulfillment of their terms. Martel Constr., Inc. v. Bd. of Examiners, 205 M 332, 668 P2d 222, 40 St. Rep. 1340 (1983).

Finality of Workers' Compensation Decision — Grounds for Overturning: A full and final compromise settlement agreement between an injured worker and the Workers' Compensation State Fund was set aside because of mutual mistake of material fact by both parties. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), distinguished in Sollie v. Travelers Indem. Co., 212 M 197, 686 P2d 920, 41 St. Rep. 1684 (1984). A petition for rehearing was filed. The Supreme Court reaffirmed the decision. The petitioner argued the Workers' Compensation Court had no power to alter or rescind the agreement 4 years after its execution. The Supreme Court pointed out that it, not the Workers' Compensation Court, set aside the agreement. It noted the scope of its appellate power and also the code provision on lack of consent through mutual mistake of material fact. The Supreme Court was not broadening the possibilities of reopening such settlements; it merely found that no contract existed initially. Kienas v. Peterson, 38 St. Rep. 320 (1981) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports or Pacific 2d Reporter).

Workers' Compensation Settlement — Mutual Mistake: Plaintiff injured his back when he fell in the restaurant where he worked and a rack of dishes fell on him. He submitted his claim to the Workers' Compensation Division but was not represented by an attorney. He was examined by physicians who found him to be 5% disabled. Plaintiff entered into a full and final compromise settlement. Later examinations by physicians showed that plaintiff's fall had aggravated his preexisting cerebral palsy condition. This information was not available to either party at the time the settlement was entered into. Both parties were mistaken as to a fact material to the contract. The court found that the need to fairly compensate the injured worker is the intent and purpose of the Workers' Compensation Act. The full and final compromise settlement was set aside for mutual mistake of a material fact as to the nature and extent of the injury caused by claimant's accident. The case was remanded to the Workers' Compensation Court to determine the extent of claimant's disability. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), followed in Kimes v. Pac. Employers Ins. Co., 233 M 175, 759 P2d 986, 45 St. Rep. 1402 (1988), Weldele v. Medley Dev., 227 M 257, 738 P2d 1281, 44 St. Rep. 1062 (1987), and Keller v. Liberty NW., Inc., 2010 MT 279, 358 Mont. 448, 246 P.3d 434.

Duress or Undue Influence — Determination by Trial Court: The determination by a trial court of whether consent to a contract is obtained through duress or undue influence will not be disturbed on appeal where there is substantial evidence to support the judgment on the record, which the Supreme Court should view in a light most favorable to the prevailing party at the trial level. Keil v. Glacier Park, Inc., 188 M 455, 614 P2d 502, 37 St. Rep. 1151 (1980).

Misconception of Meaning: Though the mutual consent of the parties to a contract is an essential element thereof, where a written agreement is susceptible of but one meaning, a misconception thereof by one of the parties not authorized by the language used does not affect the contract. J. Neils Lumber Co. v. Farmers Lumber Co., 88 M 392, 293 P 288 (1930).

Menace: Under this section, the consent of a party to a contract must be free; this is not free when obtained through menace (28-2-401), and under 28-2-403, a threat of unlawful confinement of the person threatened constitutes menace. Clifford v. Great Falls Gas Co., 68 M 300, 216 P 1114 (1923). See also Fronk v. Collins, 2011 MT 315, 363 Mont. 110, 266 P.3d 1271, which held that the parties' contract did not suffer from lack of consent due to menace when the communication was between the parties' attorneys; the communication did not threaten imprisonment to compel payment, but only mentioned criminal and civil remedies; and the parties were free to abandon negotiations at any time.

28-2-302. Effect of consent which is not free.

Case Notes

False Representations: The sellers of a business falsely represented the profitability of the business and its standing with suppliers and wholesalers to prospective buyers. The buyers relied on and had a right to rely on the truth of the representations and were induced to purchase the business because of the false representations. Upon learning of the falsity of the representations that had induced them to purchase the business, the purchasers had the right to rescind the contract for deed for the purchase of the business. Lumby v. Doetch, 183 M 427, 600 P2d 200 (1979).

Question Whether Parties Consented to Contract — Material Fact Precluding Summary Judgment: The District Court determined that defendant did not consent to a title policy, so the contract was invalid and defendant was entitled to summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the issue of whether and when plaintiff instructed defendant to issue the title policy in plaintiff's name was a material fact that was disputed by the parties. The extent and nature of the parties' consents are questions of fact that must be first determined, so summary judgment was inappropriate and the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Amerimont, Inc. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2009 MT 212, 351 M 292, 210 P3d 691 (2009).

Failure to Establish Uninterrupted Possession to Qualify as Extinguished Easement — Summary Judgment Proper: A deed of restriction reserved easements on all existing roads within a subdivision for the scenic views and enjoyment of the property and for the reasonable general use of all subdivision property owners to access public lands. In 1984, defendants bought three subdivision tracts and promptly erected a locking gate across the road that intersected their property. Plaintiff subdivision association requested that defendants remove the gate because it was interfering with property owners' access to public lands. However, defendants refused and threatened legal action, so the association took no immediate action. The association eventually filed a complaint in 2000, accusing defendants of violating the deed of restriction by interfering with the easement. Defendants contended that the association had waived or abandoned any easement by not using the road for over 17 years. The District Court disagreed and granted summary judgment to the association. Defendants appealed on grounds that summary judgment was improper because a material fact existed as to whether the easement had been extinguished, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The association established the existence of a valid recorded easement that encumbered defendants' land, and defendants failed to show that their use of the road was continuous and uninterrupted for 5 years. In fact, the record was replete with admissions that association members continued to use the road, interrupting defendants' attempted adverse possession of the easement. Additionally, defendants testified that the gate was not locked all the time, that they lived outside the state part of the year, during which time they were unable to enforce their claim of right, and that the association had graded and maintained the road during the time in question. Thus, defendants' own testimony contradicted their claim of abandonment and adverse possession. The District Court did not err in finding that defendants' claims failed to establish a genuine issue of material fact that would preclude summary judgment. Meadow Lake Estates Homeowners Ass'n v. Shoemaker, 2008 MT 41, 341 M 345, 178 P3d 81 (2008).

No Entitlement to Severance Benefits Following Rejection of Severance Package: Patterson's job was eliminated through a corporate restructuring, and Patterson was offered a severance package that was conditioned upon the release of all claims against the employer. Patterson declined the severance package and instead filed an employment discrimination claim against the employer. When the claim failed about 1 year later, Patterson signed the severance agreement and mailed it to the employer, who refused to honor it. Patterson then sued, claiming entitlement to the severance benefits. Following discovery, the District Court granted summary judgment for the employer. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The severance contract offer could no longer be considered valid because there was no mutual consent between the parties and because Patterson sought to accept the severance contract after violating the release provision. An acceptance upon terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer. Unless the party who made the original offer renews it or assents to a modification, an offeree cannot later revive a contract through acceptance after rejecting the offer. Patterson's purported acceptance was at best a counteroffer that the employer did not accept, so no contract arose between the parties as to severance, and Patterson was not entitled to severance benefits. Patterson v. Verizon Wireless, 2005 MT 261, 329 M 79, 122 P3d 1193 (2005).

Bridle Path Easement — Express Easement by Reservation Versus Implied Easement — Extrinsic Evidence Regarding Parties' Intent Inadmissible: Purchasers in a subdivision had language in their deeds creating an express easement for a bridle path in the subdivision. The bridle path was never built, and over the years, the easement was obstructed by improvements on the lots of several subdivision residents. Eventually, the subdivision association attempted to extinguish the easement at a meeting of the board of directors. Some residents asked the District Court to establish the validity of the easement and to restrain obstruction of the easement, and their request was granted by partial summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted the difference between an implied easement, which is a creature of equity dependent on the intent of the parties, and an express easement by reservation, which is a creature of the documents of conveyance and the record. An express easement by reservation arises when the purchaser's deed refers to the plat where the easement is clearly depicted and labeled. In this case, the intent of the parties to create a bridle path easement was manifested through the language in the deeds and the plat, so under 28-2-905, extrinsic evidence regarding the intent of the parties was inadmissible. Further, the subdivision association was given oversight of the easement, but not ownership of it, and so lacked authority to extinguish the easement. The lower court's finding that a valid bridle path easement existed was affirmed. Pearson v. Virginia City Ranches Ass'n, 2000 MT 12, 298 M 52, 993 P2d 688, 57 St. Rep. 65 (2000), following Missoula v. Mix, 123 M 365, 214 P2d 212 (1950), Bache v. Owens, 267 M 279, 883 P2d 817 (1994), Halverson v. Turner, 268 M 168, 885 P2d 1285 (1994), and Tungsten Holdings, Inc. v. Parker, 282 M 387, 938 P2d 641, 54 St. Rep. 399 (1997), and distinguishing White v. Landerdahl, 191 M 554, 625 P2d 1145, 38 St. Rep. 412 (1981).

No Meeting of Minds Concerning Stock Transfer: Wife offered to convey shares of stock to husband to satisfy a dissolution judgment, but husband did not accept her offer; he merely agreed to consider it. Husband subsequently rejected wife's offer because of negative tax consequences associated with the transfer. There can be no binding contract without the mutual consent of the parties, and consent is established if there has been an offer and an acceptance of that offer. In re Marriage of Dalley, 237 M 287, 773 P2d 295, 46 St. Rep. 808 (1989).

Breach of Contract Action Sounding in Equity — Mutuality of Consent: Although an action for breach of contract to lend money is usually an action at law, the case sounded in equity where borrower argued that the contract was illusory and thus void because it lacked mutuality and that the lender's interpretation of the contract rendered the contract unconscionable and required the contract to be voided or reformed, and the lender raised the equitable defenses of estoppel, waiver, and laches. Shimsky v. Valley Credit Union, 208 M 186, 676 P2d 1308, 41 St. Rep. 258 (1984).

Commissioner to Determine Standard Prevailing Rate of Wages: Plaintiff was awarded the mechanical subcontract on a research laboratory being constructed by the State. The State received a complaint that plaintiff was not paying the "standard prevailing rate" (SPR) of wages. The State investigated and concluded that the complaint was legitimate. Plaintiff commenced a declaratory judgment action, and judgment was entered in his favor. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the authority to determine the SPR rests exclusively with the Commissioner of Labor and Industry. The District Court was incorrect in allowing the contractor to determine the SPR. The court also held that this was not reversible error since the SPR existed only somewhere in the bureaucracy and plaintiff was unaware of it. Because of this, there was no mutual assent under the contract. Thompkins v. Fuller, 205 M 168, 667 P2d 944, 40 St. Rep. 1192 (1983).

Factual Question: Consent is not mutual unless the parties agree upon the same thing in the same sense, and such mutuality requires a factual determination of the extent and nature of the parties' consents. Soha v. West, 196 M 95, 637 P2d 1185, 38 St. Rep. 2153 (1981).

Real Estate Listing Agreement — Attempt of Broker to Find Purchaser on Owner's Terms as Creating Mutuality: Buechler entered into a contract with Payne, granting him the right to sell Buechler's property. Payne attempted to sell the property and expended time and money to attract purchasers. Buechler canceled the contract before its term expired and sold the property herself. Buechler argued that the contract lacked mutuality. The court found that mutuality of obligation was created by the efforts of the broker to find a purchaser for the property on the owner's terms and the broker's expenditures of time and money in this effort. Payne v. Buechler, 192 M 311, 628 P2d 646, 38 St. Rep. 799 (1981).

Implied Easements — When Found — Effect of Contract: The plaintiffs sold a parcel of land to the defendants after a series of negotiations. No easement was specified through that parcel to the plaintiff's adjoining parcel and no other access existed to that second parcel. The Supreme Court found no implied easement, noting that the trial court would have been rewriting the contract had it found an implied easement. The trial court cited eight offers and counteroffers regarding an easement in this land sale and noted that there was a final decision between the parties that there would be no easement across the defendants' land. A court may not create as a matter of law an implied easement when the facts indicate the parties did not intend that an easement be created. Implied easements rest upon the intent of the parties gathered from the evidence. The record contained insufficient evidence to support an implied easement but contained substantial evidence to support the trial court's findings, conclusions, and judgment. White v. Landerdahl, 191 M 554, 625 P2d 1145, 38 St. Rep. 412 (1981), distinguished in Pearson v. Virginia City Ranches Ass'n, 2000 MT 12, 298 M 52, 993 P2d 688, 57 St. Rep. 65 (2000), with regard to the applicability of an implied easement, which is a creature of equity dependent on the intent of the parties, versus an expressed easement by reservation, which is a creature of the documents of conveyance and the record.

Mutual Assent on Elements of Contract — Raising at Trial Level: Plaintiff and defendants entered a buy-sell agreement for a parcel of land owned by defendants. From the filing of the complaint to eventual trial, both parties contended that the buy-sell was valid and enforceable against the other. The issue at trial was not the validity of the contract but whether it included certain alleged easements. Plaintiff was granted specific performance. On appeal, defendants contended that the parties had never agreed on the same terms, that there was no mutual assent or meeting of the minds, and therefore no enforceable contract. Because this contention had not been raised at the trial level, it could not be considered on appeal. Chadwick v. Giberson, 190 M 88, 618 P2d 1213, 37 St. Rep. 1723 (1980).

Lack of Mutuality: The court found that a "letter of instruction and joint assignment of funds" lacked mutuality but did not discuss the issue. Boise Cascade Corp. v. First Sec. Bank of Anaconda, 183 M 378, 600 P2d 173 (1979).

28-2-304. Ratification of contract void for want of consent.

Case Notes

Guarantor's Obligation Not Barred by Statute of Limitations as to Obligation of Principal: A creditor's claim against a guarantor is not exonerated by the running of the statute of limitations as against the principal. Mercury Marine v. Monty's Enterprises, Inc., 270 M 413, 892 P2d 568, 52 St. Rep. 255 (1995). See also Dupree v. Jordan, 252 P 67 (Okla. 1927), Bloom v. Bender, 313 P2d 568 (Calif. 1957), and Restatement of Security 130 (1941), Comment a on subsection (1) and illustration 2.

Written Memorialization Modifying Contribution Obligations Unenforceable — Audit of Payroll Records Allowed: It was error for a District Court to conclude that a written memorialization modifying an employer's obligation to contribute to a union trust fund was enforceable because the memorialization did not comply with the requirements in either the labor contract or the pension certification for making a contribution modification binding on the trust fund. The memorialization had not been subjected to the procedure for obtaining the trust fund's consent for modification. After noting that the issue had been properly raised at the trial level, the Supreme Court remanded for a recalculation of delinquent contributions, interest, and liquidated damages without regard to the memorialization. The court also affirmed the trust fund's right to audit the employer records for the time in question and vacated an award of attorney fees that had been premised on the employer as prevailing party. Hughes v. Blankenship, 266 M 150, 879 P2d 685, 51 St. Rep. 699 (1994).

Later Agreement on Alleged Ambiguity — Ratification: Plaintiff offered to buy defendants' ranch. After much negotiation, plaintiff paid earnest money, for which he received a receipt, and the parties entered into a buy-sell agreement on April 20, 1981. The April 20, 1981, buy-sell agreement contained all the essential elements of a contract. The closing documents prepared by defendants' attorney did not correspond to the April 20 agreement. On May 15, 1981, the parties met and plaintiff was again presented with closing documents not corresponding to the April 20 agreement. A dispute arose over a clause releasing a parcel of land up to 320 acres to plaintiff for building purposes on the date of closing. Plaintiff agreed to defendants' interpretation at the May 15 meeting. On May 20, 1981, plaintiff received a third set of closing documents not reflecting the April 20 or May 15 meetings. On June 2, the parties met and defendants presented new terms, one of which was transferring title to the real property in 1981 rather than in 1982, destroying plaintiff's planned income tax advantages, one of his reasons for buying the ranch. Defendants claimed the land was required to be transferred at the time the cattle were transferred or grazing permits would be lost. A Forest Service official informed defendants in a June 3, 1981, letter that three alternatives existed. At the end of a June 5, 1981, meeting, plaintiff's attorney prepared a contract based on the April 20 buy-sell, the May 15 interpretation of the release, and the June 5 meeting. On June 12, plaintiff signed the contract and attached a check for the downpayment. Defendants refused to sign, and suit was filed on July 2, 1982. The District Court held that a valid contract existed and that defendants had breached the contract. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the buy-sell contained all the essential elements of a contract. The court held that the release clause appeared unambiguous. The evidence presented showed that the parties' differing interpretations of the language were resolved and agreement on the clause was reached at the May 15, 1981, meeting. Under 28-2-304, a contract voidable for want of due consent may be ratified by subsequent consent. The May 15 agreement was held to be a ratification. Any delay in performance on plaintiff's part was due to defendants' failure to prepare documents conforming to the agreed-upon contract. The District Court was affirmed. Ehly v. Cady, 212 M 82, 687 P2d 687, 41 St. Rep. 1611 (1984).

Ratification of Lease by Accepting Compensation — Lease in Trust: Real property for which a lease was executed by husband and wife to lessee in 1956 for a 10-year term with 3-year extensions was transferred to a trust upon their divorce. The trustees were husband, wife, and daughter, with husband having "general control" over the business of the trust, but in other matters two of the three trustees were required to sign. At the expiration of the lease and the original three renewals, husband alone executed a new lease agreement to original lessee that was similar to the original but increased the rent. The rent increase was received and noted by wife and daughter. Three years later they sued husband and lessee for damages, unlawful detention, and liquidated damages, contending there was no valid lease signed by two of the three trustees. The Supreme Court held that by "generally operating" the trust the husband had authority to make a new lease. The actions of wife and daughter receiving increased compensation were notification to them of the lease change, and failure to act ratified the lease agreement even if the signature of one of them was required for its execution. Wyman v. Wyman, 208 M 57, 676 P2d 181, 41 St. Rep. 170 (1984).

Ratification of Collective Bargaining Agreements: The court improperly found that respondent construction contractor had no duty to make contributions to a union trust fund under the terms of a collective bargaining agreement. The record shows that respondent made contributions to the fund over an 8-year period, consistent with a recognition of its obligation under the collective bargaining agreement. As such, the respondent must be held to have ratified and approved the agreements. Audit Serv., Inc. v. Francis Tindall Constr., 183 M 474, 600 P2d 811 (1979), followed in Audit Serv., Inc. v. Harvey Bros. Constr., 204 M 484, 665 P2d 792, 40 St. Rep. 1019 (1983). See also Audit Serv., Inc. v. Houseman, 227 M 57, 737 P2d 71, 44 St. Rep. 891 (1987), Hughes v. Part 4
Circumstances Which Affect Validity of Apparent Consent

Sale of Trust Lands Within Flathead Reservation — No Jurisdiction Found for Purposes of Breach of Contract, Fraud, and Negligent Misrepresentation: Neuman, an enrolled member of the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes, sought assistance from the Bureau of Indian Affairs (BIA) to clear the title to trust land within the Flathead Reservation so that Neuman could sell it. He also engaged a real estate broker. Both Neuman and prospective buyers, the Krauses, made considerable efforts to consummate the sale, but Neuman was informed by the BIA that there was a substantial cloud on the title. Neuman therefore terminated the listing agreement, and the Krauses sued for damages, alleging breach of contract, fraud, constructive fraud, fraud in the inducement, and negligent misrepresentation. The District Court, on the recommendation of a special master and after applying the test laid out in State ex rel. Iron Bear v. District Court, 162 M 335, 512 P2d 1292 (1973), found a lack of subject matter jurisdiction. The Supreme Court held that 25 U.S.C. 345 and 28 U.S.C. 1353 vest exclusive jurisdiction in the federal courts over disputes involving allotted lands within Indian reservations and that 28 U.S.C. 1360 preempted its jurisdiction. The Supreme Court also held that the Krauses' lawsuit was a dispute involving title to allotted lands even though the action was a tort claim and breach of contract claim because all of the Krauses' claims could not be separated from questions of title to Indian trust lands. Noting that it had already held in In re Marriage of Wellman, 258 M 131, 852 P2d 559 (1993), that an attempt by state courts to adjudicate rights in Indian trust land for the purpose of money damages was precluded by federal law, the Supreme Court held that it made no difference that the Krauses had deleted from their complaint a prayer for specific performance. The claims could still not be separated from the issue of title to Indian lands. Krause v. Neuman, 284 M 399, 943 P2d 1328, 54 St. Rep. 937 (1997). In In re Estate of Big Spring, 2011 MT 109, 360 Mont. 370, 255 P.3d 121, the Supreme Court overruled Iron Bear in its entirety and Krause v. Neuman to the extent it relied on the Iron Bear test.

U.C.C. Unconscionability Provision — Application to Leases: The Montana Uniform Commercial Code provision relating to unconscionable sales contracts (30-2-302) can, at least by analogy, be applied to lease transactions and should guide the Supreme Court in determining whether a lease is unconscionable. All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

Unconscionability — Leases Between Businessmen: Courts have readily applied the doctrine of unconscionability of contracts as between consumers and businessmen but are reluctant to rewrite the terms of a contract between businessmen themselves. When, as in instant case, all provisions of a lease are agreed to by businessmen on both sides, none of the surrounding circumstances suggest oppression of lessee's freedom to select another lessor, nothing on the record suggests disparity of bargaining power, and lessee selected both the equipment leased and the supplier of the equipment to the lessor and notified lessor of lessee's desire to make the lease, the lease cannot be considered unconscionable. All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

Unconscionability — Success of Unsupported Claim: The mere unsupported claim that equipment lease under which appellants were sued was unconscionable and that a more oppressive lease was hard to imagine could not succeed on appeal from summary judgment for delinquent payments under lease. All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

28-2-401. When apparent consent not free.

Case Notes

No Error in Determining Firearms Belonged to Wife of Felon in Valid Prenuptial Agreement After Blissful Marriage Fell Apart: The District Court did not err in finding a prenuptial agreement valid and enforceable because the record contained no evidence that the agreement was fraudulent or that the husband lacked capacity, was under duress, or was subject to undue influence when he signed it. Accordingly, because the agreement stated that property gifted to either party would be owned separately, the District Court did not err in finding that guns gifted to the wife by the husband partially because the husband had a federal conviction and could not legally own them properly belonged to the wife. In re Marriage of Bliss, 2016 MT 51, 382 Mont. 370, 367 P.3d 395.

Sufficient Evidence for Rescission of Workers' Compensation Settlement Agreement Based on Mutual Mistake of Material Fact Not Discovered Until After Settlement: Gamble was injured on the job, the parties entered a settlement agreement, and the employer began paying benefits based on a medical diagnosis, yet Gamble's condition worsened. Finally, Gamble went to a specialist who ran additional tests and discovered that Gamble had suffered an odontoid fracture of the spine that was consistent with the job injury but that had been unnoticed at the time of the settlement. Gamble's request for additional medical benefits was denied by the employer because payment for the fracture was not part of the settlement. The Workers' Compensation Court held that the fracture was compensable, and the employer appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. If Gamble's fracture existed at the time of settlement, the parties were mutually mistaken regarding the material fact concerning the nature of Gamble's injury, requiring that the agreement be rescinded. The Supreme Court reviewed the findings and found that substantial credible evidence supported the facts that: (1) the fracture was consistent with and caused by the on-the-job injury; (2) Gamble's symptoms were consistent with the injury; (3) there was a basis for ruling out other potential causes of injury; and (4) there was an explanation as to why the injury was not diagnosed at the time of settlement. Because the mutual mistake of fact existed, the settlement agreement was properly rescinded. Gamble v. Sears, 2007 MT 131, 337 M 354, 160 P3d 537 (2007).

Authority of Workers' Compensation Court to Reopen Final Compromise Settlement Agreement Based on Mutual Mistake: Settlement agreements for workers' compensation benefits, like other agreements, are subject to the law of contracts. A Montana court that is not otherwise limited by statute, including the Workers' Compensation Court, has the authority to set those contracts aside based upon a mutual mistake regarding the nature and extent of a claimant's injuries even when express language in the settlement agreement purports to prohibit setting the agreement aside. Wolfe v. Webb, 251 M 217, 824 P2d 240, 49 St. Rep. 1 (1992), distinguishing Bowen v. Anaconda Co., 220 M 185, 714 P2d 142 (1986), and Hutchinson v. Pierce Packing Co., 219 M 18, 710 P2d 64 (1985), and followed in Gamble v. Sears, 2007 MT 131, 337 M 354, 160 P3d 537 (2007).

Blank Security Agreement Signed by Borrower and Filled Out by Bank: Borrower signed a blank security agreement that bank then filled out and mailed to her. The record shows that she had the agreement in her possession in December 1985; thus, she had the means to discover the fraud that she alleged bank committed in setting the agreement's terms. Because she did not file a claim until December 1988, her claim was barred by the 2-year statute of limitations. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

Costs Provided by Contract Allowable Despite Tortious Nature of Claim: In an action by plaintiff to rescind a contract for sale of real property because of alleged fraud, misrepresentation, undue influence, and unconscionability, the award of attorney fees and costs that the contract provided to the successful defendant, relating to his defense and counterclaim of wrongful occupation by the plaintiff, was proper notwithstanding the contention that the action sounded in tort and not in contract (citing Winer v. Jonal Corp., 169 M 247, 545 P2d 1094 (1976)). The underlying action was based on a contract dispute. Westlake v. Osborne, 230 M 364, 750 P2d 444, 45 St. Rep. 277 (1988).

Incompetence and Undue Influence Never Presumed — Presumption of More Satisfactory Evidence Not Error: Although incompetence or undue influence is never presumed and it is clearly the burden of the plaintiff to prove such matters, when the defendant failed to engage in the usual practice of calling upon doctors and nurses from the confining hospital to clearly show mental capacity at the time the instrument was signed, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the presumption in 26-1-602 that provides that more satisfactory evidence would be adverse if weaker and less satisfactory evidence is offered and it is within the pertinent party's power to produce more satisfactory evidence. That presumption relates only to the type and lack of evidence of the defendant, not to the plaintiff's burden of proof. Adams v. Allen, 209 M 149, 679 P2d 1232, 41 St. Rep. 610 (1984).

Finality of Workers' Compensation Decision — Grounds for Overturning: A full and final compromise settlement agreement between an injured worker and the Workers' Compensation State Fund was set aside because of mutual mistake of material fact by both parties. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), distinguished in Sollie v. Travelers Indem. Co., 212 M 197, 686 P2d 920, 41 St. Rep. 1684 (1984). A petition for rehearing was filed. The Supreme Court reaffirmed the decision. The petitioner argued the Workers' Compensation Court had no power to alter or rescind the agreement 4 years after its execution. The Supreme Court pointed out that it, not the Workers' Compensation Court, set aside the agreement. It noted the scope of its appellate power and also the code provision on lack of consent through mutual mistake of material fact. The Supreme Court was not broadening the possibilities of reopening such settlements; it merely found that no contract existed initially. Kienas v. Peterson, 38 St. Rep. 320 (1981) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports or Pacific 2d Reporter).

Workers' Compensation Settlement — Mutual Mistake: Plaintiff injured his back when he fell in the restaurant where he worked and a rack of dishes fell on him. He submitted his claim to the Workers' Compensation Division but was not represented by an attorney. He was examined by physicians who found him to be 5% disabled. Plaintiff entered into a full and final compromise settlement. Later examinations by physicians showed that plaintiff's fall had aggravated his preexisting cerebral palsy condition. This information was not available to either party at the time the settlement was entered into. Both parties were mistaken as to a fact material to the contract. The court found that the need to fairly compensate the injured worker is the intent and purpose of the Workers' Compensation Act. The full and final compromise settlement was set aside for mutual mistake of a material fact as to the nature and extent of the injury caused by claimant's accident. The case was remanded to the Workers' Compensation Court to determine the extent of claimant's disability. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), followed in Kimes v. Pac. Employers Ins. Co., 233 M 175, 759 P2d 986, 45 St. Rep. 1402 (1988), Weldele v. Medley Dev., 227 M 257, 738 P2d 1281, 44 St. Rep. 1062 (1987), and Keller v. Liberty NW., Inc., 2010 MT 279, 358 Mont. 448, 246 P.3d 434.

Duress or Undue Influence — Determination by Trial Court: The determination by a trial court of whether consent to a contract is obtained through duress or undue influence will not be disturbed on appeal where there is substantial evidence to support the judgment on the record, which the Supreme Court should view in a light most favorable to the prevailing party at the trial level. Keil v. Glacier Park, Inc., 188 M 455, 614 P2d 502, 37 St. Rep. 1151 (1980).

Duress as a Defense:

Where dairymen withheld milk from processor until the making of a written "output" agreement, actions of the dairymen did not constitute such duress as to make the written contract void. McNussen v. Graybeal, 146 M 173, 405 P2d 447 (1965).

The defense of duress is based upon the proposition that the consent of the party to the contract over whom it was exercised was not free. Bullard v. Smith, 28 M 387, 72 P 761 (1903).

Menace: Under 28-2-301, the consent of a party to a contract must be free; it is not free when obtained through menace, and under 28-2-403, a threat of unlawful confinement of the person threatened constitutes menace. Clifford v. Great Falls Gas Co., 68 M 300, 216 P 1114 (1923). See also Fronk v. Collins, 2011 MT 315, 363 Mont. 110, 266 P.3d 1271, which held that the parties' contract did not suffer from lack of consent due to menace when the communication was between the parties' attorneys; the communication did not threaten imprisonment to compel payment, but only mentioned criminal and civil remedies; and the parties were free to abandon negotiations at any time.

28-2-402. What constitutes duress.

Case Notes

Threat to Withdraw as Legal Counsel: Duress was not present when attorney, minutes before he was to defend client on criminal charges, threatened to withdraw as counsel unless client executed security agreement and quitclaim deed as security for attorney's fee. Attorney had given the instruments to client weeks before trial but client had failed to execute them. Matthews v. Berryman, 196 M 49, 637 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 2112 (1981).

Threat of Breach: The threat of breach on existing agreement does not constitute duress in order to obtain a different agreement. Kovash v. Knight, 169 M 227, 545 P2d 1091 (1976).

Unlawful Detention of Property — Economic Duress: An allegation of economic duress does not constitute a defense when there is no allegation of an unlawful detention of property as is required by this section. Double X Ranch v. Savage Bros., 167 M 231, 536 P2d 1176 (1975).

Economic Duress:

While equity recognizes the doctrine of economic duress, the vast majority of cases still require wrongful or unlawful conduct as an essential element. McNussen v. Graybeal, 146 M 173, 405 P2d 447 (1965).

Dairymen who withheld milk from processor under an oral "requirement" agreement did not use such duress as to make subsequent written "output" contract void, since "requirement" agreement put them under no legal obligation to deliver milk, and duress requires an unlawful act. McNussen v. Graybeal, 146 M 173, 405 P2d 447 (1965).

Threats to Take Legal Action:

To threaten to do only those things which a person has a legal right to do under an existing contract does not constitute duress, nor may a charge of duress be based on mere vexation and annoyance, mere pecuniary distress, or a refusal to surrender property on which one has a lien. Pederson v. Thoeny, 88 M 569, 295 P 250 (1930).

Threats to enforce payment of promissory notes in the manner provided in a contract of sale in case of nonpayment do not constitute duress. Ott v. Pace, 43 M 82, 115 P 37 (1911).

Duress Upon Third Person — Comaker of Note — Threat of Criminal Prosecution: As a general rule, a contractual obligation cannot be avoided because of duress imposed upon a third person, with the possible exception of persons who bear a close relationship to the threatened person. The defense of duress was not available to the maker of a note given to prevent a threatened criminal prosecution against his comaker for failure to pay over money collected by the latter. Spear v. Ryan, 64 M 145, 208 P 1069 (1922).

Threatened Arrest: Where it was believed that defendant was connected with theft of sheep and he gave a promissory note for damages occasioned by the theft, defense that note sued upon was executed under duress was not sustained by evidence that defendant had been threatened with arrest. Bullard v. Smith, 28 M 387, 72 P 761 (1903).

28-2-403. What constitutes menace.

Case Notes

Validity of Promissory Note Executed to Satisfy Charge-Back Liability in Nigerian Scam: Hughes executed a promissory note to satisfy a charge-back liability necessitated by Hughes' participation in a Nigerian scam. Hughes made the first payment on the note, but failed to make any more payments, and the bank that issued the note initiated an action for judicial foreclosure. The District Court granted summary judgment to the bank on the promissory note, and Hughes appealed. The Supreme Court considered Hughes' arguments regarding lack of consideration, menace, and undue influence. Hughes became liable under 30-4-212 for satisfying the entire charge-back debt, so the note did not fail for lack of consideration. Hughes' first quarterly payment comprised a ratification of the contract, so the note did not fail for consent because of menace. Whatever influence the bank employee exerted over Hughes, it did not rise to the level of substituting the employee's will for that of Hughes, nor was there any indication that Hughes was in a mentally or physically weak state or in a confidential relationship with the employee, so the note did not fail for lack of consent as a result of undue influence. Based on the claims made and the facts asserted, summary judgment for the bank was affirmed. Valley Bank of Ronan v. Hughes, 2006 MT 285, 334 M 335, 147 P3d 185 (2006), following Averill Mach. Co. v. Taylor, 70 M 70, 223 P 918 (1924), and Heintz v. Vestal, 185 M 233, 605 P2d 606 (1980).

Detention of Property: To threaten to do only those things which a person has a legal right to do under an existing contract does not constitute duress, nor may a charge of duress be based on mere vexation and annoyance, mere pecuniary distress, or a refusal to surrender property on which one has a lien. Pederson v. Thoeny, 88 M 569, 295 P 250 (1930).

Threat to Prosecute:

A threat to send one to the penitentiary for an alleged crime unless he execute a promissory note and a mortgage securing it constitutes menace, and renders the instruments thereupon executed void, since the element of consent freely given, indispensable to a valid contract, is absent in such a case. Averill Mach. Co. v. Taylor, 70 M 70, 223 P 918 (1924).

A threat to prosecute one for a crime of which he is not guilty constitutes menace. Averill Mach. Co. v. Taylor, 70 M 70, 223 P 918 (1924).

Collection of Debt: Plaintiff's testimony in his action to recover $200, claimed to have been obtained from him by defendant gas company by the use of threats, showed that he had surreptitiously used gas without the same having first passed through the gas meter, that defendant's manager upon discovery of that fact had threatened him that unless he paid the $200 he would send him to the penitentiary, and that thereupon to avoid prosecution or being sent to prison he made payment. He contended, however, that he had used only $10 worth, and a motion for nonsuit was improperly granted, since the testimony would have justified a finding that the threats were made for an unlawful purpose—the collection of a debt—and that the acts of defendant's manager constituted a menace under this section. Clifford v. Great Falls Gas Co., 68 M 300, 216 P 1114 (1923). See also Fronk v. Collins, 2011 MT 315, 363 Mont. 110, 266 P.3d 1271, which held that the parties' contract did not suffer from lack of consent due to menace when the communication was between the parties' attorneys; the communication did not threaten imprisonment to compel payment, but only mentioned criminal and civil remedies; and the parties were free to abandon negotiations at any time.

28-2-404. Kinds of fraud.

Case Notes

Sufficient Evidence to Conclude Bank Committed Actual Fraud: The plaintiff financed a home through the defendant bank's predecessor. The plaintiff requested a 30-year residential loan and was told by the bank that she received this loan. However, the bank issued an 18-month commercial loan and did not inform the plaintiff. The plaintiff sued alleging fraud. On the first appeal, the Supreme Court found that several sworn affidavits presented by the defendant were false. On remand, the defendant failed to supplement discovery. A jury awarded $1 million in compensatory damages and $5 million in punitive damages in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed, stating that the evidence did not support a finding of actual fraud. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that all nine elements of actual fraud were satisfied. McCulley v. U.S. Bank of Montana, 2015 MT 100, 378 Mont. 462, 347 P.3d 247.

Statute of Frauds — No Bar to Fraud Claim: Because the plaintiffs were not merely seeking to enforce an oral agreement, the Supreme Court overturned a District Court finding that the statute of frauds precluded a plaintiff's claim of actual fraud, constructive fraud, and violations of the Montana Consumer Protection Act. Rather, the plaintiffs were alleging that the defendants misrepresented an existing real estate loan and serviced the loan in an unfair and deceptive manner, a claim that relied on the oral contract as evidence of alleged fraud but that did not rely on the validity of the oral contract itself. Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167. However, see Bank of America, N.A. v. Alexander, 2017 MT 31, 386 Mont. 305, 389 P.3d 1020, in which a claim that the parties modified an oral agreement was dismissed because it was barred by the statute of frauds.

Inability to Obtain Real Estate Financing — Return of Earnest Money Proper: Defendants secured prequalification on a real estate loan and, pursuant to the buy-sell agreement, paid $53,000 in earnest money to purchase a condominium from plaintiff. The buy-sell agreement required the defendants to obtain financing for the remaining $946,000 of the purchase price. However, the economic climate later changed and required the need for a larger down payment, which defendants did not have. Defendants notified plaintiff and requested the return of the earnest money, but plaintiff refused and filed a fraud action, contending that defendants falsely represented their borrowing status and failed to obtain the required financing. The District Court summarily dismissed the fraud claims because the purchase agreement provided that if conventional financing could not be obtained, the agreement was void. On appeal, plaintiff asserted that a genuine issue of material fact remained regarding the fraud claims, precluding summary judgment. The Supreme Court disagreed. It was undisputed that defendants applied for loans and were prequalified for financing, so defendants did not misrepresent their borrowing status. Summary dismissal of the fraud claims was appropriate as a matter of law, particularly because plaintiff had the opportunity to be heard on the issue. The District Court properly terminated the purchase agreement when defendants could not obtain financing, and plaintiff was correctly ordered to return the earnest money. Mill Creek Ltd. Partnership v. Lodge, 2010 MT 65, 355 Mont. 478, 228 P.3d 1144.

Sufficient Evidence of Negligent Misrepresentation — Summary Judgment Proper: Plaintiffs sued for negligent misrepresentation because defendants allegedly misled plaintiffs regarding the output of a well on a subdivision lot purchased by plaintiffs. The District Court granted summary judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appealed. The Supreme Court applied the elements in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520 (1995), to determine whether the record affirmatively established that defendants made a false representation as to a past or existing material fact without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true, with the intent to induce plaintiffs' reliance, and that plaintiffs, unaware of the falsity of the representation, justifiably relied on the representation and suffered damage as a result of the reliance. Plaintiffs established that they had inquired about the well output on numerous occasions and that defendants indicated at closing that the well produced 3,600 gallons of water a day, even though they knew that the well produced only 700 gallons a day. Plaintiffs also established that they relied on defendants' representation and that they suffered damages by having to install a cistern and to haul water to the property instead of using the well. Evidence of negligent misrepresentation was thus proved and summary judgment for plaintiffs was affirmed. Walters v. Luloff, 2008 MT 17, 341 M 158, 176 P3d 1034 (2008).

No Actual Malice Shown in Replacement of Seed With Different Variety: Plaintiff delivered a load of wheat seed to defendant's facility for cleaning and treating. Defendant inadvertently dumped the load into a waste bin, replaced the seed with a similar but different variety, and charged plaintiff for cleaning and treatment without informing plaintiff of the error. When the crop came up, plaintiff noticed that the seed was a different variety, sued defendant for negligent misrepresentation, and sought compensatory and punitive damages. The District Court found no actual malice on defendant's part and declined to award punitive damages. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Substantial credible evidence showed that defendant's personnel assumed that plaintiff was planting a variety that was commonly used in the area and substituted that common variety, assuming that no injury would result in the misrepresentation that the seed plaintiff was going to plant was the same seed plaintiff delivered. Defendant neither had knowledge of facts nor intentionally disregarded facts that created a high probability of injury to plaintiff, so the definition of actual malice was not met and the District Court correctly declined to award punitive damages without a finding of actual malice. Hallenberg v. Gen. Mills Operations, Inc., 2006 MT 191, 333 M 143, 141 P3d 1216 (2006).

Fraud Committed in Course of Dissolution Proceeding Considered Intrinsic — Claim of Extrinsic Fraud Properly Dismissed: Castonguay brought a claim against her ex-husband, Andrew, on grounds that Andrew offered perjured testimony in a prior dissolution proceeding regarding Andrew's ownership of real property and that the conflicting statements acted as extrinsic fraud on the trial court and resulted in the court awarding Andrew more property than he was entitled to. Castonguay's claim was summarily dismissed on grounds that Castonguay failed to submit any evidence of extrinsic fraud, and Castonguay appealed. The Supreme Court cited Clark v. Clark, 64 M 386, 210 P 93 (1922), for the holding that acts for which a judgment or decree may be set aside or annulled on grounds of fraud have reference only to fraud that is extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by the court and not to fraud that is intrinsic to the matter on which judgment was rendered. Castonguay's alleged facts, if taken as true, amounted to perjury intrinsic to the dissolution proceeding. Because Castonguay failed to offer evidence of extrinsic fraud for which relief could be granted, Castonguay's claim was properly dismissed. Castonguay v. Estate of Polson, 2005 MT 265, 329 M 103, 122 P3d 1208 (2005).

Previously Raised but Unlitigated Alter Ego Claim Not Barred by Res Judicata: Following a dispute over the sale of irrigation equipment, H-D Irrigating and Lane sued Kimble Properties and Kimble for false representation of the irrigation equipment and damages. Kimble Properties and Kimble counterclaimed for the balance due on the equipment, alleging that H-D Irrigating was a sham and the alter ego of Lane. The alter ego claim was never pursued. The Supreme Court eventually decided the case in H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95 (2000), and remanded for judgment in favor of Kimble. In an effort to collect, Kimble sought to compel Lane to testify regarding the assets of H-D Irrigating, but rather than appear, Lane filed bankruptcy and received a stay on further proceedings. Kimble then filed an action to collect from Lane personally, again raising the alter ego issue. Lane asserted that the issue had been already decided in the prior litigation and sought supervisory control on res judicata grounds. After accepting supervisory control, the Supreme Court decided that res judicata did not bar Kimble's litigation of the alter ego claim. The action to pierce the H-D Irrigating corporate veil was neither previously adjudicated in District Court nor were the facts upon which the claim was based known to Kimble at the time that the counterclaim was filed or at any other time during the course of the previous action. The case was thus remanded for further proceedings on the alter ego claim. Lane v. District Court, 2003 MT 130, 316 M 55, 68 P3d 819 (2003), applying Berlin v. Boedecker, 268 M 444, 887 P2d 1180 (1994).

Six Elements Required to Prove Negligent Misrepresentation — Exercise of Due Care Question for Jury: A real estate broker appealed a verdict finding that an employee had negligently misrepresented the boundary of property purchased by the Cechovics. The Supreme Court held that a plaintiff had to prove the following six elements in order to show negligent misrepresentation: (1) the defendant made a representation as to a past or existing fact; (2) the representation was untrue; (3) the defendant made the representation without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true; (4) the representation was made with the intent to induce the plaintiff to rely on it; (5) the plaintiff was unaware of the falsity of the representation and was justified in relying on it; and (6) the plaintiff was damaged as a result of relying on the representation. The Supreme Court also held that in addition to the six elements, the plaintiff had to show that the defendant failed to exercise due care in obtaining or communicating the information and that the question of whether the defendant had exercised due care was for the jury and would not be overturned on appeal so long as there was substantial evidence to support the jury's finding. Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995), followed in Walters v. Luloff, 2008 MT 17, 341 M 158, 176 P3d 1034 (2008). However, see Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167.

No Evidence of Fraud — Summary Judgment Appropriate:

When a lender brought suit to foreclose on a promissory note, defendant filed counterclaims, alleging fraud and economic duress. Summary judgment in favor of the lender was proper because the defendant did not make an issue of material fact for fraud. The lender's alleged withdrawal of a promise to add delinquent payments to the end of the contract does not amount to fraud. Avco Financial Serv. v. Foreman-Donovan, 237 M 260, 772 P2d 862, 46 St. Rep. 785 (1989), followed in Bengala v. Conservative Sav. Bank, 250 M 101, 818 P2d 371, 48 St. Rep. 880 (1991).

Since 28-2-404 does not preclude summary judgment when there is no evidence supporting a claim of fraud, under former Rule 56(c), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), summary judgment was appropriate. Campbell v. Campbell, 223 M 124, 725 P2d 207, 43 St. Rep. 1584 (1986), followed in Smith v. Howery, 227 M 284, 738 P2d 502, 44 St. Rep. 1085 (1987).

General Assertions of Fraud — Defendant Properly Dismissed: The wife of a defendant convicted of fraudulent misrepresentation of income when selling a business was properly dismissed as a defendant when general assertions of fraud revealed only her involvement as co-owner of the business, her performance of some business bookkeeping functions, and her presence at a few meetings where the sale was discussed. None of the elements of fraud were established by evidence. Selvidge v. McBeen, 230 M 237, 750 P2d 429, 45 St. Rep. 168 (1988). See also Aldrich & Co. v. Donovan, 238 M 431, 778 P2d 397, 46 St. Rep. 1393 (1989).

Dual Prongs for Piercing Corporate Veil — Evidence of Fraud Sufficient: There are two prongs to piercing the corporate veil. First, the person purporting to represent the corporation must be found to be the corporate "alter ego". Second, there must be a showing that the corporate entity was used as a subterfuge to defeat public convenience, justify wrong, or perpetrate either actual or constructive fraud. Drilcon, Inc. v. Roil Energy Corp., Inc., 230 M 166, 749 P2d 1058, 45 St. Rep. 114 (1988), followed in Berlin v. Boedecker, 268 M 444, 887 P2d 1180, 51 St. Rep. 569 (1994).

Instruction Given on Constructive Fraud — Instruction on Bad Faith Superfluous: The District Court instructed the jury on constructive fraud but not on breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which plaintiff contended was error. The Supreme Court noted that the jury found no breach of duty under the instruction on constructive fraud, which does not require a showing of fraudulent intent. An instruction on bad faith would require plaintiff to prove intentional concealment. The court held that if plaintiff could not meet the burden of proof on constructive fraud, she could not meet the higher burden of proof on bad faith; thus, the instruction would have been superfluous. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986), partially overruled in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995).

Instruction on Negligent Misrepresentation Not Given — Action for Fraud: There was no error when District Court instructed the jury on constructive fraud but not on negligent misrepresentation. In Montana, an action for negligent misrepresentation is an action for fraud, so the jury was adequately instructed. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986), partially overruled in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995).

Fiduciary Relationship Basis for Constructive Fraud Cause of Action: Dealings or transactions between parties who have a fiduciary relationship provide a sufficient contract to support an action for constructive fraud. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986). See also Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

False Representation as Actual Fraud — No Directed Verdict: Defendants contended that plaintiffs' evidence was insufficient to establish a false representation or justifiable reliance on the representation and that therefore defendants' motions for a directed verdict were improperly denied. The Supreme Court noted that a prospectus given to plaintiff, McGregor, contained financial statements which would be misleading to someone not knowledgeable in accounting and that a jury could find that false representations were made on this evidence. The court found that McGregor adequately investigated the business and reasonably relied on defendants' representations. The Supreme Court found no error in the District Court's failure to direct a verdict for defendants on the claim of actual fraud. McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Parol Evidence Rule — Constructive Fraud as Within the Exception: Defendant represented plaintiff in a civil action in federal court. The parties agreed that the case was originally handled on a 50% contingency fee basis. The case lasted almost 10 years. Plaintiff signed a formal authorization for defendant to settle. At the time of settlement, plaintiff contended the parties agreed to replace their 50% of net fee agreement with a percentage distribution of the gross settlement amount. At some point in time, the parties signed an agreement in defendant's handwriting providing for a 75%-25% split of the settlement. The agreement contained a clause stating the agreed sums had been paid in full. Plaintiff contended defendant had retained half the settlement. Defendant contended that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify concerning the agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the fraud exception to the parol evidence rule addresses both actual and constructive fraud. The court stated that constructive fraud often exists where the parties to a transaction have a special confidential or fiduciary relation which affords the power and means to one to take undue advantage of or exercise undue influence over the other. The attorney-client relationship is a fiduciary one. Evidence presented along with plaintiff's testimony established constructive fraud on defendant's part. The court held that plaintiff's claim of conduct against defendant, which constituted at least constructive fraud, fell within the ambit of the fraud exception of the parol evidence rule. Eaton v. Morse, 212 M 233, 687 P2d 1004, 41 St. Rep. 1708 (1984).

Constructive Fraud as Basis for Punitive Damages: Section 27-1-221 allows punitive damages for fraud. Section 28-2-404 specifically defines fraud as including constructive fraud. The breach of a fiduciary relationship constituting a constructive fraud forms the basis for an award of punitive damages. Purcell v. Automatic Gas Distrib., Inc., 207 M 223, 673 P2d 1246, 40 St. Rep. 1997 (1983).

Actual Fraud — Summary Judgment Precluded: Actual fraud is a question of fact. Therefore, summary judgment is precluded where willful misrepresentations amounting to fraud are alleged. Jenkins v. Hillard, 199 M 1, 647 P2d 354, 39 St. Rep. 1156 (1982).

Negligent Misrepresentation by a Stockbroker: A stockbroker testified that what he told a customer regarding the risk of a transaction he believed to be true. The customer testified that he did not believe he had been deliberately misinformed by the broker. However, one who in the course of a transaction in which he has a pecuniary interest supplies information for the guidance of others in their transactions must exercise reasonable competence in obtaining or communicating the information. Negligent as well as intentional misrepresentation can be the basis of a tort action in fraud. Brown v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 197 M 1, 640 P2d 453, 39 St. Rep. 305 (1982), followed in Wagner v. Cutler, 232 M 332, 757 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1092 (1988).

Possible Differing Conclusions — No Directed Verdict: Plaintiff applied to defendant for health coverage for himself and his family. He met with an agent who filled out the application, which was signed by both parties. Plaintiff was not given a copy of the application or contract and was not advised that the application was part of the contract. The application was accepted. The family contracted medical bills which defendant declined to pay, claiming that the bills stemmed from "preexisting conditions" not covered by the contract. Defendant then unilaterally canceled the contract, claiming plaintiff had misrepresented his family's health in the application, and plaintiff filed suit. Defendant moved for a directed verdict on the issues of actual and constructive fraud and the tort of bad faith, which was denied. If the representations that induced the plaintiff to enter the contract were false, he would have a case in fraud. If the contract were breached, a cause of action may sound in tort, although it arises out of a breach of contract, if the defaulting party by breaching the contract also breaches the duty to act in good faith owed to the other party independently of the contract. The evidence viewed in a light most favorable to plaintiffs indicated reasonable men could differ as to the conclusions drawn from the evidence. Therefore, the directed verdict was properly denied. Weber v. Blue Cross of Mont., 196 M 454, 643 P2d 198, 39 St. Rep. 245 (1982).

Question of Fraud — No Summary Judgment: When a lessee alleged fraud in the termination of his lease, he was not entitled to a summary judgment since fraud is always a question of fact. Chamberlain v. Evans, 180 M 511, 591 P2d 237 (1979).

Contract to Divide Commission: Where an oral contract was made between two real estate brokers to divide a commission, fraud in failing to perform was not proved when there was a possibility the sale would not go through, since the mere fact that a promise was not carried out is not proof that such promise was made with no intention to perform. Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965).

Fraud Not Presumed: Actual fraud is always a question of fact to be established by competent evidence, since fraud cannot be presumed. Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965); Harrison v. Riddell, 64 M 466, 210 P 460 (1922).

Burden of Proof:

Where the plaintiff charged actual fraud on the part of the defendant, the burden of establishing such fact was on plaintiff. Hjermstad v. Barkuloo, 128 M 88, 270 P2d 1112 (1954).

In an action based on fraud the question whether actual fraud has been practiced is one of fact, and the burden of proof is upon him who alleges it. Lee v. Stockmen's Nat'l Bank, 63 M 262, 207 P 623 (1922).

Inference of Fraud:

The question of fraud is always a question of fact for the jury, unless the evidence is uncontradicted and it is impossible to draw any inference from it other than that it entered into the particular transaction, whereupon it becomes one of law for the court. Williams v. Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York, 61 M 66, 201 P 320 (1921).

Where the facts in an action for fraud are not controverted and furnish the basis of but one inference, namely that the defendant is guilty of the fraud alleged, the court may infer the fraud as a matter of law and direct a verdict in favor of plaintiff. Shoudy v. Reeser, 48 M 579, 142 P 205 (1914).

Concealment of Facts: Whether an applicant for life insurance intentionally concealed facts which are material, or made false representations with reference to them, intending to deceive the insurer, thus being guilty of actual fraud, was a question of fact for the jury. Pelican v. Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York, 44 M 277, 119 P 778 (1911).

ELEMENTS OF FRAUD

Sufficient Evidence to Conclude Bank Committed Actual Fraud: The plaintiff financed a home through the defendant bank's predecessor. The plaintiff requested a 30-year residential loan and was told by the bank that she received this loan. However, the bank issued an 18-month commercial loan and did not inform the plaintiff. The plaintiff sued alleging fraud. On the first appeal, the Supreme Court found that several sworn affidavits presented by the defendant were false. On remand, the defendant failed to supplement discovery. A jury awarded $1 million in compensatory damages and $5 million in punitive damages in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant appealed, stating that the evidence did not support a finding of actual fraud. The Supreme Court disagreed, finding that all nine elements of actual fraud were satisfied. McCulley v. U.S. Bank of Montana, 2015 MT 100, 378 Mont. 462, 347 P.3d 247.

Tort Claims Not Precluded by Parties Contracting on Same Matter: The parties entered into an agreement for the defendant to purchase the plaintiff's home. After the defendant reneged on the agreement, the plaintiff filed an action for fraud, deceit, and negligence. The District Court dismissed the claims based on its conclusion that the plaintiff's injuries resulted from the defendant's breach of contract and therefore she was precluded from bringing any tort claims against him. The plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court explained that tort claims are not prohibited simply because the parties have entered into a contract on the same matter. However, given that the plaintiff had offered only speculative statements regarding the fraud and deceit claims, the Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's grant of summary judgment on behalf of the defendant on those claims, but it remanded the matter to the District Court to allow the negligence claim to proceed. Dewey v. Stringer, 2014 MT 136, 375 Mont. 176, 325 P.3d 1236.

Actual Fraud — Speaker's Knowledge of False Representation or Ignorance of Its Truth Required: Actual fraud does not require the speaker's knowledge of a statement's falsity but may also be proven if the defendant is ignorant of whether the statement is true. Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167.

Fraud Substantiated in Attorney's Handling of Probate Case — Violation of Attorney's Duty of Truthfulness — Public Censure Warranted: Attorney Potts represented parties in a will contest. Two of the parties knew that some joint tenancy accounts were not included in the value of the estate and, in an attempt to secure the funds in the accounts, directed Potts to remain silent as to whether the settlement agreement prepared by Potts included the accounts. Potts failed to notify the court and counsel for the estate that one of his clients intended to obtain the jointly held property regardless of the outcome of any settlement. The Supreme Court subsequently determined in In re Estate of Stukey, 2004, MT 279, 323 M 241, 100 P3d 114 (2004), that the parties intended that the total estate value, including the joint tenancy accounts, be included in the settlement. A professional misconduct complaint was later filed against Potts, alleging that Potts engaged in or assisted in client fraud by failing to disclose material information to opposing counsel and that Potts breached the duty of candor to the tribunal by failing to disclose material information to the court. The Commission on Practice found that Potts knew that his clients were using Potts' services to perpetuate fraud in violation of Rules 1.2(d) and 3.3(a)(2) of the Montana Rules of Professional Conduct (MRPC), that Potts failed to fulfill his ethical obligation to inform the clients that he would not participate in the fraudulent conduct, a violation of Rule 1.2(d), MRPC, and that Potts violated the duty of candor to the tribunal in violation of Rule 3.3(a)(2), MRPC. The Commission recommended that Potts be publicly censured and suspended from the practice of law for 30 days. Potts appealed, raising issues of client confidentiality, asserting that his clients did not engage in fraud because the accounts passed to his client as a matter of law and thus could not have been included as part of the settlement basis, contending that he had no duty to correct opposing counsel's erroneous understanding of the settlement, and arguing that the Commission's proposed sanctions were inappropriate. The Supreme Court held that, by definition, Potts' clients were engaged in fraudulent conduct, that Potts assisted in the conduct by not disclosing the conduct to the court and to opposing counsel in violation of the duty of truthfulness and by drafting a stipulation stating that all disputes had been settled when he knew that the parties relied on a misrepresentation in drafting a settlement, and that Potts could have avoided the situation by withdrawing from representation. Potts' conduct resulted in considerable injury to the parties, requiring one District Court proceeding and two appeals to determine the meaning and scope of the stipulation. The Commission's findings were affirmed. However, the court reversed the suspension of Potts' practice in light of mitigating factors of Potts' history of compliance with the rules of professional conduct and his good character and reputation to this point and held that public censure sufficed to apprise Potts of the gravity of the misconduct. In re Potts, 2007 MT 81, 336 M 517, 158 P3d 418 (2007).

Rescission of Waiver of Interest Document on Grounds of Fraud: Kindsfather's son purchased some land from Kindsfather pursuant to a contract for deed. When the son was unable to make the payments, the son executed a document waiving the back interest that was owing and Kindsfather signed the document. Kindsfather subsequently died, and the son sought a declaratory ruling that the waiver of interest document was valid and that upon receipt of the unpaid balance of the contract, the bank would release the warranty deed held in escrow for the son. Kindsfather's personal representative opposed the judgment, and the District Court found the document to be invalid and ordered the son to make all payments due to the estate. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision to rescind the document because it was obtained by fraud. The Supreme Court examined each of the nine elements of actual fraud and determined that a prima facie case of actual fraud was established. In re Estate of Kindsfather, 2005 MT 51, 326 M 192, 108 P3d 487 (2005), following Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640 (1993).

Real Estate Sale — Acknowledgment of Offer as Acceptance of Offer — Elements of Fraud Fulfilled: When Frye, a real estate broker, brought May a written offer to purchase May's gas station, Frye asked that May initial the offer to show acknowledgment or receipt of the offer, and May initialed the line reading "Seller Signature". At some later time, the terms of a counteroffer were inserted above May's initials, and the counteroffer was accepted by the buyer without May's knowledge. May consummated the sale and then sued Frye. The Supreme Court held that the District Court improperly granted Frye's motion for summary judgment and held that May had shown sufficient evidence of fraud, including misrepresentation of a material fact, that being the meaning of May's initialing of the line marked "Seller Signature", to survive a motion for summary judgment. May v. ERA Landmark Real Estate of Bozeman, 2000 MT 299, 302 M 326, 15 P3d 1179, 57 St. Rep. 1256 (2000).

Nine Elements of Fraud Applied in Workers' Compensation Case: Taylor submitted workers' compensation claims for three injuries that he alleged occurred in February and November of 1990 and in April of 1991. State Fund paid benefits but later asserted that the claims were fraudulent and then denied benefits. Taylor filed a petition to have the benefits reinstated, and the Workers' Compensation Court found that two of claims were fraudulent. The Supreme Court held that there was substantial credible evidence to support the Workers' Compensation Court's holding that State Fund proved the nine elements of fraud on two of Taylor's three claims. Taylor v. St. Comp. Ins. Fund, 275 M 432, 913 P2d 1242, 53 St. Rep. 201 (1996).

Failure to Keep Promise to Pay Medical Bills if Injured Person Travels to Exam — No Fraud: The District Court properly granted the church summary judgment on issues of fraud and misrepresentation in an action arising after plaintiff fell and was injured on church property. Plaintiff claimed that the church agreed in writing to pay medical bills if plaintiff would travel to Salt Lake City for a medical exam. Plaintiff did so, and the church failed to pay. The promise to pay money in the future was not a representation, the first element of a prima facie case for fraud or misrepresentation. Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640, 50 St. Rep. 535 (1993).

Alleged Representations Regarding Conditions of Loan Agreement — Failure of Fraud Claim Due to Admissions of Party: Debtor claimed actual or constructive fraud based on bank president's alleged representations that the due date on a note would not be enforced and that the note would only become due if the bank deemed itself insecure or if the debtor violated the agreement. However, debtor's statements and admissions directly conflicted with the claimed representations, and in light of debtor's subsequent violation of the agreement, the claim of fraud failed. Citizens First Nat'l Bank of Wolf Point v. Moe Motor Co., 248 M 495, 813 P2d 400, 48 St. Rep. 528 (1991).

Attorneys' Alleged Failure to Advise on Contingent Fee Arrangement — No Fraud: Where attorneys representing Howerys in a condemnation action allegedly failed to advise Howerys that the written contingent fee contract included a proportionate amount of any interest awarded on the judgment, the District Court properly concluded that any such failure would be insufficient in law to support any of the claims made by the Howerys. Smith v. Howery, 227 M 284, 738 P2d 502, 44 St. Rep. 1085 (1987).

Action to Set Aside Quitclaim Deed — Failure to Prove Fraud: The plaintiff, son of a deceased rancher, received 24½% of the surface rights to his father's ranch in accordance with the terms of an estate plan established for the benefit of the plaintiff and his brothers, the defendants. Upon leaving the ranch, plaintiff executed one quitclaim deed to his mineral interest in 1977 and one quitclaim deed to his surface interest in 1968 in exchange for a promise that the defendants would hold him harmless on a promissory note. The District Court did not err (in a subsequent challenge by the plaintiff to the validity of the quitclaim deeds) in declaring both deeds to be valid and denying the plaintiff any interest in the ranch. The District Court properly found that the evidence does not support a finding of fraud. The plaintiff did not satisfy all nine parts of the test set out in Van Ettinger v. Pappin, 180 M 1, 588 P2d 988 (1978). The plaintiff did not have to rely on the advice given him, did not prove that the defendants knew their representations were anything but true, and did not show that those representations were false or anything but good business sense. Turley v. Turley, 199 M 265, 649 P2d 434, 39 St. Rep. 1336 (1982).

Nine Elements: Appellants must have the ability to make a prima facie showing of nine elements to support their claim of fraud: (1) a representation; (2) falsity of the representation; (3) materiality of the representation; (4) speaker's knowledge of the falsity of the representation or ignorance of its truth; (5) speaker's intent that it be relied on; (6) hearer's ignorance of the falsity of the representation; (7) hearer's reliance on the representation; (8) hearer's right to rely on the representation; and (9) consequent and proximate injury caused by reliance on the representation. Van Ettinger v. Pappin, 180 M 1, 588 P2d 988 (1978), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986), and Krone v. McCann, 197 M 380, 642 P2d 584, 39 St. Rep. 500 (1982). See also Wiberg v. 17 Bar, Inc., 241 M 490, 788 P2d 292, 47 St. Rep. 429 (1990), McNeil v. Currie, 253 M 9, 830 P2d 1241, 49 St. Rep. 312 (1992), Somersille v. Columbia Falls Aluminum Co., 255 M 101, 841 P2d 483, 49 St. Rep. 904 (1992), Barrett v. Holland & Hart, 256 M 101, 845 P2d 714, 49 St. Rep. 1156 (1992), (Barrett was followed in Hickingbotham v. Duncan, 271 M 525, 898 P2d 1215, 52 St. Rep. 574 (1995)), and 50 St. Rep. 63 (1993), Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993), NW. Truck & Trailer Sales, Inc. v. Dvorak, 269 M 150, 887 P2d 260, 51 St. Rep. 1530 (1994), Taylor v. St. Comp. Ins. Fund, 275 M 432, 913 P2d 1242, 53 St. Rep. 201 (1996), and In re Estate of Kindsfather, 2005 MT 51, 326 M 192, 108 P3d 487 (2005).

Fraud — Essential Elements: When buyers inspected property purchased and during trial for damages for fraud never stated they would not have entered a purchase agreement had they known falsity of buyer's alleged misrepresentation, they cannot maintain an action based on such alleged misrepresentation. Schulz v. Peake, 178 M 261, 583 P2d 425 (1978).

Prima Facie Case: A party asserting fraud in the execution of a contract (mortgage), to make out a prima facie case, must show a false representation, its materiality, the speaker's knowledge of its falsity or his ignorance of the truth, his intent that it should be acted upon by the party claiming to have been defrauded, the latter's ignorance of its falsity, his reliance on its truth, his right to rely thereon, and his consequent and proximate injury. Morigeau v. Lozar, 81 M 434, 263 P 985 (1928).

Actual Fraud in Contract: The elements of actual fraud in a contract of sale are: a false representation, its materiality, the seller's knowledge of its falsity or ignorance of its truth, his intent that it should be acted upon by the buyer, the latter's ignorance of its falsity, reliance upon its truth, and his consequent and proximate injury; and where the injured party had made out a prima facie case embracing such elements, it is error to direct a verdict for his opponent, the question whether or not there has been fraud generally being a question of fact for the jury. Healy v. Ginoff, 69 M 116, 220 P 539 (1923), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986), followed in H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000

MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95, 57 St. Rep. 832 (2000). See also Dewey v. Stringer, 2014 MT 136, 375 Mont. 176, 325 P.3d 1236.

Jury Submission — What Needed: To make out a prima facie case of fraud sufficient to go to the jury, the plaintiff must show a false representation by defendant, its materiality, defendant's knowledge of its falsity or ignorance of its truth, his intent that it should be acted upon by plaintiff in the manner reasonably contemplated, his reliance upon its truth, his right to rely thereon, and his consequent and proximate injury. Lee v. Stockmen's Nat'l Bank, 63 M 262, 207 P 623 (1922).

Belief and Action Required: In order to recover under a contract allegedly entered under fraud, plaintiff must show with reasonable certainty: (1) that the defendant made a representation or statement intending that the plaintiff act upon it; (2) that the representation was false; (3) that the plaintiff believed the statement; and (4) that he acted upon it. Power & Bro., Ltd. v. Turner, 37 M 521, 97 P 950 (1908).

PLEADINGS AND PROOF

Legal Malpractice — Nexus Between Fraudulent Concealment and Discovery Rule: In the context of legal malpractice, a nexus exists between a defendant's fraudulent concealment and the question of whether a plaintiff should have discovered the defendant's negligent act. Estate of Watkins v. Hedman, Hileman & Lacosta, 2004 MT 143, 321 M 419, 91 P3d 1264 (2004). See also Watkins Trust v. Lacosta, 2004 MT 144, 321 M 432, 92 P3d 620 (2004).

Sale of Home by Realtors — Negligent Misrepresentation, Actual and Constructive Fraud, and Real Estate Licensing and Consumer Protection Laws — Expert Witnesses Unnecessary to Prove Standard of Care: Durbins purchased a home through the seller's realtors. Contrary to the representations of the realtors, Durbins discovered that the property had no legal septic system, that the household water was unsafe to use for any purpose, and that the access road was located on the neighbor's property. Durbins brought an action against the realtors, alleging negligent misrepresentation, actual and constructive fraud, and statutory violations involving the Montana real estate licensing laws and the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973. The defendants sought and achieved dismissal of the case on the grounds that Durbins failed to prove through expert testimony the applicable standard of care of the realtors. The Supreme Court held that because Durbins did not allege professional misrepresentation, the issues of whether the realtors negligently misrepresented the facts, were guilty of actual or constructive fraud, or were guilty of the statutory violations alleged by Durbins, were questions resolvable by common knowledge. The questions did not turn on a standard peculiarly within the knowledge of an expert witness, and scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge was not necessary to assist the jury. The Supreme Court therefore held that Durbins were not required to provide expert standard of care testimony to establish any of the violations. Durbin v. Ross, 276 M 463, 916 P2d 758, 53 St. Rep. 471 (1996).

Fraud — Refusal to Instruct on Actual Fraud Affirmed: The Supreme Court ruled that an instruction on actual fraud was warranted only if the requesting party raised a question of fact by presenting some evidence on each of the nine elements of actual fraud. The District Court did not err in refusing to instruct the jury on actual fraud when the defendant failed to introduce evidence that the bank made a knowingly false representation and intended the defendant to rely on it to his detriment. First Bank-Billings v. Clark, 236 M 195, 771 P2d 84, 46 St. Rep. 291 (1989).

Corporate Fraud Not Shown With Particularity: Claim of plaintiff who asserted fraud in sale of his interest in a corporation was summarily dismissed upon his failure to produce documentation showing any misrepresentation or to allege fraud with particularity. Pipinich v. Battershell, 232 M 507, 759 P2d 148, 45 St. Rep. 1237 (1988).

No Material Fact to Support Fraud Claims: Plaintiff brought action for fraud, both actual and constructive, as well as undue influence, arising out of a promise by his mother to compensate plaintiff, upon sale of the family corporation's assets, for a portion of value attributable to plaintiff's stock and partnership interest conveyed to corporation for cancellation of promissory note executed by plaintiff for a loan from the corporation. The respondent mother was granted summary judgment. The Supreme Court held that plaintiff failed to establish a fraud claim because of admissions that his mother did not intend to deceive him and that he never relied on his mother's promise to compensate. His claims were also barred by the Statute of Limitations. Fleming v. Fleming Farms, Inc., 221 M 237, 717 P2d 1103, 43 St. Rep. 776 (1986).

Issue of Fact as to Whether Promissory Note Procured by Fraud: In 1978, plaintiff had leased a number of mink to defendants in return for payment by defendants of a portion of the annual kit crop. At the time of the lease, plaintiff strongly suspected that a small percentage of the mink were infected with Aleutian Disease (AD), a disease impairing mink productivity and resistance to other diseases. In December 1980, after 2 years of greater than normal losses among the leased mink, the parties replaced the lease with a promissory note containing a clause releasing plaintiff from any liability arising out of the lease. After the promissory note had been made, plaintiff informed defendants that tests of his mink in November 1980 indicated that 30% were infected with AD. Subsequent testing of defendants' mink revealed that 70% had AD. Defendants made no payments on the note. In a suit on the note, defendants counterclaimed, alleging that the note had been procured by fraud. The District Court granted plaintiff's motion for summary judgment. The Supreme Court reversed, ruling that defendants' affidavit indicated an issue of material fact, i.e., whether defendants learned that the mink had AD before or after the note was signed, and that the plaintiff had not met the burden of establishing that there was no issue of material fact. Rogers v. Swingley, 206 M 306, 670 P2d 1386, 40 St. Rep. 1676 (1983).

Sufficiency of Pleadings and Proof: The defendant sold real estate to plaintiff on a contract for deed, and the District Court reformed the contract, finding fraud by defendant in orally misrepresenting that there were three good wells on the property, that ownership of a cabin on the property would transfer with the property, and that he would survey or provide papers concerning the boundary of the property. The Supreme Court reversed, finding no basis for fraud in that: (1) the water in the wells had never been tested and proven unfit for use, and the lack of pumps on two wells was obvious from visual inspection at the time the contract was entered; (2) plaintiff had, on a verified complaint, in fact acknowledged defendant's continuing ownership of the cabin, contrary to her testimony and the District Court's finding; and (3) plaintiff never alleged that a survey was to be performed, contrary to the District Court's finding, and plaintiff could have easily ascertained the boundaries by looking at an existing survey and talking with a neighbor. Krone v. McCann, 197 M 380, 642 P2d 584, 39 St. Rep. 500 (1982). See also Fossen v. Fossen, 2013 MT 299, 372 Mont. 175, 311 P.3d 743.

Actual Fraud in Execution of Contract for Deed — Compliance With Pollution Laws — Doctrine of "Implied Findings": Where the plaintiffs sued for damages caused by the defendants' fraud in the execution of a contract for deed for the sale of a shale and concrete block plant, alleging misrepresentation by the defendant company and its agents as to the plant's status of compliance with air pollution laws, the court did not err in finding the defendants guilty of actual fraud. Actual fraud is always a question of fact, and there was ample evidence upon which the court could find that the factual requisites for actual fraud had been satisfied. Although the court did not make a specific finding that the plaintiff relied upon the false representations by the defendants, the Supreme Court will engage the doctrine of "implied findings" so long as those findings are not inconsistent with express findings and assume that the court found reliance upon the defendants' misrepresentations. Poulsen v. Treasure St. Indus., Inc., 192 M 69, 626 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 218 (1981), followed in H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95, 57 St. Rep. 832 (2000).

Parol Evidence to Show Fraud or Resolve Ambiguity: Parol evidence is admissible to resolve ambiguities and to determine whether the buyers were fraudulently induced into entering a written contract where seller made express warranties that application for SID had been made when he knew that an application had not been made. Dodds v. Gibson Prod. Co., 181 M 373, 593 P2d 1022 (1979).

Fraud — Summary Judgment Not Proper: Conflicting contentions regarding a brochure allegedly misrepresenting land indicate issues of fact precluding summary judgment. Bails v. Wheeler, 171 M 524, 559 P2d 1180 (1977).

Tort Liability: The making of representations to induce a contract imposes on the person making them a duty to act in good faith, and if the representations are fraudulent, the party to whom they were made has an action in tort for fraud and deceit independent of the contract, which he may choose to affirm though he need not. State ex rel. Dimler v. District Court, 170 M 77, 550 P2d 917 (1976).

Fraud as a Question of Fact: Actual fraud is always a question of fact and is never to be presumed, so that plaintiffs must prove by a preponderance of the evidence that a promise was made, that the promisor had no intention of performing it, that the plaintiff relied on the promise, and that he was proximately injured. Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965), distinguished in Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993), in which it was held that the correct standard for reformation of a contract is clear, convincing, and satisfactory proof.

Sufficiency of Pleadings and Proof: The bare statement in the complaint of landowner of fraudulent representations (which were not of existing facts but no more than promises) was insufficient to allege fraud in procuring mineral lease; failure to allege that defendants had no intention of performing their promises rendered the pleading ineffectual. Hodgkiss v. Northland Petroleum Consol., 104 M 328, 67 P2d 811 (1937).

Averments: An alleged fraudulent representation by vendor that a lot was worth in excess of and would readily sell for more than a given amount was insufficient to charge fraud in the absence of the further averments that he did not believe the statement to be true or knew it to be false or was not warranted by the information he then had and of a showing of facts that the complaining purchaser had a right to rely upon the representation, and in the absence of the further averment that the lot was not worth what the vendor said it was. Howe v. Messimer, 84 M 304, 275 P 281 (1929).

Burden of Proof: In an action for damages for fraud, brought under subsection (4) of this section, where the complaint charged that defendant induced plaintiff to buy corporate stock under the promise, made without any intention of keeping it, that if the stock was not worth a certain sum within 6 years, he would return to him the purchase price, plaintiff had the burden of proving, among other things, that defendant made the promise and that when he made it, he had no intention of performing it, under the rule that a party plaintiff must prove every material allegation of his complaint. Cuckovich v. Buckovich, 82 M 1, 264 P 930 (1928).

No Presumption of Fraud: Fraud can never be presumed but must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence. Good faith will always be presumed, and mere suspicion of fraud is not sufficient. Cuckovich v. Buckovich, 82 M 1, 264 P 930 (1928), followed in Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965), Cowan v. Westland Realty Co., 162 M 379, 512 P2d 714 (1973), Krone v. McCann, 197 M 380, 642 P2d 584, 39 St. Rep. 500 (1982).

Statements as Inducing Case: One who relies on fraudulent representations to defeat an action on a promissory note given for the purchase of chattels has the burden of proving that the statements were the inducing cause for signing the note; that they were material and false; that the speaker had knowledge of their falsity or was ignorant of their truth and intended that they should be accepted and acted upon; that the defendant was ignorant of their falsity and rightfully relied upon their truth, not having equal means of knowing the truth or opportunity to examine the property, and that his damage proximately resulted from the representations. Advance-Rumely Thresher Co., Inc. v. Wenholz, 80 M 82, 258 P 1085 (1927).

Proof of Value: Proof of inadequacy of value of land as security for indebtedness against it is not alone sufficient to prove fraud, either actual or constructive. Duffy v. Hastings, 78 M 22, 252 P 316 (1926).

Pleading Intent: Where defendant, in an action to recover the purchase price of personal property, in his answer pleaded that the representation of plaintiff that he had title to the property was false but did not allege that plaintiff knew it to be false, that it was made in a manner not warranted by the information possessed by the seller, that it was made with intent to deceive, that the buyer believed it to be true or relied upon it, and that he was deceived by it and misled to his prejudice, the pleading was insufficient to warrant rescission of the contract on the ground of fraud. Courtney v. Gordon, 74 M 408, 241 P 233 (1925).

Charging Fraud: Allegations in an action to rescind a contract for the sale of city lots on the ground of fraud perpetrated by the vendor in procuring the scrivener to insert in the deed numbers of inside lots instead of corner lots intended to be bought was sufficient to charge actual fraud. Campana v. Dobry, 69 M 240, 221 P 540 (1923).

Burden of Person Alleging: In an action based on fraud, the question whether actual fraud has been practiced is one of fact and the burden of proof is upon him who alleges it. Lee v. Stockmen's Nat'l Bank, 63 M 262, 207 P 623 (1922).

Fraud as an Answer: Where, in a suit to foreclose a purchase-money mortgage, the answer sets up fraud by the plaintiff in inducing the defendant to enter into the transaction and avers, in describing the fraud, particulars coming within the statutory definition of fraud, it is error for the court to strike such averments from the answer. Como Orchard Land Co. v. Markham, 54 M 438, 171 P 274 (1918).

Evidence to Support: In an action for damages for fraud charged by plaintiff to have been practiced upon him in the sale of land, the plaintiff made out his case where the evidence showed that the defendant, acting in collusion with a civil engineer who had been employed by plaintiff to survey the land, falsely represented to him that the tract contained a much larger acreage suitable for fruit growing than was actually embraced in it. Shoudy v. Reeser, 48 M 579, 142 P 205 (1914).

DEFENSES

Blank Security Agreement Signed by Borrower and Filled Out by Bank: Borrower signed a blank security agreement that bank then filled out and mailed to her. The record shows that she had the agreement in her possession in December 1985; thus, she had the means to discover the fraud that she alleged bank committed in setting the agreement's terms. Because she did not file a claim until December 1988, her claim was barred by the 2-year statute of limitations. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

Misrepresentation Not Relied Upon — No Fraud: A cause of action for fraud fails when the alleged misrepresentation is not relied upon. Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990).

Failure to Inspect — No Defense: When a contract is induced by false representations as to material existent facts which are made with the intent to deceive and upon which the plaintiff relied, it is no defense to the action for rescission or for damages arising out of the deceit that the party to whom the representations were made might have, with due diligence, discovered their falsity and that he made no searching inquiry into facts. Opportunity to inspect in itself is no defense to possible willful misrepresentations that because of their plausibility preclude further investigation. Wortman v. Griff, 200 M 528, 651 P2d 998, 39 St. Rep. 1916 (1982).

Waiver of Fraud: One who discovers that fraud has been practiced on him while the transaction remains wholly executory but nevertheless either executes or performs it on his part or requires performance on the part of the other party thereby waives the fraud and cannot subsequently maintain an action for damages. Van Ettinger v. Pappin, 180 M 1, 588 P2d 988 (1978).

Concealment of Physical Condition: Where the lessee of a hotel building inspected the premises and the inspection revealed or would have revealed the true physical condition of the premises, she would have no right to rely upon any concealment by the lessors with respect to the physical condition of the premises. Lowe v. Root, 166 M 150, 531 P2d 674 (1975).

Laches: Where one claiming to have been defrauded, with full knowledge of the facts relating to the transaction, waits for 5 years before making complaint and until the time when he is called upon to meet the obligation incurred, he will be held to have ratified it even though in the first instance he was induced to execute the instrument in question by his creditor's fraudulent representations. Morigeau v. Lozar, 81 M 434, 263 P 985 (1928). See also Lasby v. Burgess, 88 M 49, 289 P 1028 (1930).

Defense of Caveat Emptor (Buyer Beware): Where a party who claims to have been deceived to his prejudice by false representations had the means at hand to ascertain whether the statements made were true or not but failed to do so, his reliance upon the representations, however false, affords him no ground of complaint. Helena Adjustment Co. v. Claflin, 75 M 317, 243 P 1063 (1926), distinguished in Griffiths v. Trasher, 95 M 210, 26 P2d 995 (1933).

Laches — Evidence: One charged with fraud in causing numbers of inside city lots to be inserted in the deed, whereas the purchaser intended to buy and the vendor agreed to sell corner lots, will not be heard to defend on the ground of laches because of plaintiff's failure to consult the abstract of title for some 2 years, where the evidence showed that immediately after discovering the fraud defendant assured plaintiff that she would "fix it". Campana v. Dobry, 69 M 240, 221 P 540 (1923).

Examination of Title: Where a purchaser of land caused an examination of the title thereto to be made and could have ascertained an alleged defect in it, his reliance upon false representations made with relation thereto by the vendor's attorney was not a defense to an action to foreclose a mortgage for failure to pay balance of the purchase price. Morehouse v. N. Land Co., 68 M 96, 216 P 792 (1923).

Exercise of Care: A judgment of nonsuit was properly entered in an action against a bank for damages claimed to have been suffered by plaintiff in reliance upon alleged fraudulent representations made to him by its cashier that mortgages held by it on automobiles handled by a dealer were in full force, had not been paid, etc. In fact the bank had authorized the mortgagor to sell, and he had sold them, paying the proceeds into the bank. On the strength of the cashier's statements plaintiff had bought the mortgages. It appeared from plaintiff's evidence that he was a director of the bank and a member of its discount committee, with knowledge of the course of business pursued between the bank and the mortgagor with relation to the automobiles. He had himself endorsed the mortgagor's notes secured by mortgaged cars which were sold by the latter notwithstanding the mortgage, etc., it appearing therefrom that any damage he suffered was not traceable to the alleged false representations but to his failure to exercise the care imposed by the rule of caveat emptor. Lee v. Stockmen's Nat'l Bank, 63 M 262, 207 P 623 (1922).

Investigation Precludes Reliance: Where it appears in an action for fraud that plaintiff had investigated or had the means at hand to investigate the truth of an alleged false representation, his reliance upon it affords no ground for complaint. Lee v. Stockmen's Nat'l Bank, 63 M 262, 207 P 623 (1922).

FALSE REPRESENTATIONS

Failure to Attempt to Verify Alleged False Representation — No Right to Rely on That Representation: When the plaintiff deliberately avoided finding out whether the representations made by the defendant regarding the assumption of certain business liabilities were true, the plaintiff could not then claim she relied on those representations to her detriment. Fossen v. Fossen, 2013 MT 299, 372 Mont. 175, 311 P.3d 743.

Misrepresentation of Substituted Seed — Remand for Determination of Damages Beyond Subsequent Crop Loss and for Consideration of Actual Fraud: Plaintiff delivered a load of wheat seed to defendant's facility for cleaning and treating. Defendant inadvertently dumped the load into a waste bin, replaced the seed with a similar but different variety, and charged plaintiff for cleaning and treatment without informing plaintiff of the error. When the crop came up, plaintiff noticed that the seed was a different variety, sued defendant for negligent misrepresentation, and sought compensatory and punitive damages. The District Court held that defendant did not commit actual fraud, but misconstrued the differing definitions of actual fraud in Title 27 and this title in determining that no punitive damages were allowed. The Supreme Court remanded for reconsideration of the punitive damage claim based on actual fraud as defined in 27-1-221. Additionally, the District Court failed to address plaintiff's claim for damages beyond the actual crop loss suffered because of the substituted seed, and that issue was also remanded for further consideration. However, the District Court did not err in refusing to award damages for plaintiff's lost crop insurance payments, in its findings regarding the per acre loss and value per bushel of lost production, by qualifying plaintiff's expert witness, or by awarding prejudgment interest. Hallenberg v. Gen. Mills Operations, Inc., 2006 MT 191, 333 M 143, 141 P3d 1216 (2006).

No Actual Malice Shown in Replacement of Seed With Different Variety: Plaintiff delivered a load of wheat seed to defendant's facility for cleaning and treating. Defendant inadvertently dumped the load into a waste bin, replaced the seed with a similar but different variety, and charged plaintiff for cleaning and treatment without informing plaintiff of the error. When the crop came up, plaintiff noticed that the seed was a different variety, sued defendant for negligent misrepresentation, and sought compensatory and punitive damages. The District Court found no actual malice on defendant's part and declined to award punitive damages. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Substantial credible evidence showed that defendant's personnel assumed that plaintiff was planting a variety that was commonly used in the area and substituted that common variety, assuming that no injury would result in the misrepresentation that the seed plaintiff was going to plant was the same seed plaintiff delivered. Defendant neither had knowledge of facts nor intentionally disregarded facts that created a high probability of injury to plaintiff, so the definition of actual malice was not met and the District Court correctly declined to award punitive damages without a finding of actual malice. Hallenberg v. Gen. Mills Operations, Inc., 2006 MT 191, 333 M 143, 141 P3d 1216 (2006).

Unjustified Construction Lien Not Constituting Fraud in Sale of Real Property — Knowledge of Seller Held Determinative: Hickingbothams agreed to purchase a part of tract 1-A (1-A-1) from Duncan. Later, Hickingbothams also negotiated for and purchased an additional adjoining tract (portion A of 1-A) from Duncan. At the same time, Duncan was constructing a house on a separate part of tract 1-A. Because of a dispute with the contractor over the value of work performed by the contractor, the contractor placed a construction lien against all of parcel 1-A, including that part owned by Hickingbothams. Hickingbothams sued Duncan, alleging that Duncan committed fraud by executing the receipt and agreement to sell and purchase portion A while knowing that a construction lien had been placed against the property. The Supreme Court held that despite Duncan's knowledge of the ongoing dispute with the contractor, the construction lien had not yet been placed against the property, including portion A of 1-A. The Supreme Court held that Duncan should not be charged with knowing that an unwarranted construction lien would be placed against the property and that therefore any representations by Duncan as to marketability of the property were not false representations. Hickingbotham v. Duncan, 271 M 525, 898 P2d 1215, 52 St. Rep. 574 (1995).

Knowledge of Seller's Lack of Clear Title: The defendant had represented that the seller had good title at the time the contract was entered into, when in fact the seller had no interest in the property. The defendant argued that her actions did not constitute fraud because there was no obligation to produce title to the property until the entire contract was paid. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's finding that fraud existed because the statements were false at the time they were made. Lee v. Armstrong, 244 M 289, 798 P2d 84, 47 St. Rep. 1421 (1990).

Truth Regarding Representations Apparent Prior to Signing Contract — Fraud Not Proven: Ranch purchasers claimed that seller made several misrepresentations, which they relied on to their detriment regarding the property. The District Court properly found no fraud based on false representations after noting the purchasers: (1) were experienced ranchers familiar with farming procedures; (2) repeatedly inspected the property prior to signing any agreement; (3) seeded all the spring crops for the growing season prior to signing the purchase contract; (4) seeded, harvested, marketed, and appropriated for their own use two consecutive crops, making no complaints; (5) never complained of any misrepresentations until filing suit; and (6) as to each alleged misrepresentation, learned the true condition of the property before signing the purchase contract and therefore did not rely on the truth of the asserted false statements. Schweigert v. Fowler, 240 M 424, 784 P2d 405, 47 St. Rep. 1 (1990).

Summary Judgment Appropriate When Plaintiff Fails to Make Factual Showing That Any of Defendant's Representations Were False: The plaintiff bought a motorcycle distributorship from the defendant. The plaintiff changed the business's name, location, and product line and fired most of the former employees. The business ceased making a profit, and the plaintiff sued the defendant for fraud and negligent misrepresentation. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's dismissal of the claim, agreeing that summary judgment was proper because the plaintiff had failed to make a factual showing that any of the material representations were false. Batten v. Watts Cycle & Marine, Inc., 240 M 113, 783 P2d 378, 46 St. Rep. 1984 (1989), followed in Barrett v. Holland & Hart, 256 M 101, 845 P2d 714, 49 St. Rep. 1156 (1992), and 50 St. Rep. 63 (1993).

Fraud by Misrepresentation of Business Profits: Fraud was properly found where evidence showed that seller of a business, an experienced businessman, gave to potential buyers documents that made false and materially misleading statements of business income, upon which buyers relied in purchasing the business. Selvidge v. McBeen, 230 M 237, 750 P2d 429, 45 St. Rep. 168 (1988).

No Fraud in Representation of Debt: Debtor alleged that he signed a release in favor of the bank in total ignorance of his liabilities and defended his ignorance on the grounds that the bank misrepresented his debt to it. However, the record disclosed that the language of the release agreement, debtor's participation in a conference call in which reaffirmation of a loan was discussed, notice to debtor's attorney regarding the nature of indebtedness, and financial statements estimating debtor's liabilities all indicated debtor's knowledge of his debt load. There was no material question of fraudulent misrepresentation, and summary judgment was proper. Sprunk v. First Bank W. Mont. Missoula, 228 M 168, 741 P2d 766, 44 St. Rep. 1429 (1987), affirmed on separate grounds in Sprunk v. First Bank Sys., 252 M 463, 830 P2d 103, 49 St. Rep. 369 (1992), and followed in Stanley v. Holms, 1999 MT 41, 293 M 343, 975 P2d 1242, 56 St. Rep. 178 (1999).

False Representations — Ability to Construct Hog Barns — Findings Not Clearly Erroneous: There was testimony showing defendant knowingly made material false representations that he could construct water-flush hog barns—promises that he could not keep. Plaintiff had a right to rely on defendant and was injured because of that reliance. Although there were conflicting findings, the Supreme Court found no clear error constituting abuse of discretion. Roberts v. Mission Valley Concrete Indus., Inc., 222 M 268, 721 P2d 355, 43 St. Rep. 1254 (1986).

False Representation as Actual Fraud — No Directed Verdict: Defendants contended that plaintiffs' evidence was insufficient to establish a false representation or justifiable reliance on the representation and that therefore defendants' motions for a directed verdict were improperly denied. The Supreme Court noted that a prospectus given to plaintiff, McGregor, contained financial statements which would be misleading to someone not knowledgeable in accounting and that a jury could find that false representations were made on this evidence. The court found that McGregor adequately investigated the business and reasonably relied on defendants' representations. The Supreme Court found no error in the District Court's failure to direct a verdict for defendants on the claim of actual fraud. McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Owner's Valuation of Business — Factual Representations: Statements as to value of property are generally considered declarations of opinion and are not a basis for rescission of a contract. Such statements are opinions when the parties stand on an equal footing and have equal means of knowledge, with no relation of trust or confidence existing between them. Bar owner who was a businessman and had personal knowledge of the bar's financial condition did not stand on an equal footing with baker who frequented the bar and whom bar owner persuaded to invest $25,000 in the business. There was substantial credible evidence to support trial court's finding in action for fraud that bar owner made factual representations of value to baker when bar owner stated that the business was worth $250,000 and allocated stated values to the liquor license, inventory, equipment, and good will. Spence v. Yocum, 201 M 79, 651 P2d 1022, 39 St. Rep. 1966 (1982), followed in Barrett v. Holland & Hart, 256 M 101, 845 P2d 714, 49 St. Rep. 1156 (1992), and 50 St. Rep. 63 (1993).

Fraud — Summary Judgment Not Proper: In course of inspection of hotel prior to purchasing it, buyer asked seller's agent why there was water on the floor of the boiler room. The agent allegedly replied that the cause was a minor problem with the boiler system that could be easily repaired. Shortly after the sale, the buyer paid a substantial amount of money to repair the boiler system. After buyer did not keep up with payments due on his promissory note, seller sued. The buyer defended by alleging that the seller had fraudulently misrepresented the condition of the hotel's heating system. The District Court gave summary judgment for the seller. The Supreme Court reversed, ruling that summary judgment was not proper because the question of whether or not there was fraud in the sales transaction was an issue material to the case upon which buyer should have been permitted to present evidence. Jenkins v. Hillard, 199 M 1, 647 P2d 354, 39 St. Rep. 1156 (1982).

Negligent Misrepresentation by a Stockbroker: A stockbroker testified that what he told a customer regarding the risk of a transaction he believed to be true. The customer testified that he did not believe he had been deliberately misinformed by the broker. However, one who in the course of a transaction in which he has a pecuniary interest supplies information for the guidance of others in their transactions must exercise reasonable competence in obtaining or communicating the information. Negligent as well as intentional misrepresentation can be the basis of a tort action in fraud. Brown v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 197 M 1, 640 P2d 453, 39 St. Rep. 305 (1982), followed in Wagner v. Cutler, 232 M 332, 757 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1092 (1988).

False Representations — Right to Rescind: The sellers of a business falsely represented the profitability of the business and its standing with suppliers and wholesalers to prospective buyers. The buyers relied on and had a right to rely on the truth of the representations and were induced to purchase the business because of the false representations. Upon learning of the falsity of the representations that had induced them to purchase the business, the purchasers had the right to rescind the contract for deed for the purchase of the business. Lumby v. Doetch, 183 M 427, 600 P2d 200 (1979).

Reliance on Alleged Representations After Independent Investigation: When it appears that a party who claims to have been deceived to his prejudice has investigated for himself or that the means were at hand to ascertain the truth of any representations made to him, his reliance on such representations made to him, however false they may have been, affords no ground of complaint. Van Ettinger v. Pappin, 180 M 1, 588 P2d 988 (1978), cited in Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. McElvain, 221 M 138, 717 P2d 1081, 43 St. Rep. 697 (1986). See also Fossen v. Fossen, 2013 MT 299, 372 Mont. 175, 311 P.3d 743.

Material Misrepresentations: Inaccurate statement by defendant's agent in mineral deed negotiations that nearest oil fields were 20 miles away did not constitute fraud under this section in the absence of fraudulent intent and where the misstatement arose from an honest misunderstanding between defendant and agent. Clough v. Jackson, 156 M 272, 479 P2d 266 (1971).

Puffing: Broker's statement that laundromat grossed $3,000 a month, was worth $37,000, and "looks like a real good deal" did not establish material misrepresentations constituting fraud and entitling purchaser to rescind sale contract in view of evidence that, although open less than 30 days a month, business did gross $100 a day and that seller had paid $30,000 for business and added $4,000 of improvements; in the absence of corroboration, buyer's claim that broker also told him business netted $1,000 a month was not basis for rescission. Young v. Handrow, 151 M 310, 443 P2d 9 (1968).

Representations in Stock Sale: False representation that an investment company would be ready for business within 2 months, made to induce the sale of stock, was a fraud. Buhler v. Loftus, 53 M 546, 165 P 601 (1917).

Deception: An owner of land is supposed to know its boundaries, and his vendee has a right to rely upon his representations as to them; such representations are regarded as those of fact, and, if false, the effect of them is to deceive the intending purchaser. Post v. Liberty, 45 M 1, 121 P 475 (1912).

PROMISES

Inducement to Purchase Property Based on Promise of Road Improvements — Directed Verdict Improper: Plaintiffs claimed they were fraudulently induced to enter contracts to purchase land when seller orally promised to improve access roads to county grade. The District Court granted defendants a directed verdict, relying on Kelly v. Ellis, 39 M 597, 104 P 873 (1909), in holding that when there was no allegation of failure to keep all promises made in the written agreement, the statute of frauds precluded admission of evidence of an oral promise directly related to the contents of the contract. However, plaintiffs relied on a certificate of survey that showed county grade easements, a letter from defendants' attorney agreeing to hold a title insurance company harmless from any claims arising from purchasers' access problems, and the representation by a realtor that roads would be upgraded to county road standards. These representations constituted a conflict in evidence precluding directed verdict, and the District Court erred in taking from the jury the issue of whether plaintiffs were fraudulently induced to enter the contracts. Dew v. Dower, 237 M 476, 774 P2d 989, 46 St. Rep. 981 (1989), following Majers v. Shining Mtn., 230 M 373, 750 P2d 449, 45 St. Rep. 283 (1988), Majers v. Shining Mtn., 219 M 366, 711 P2d 1375, 43 St. Rep. 16 (1986), Dodds v. Gibson Prod. Co., 181 M 373, 593 P2d 1022 (1979), and Goggans v. Winkley, 154 M 451, 465 P2d 326 (1970). Following a trial subsequent to Dew, infra., the District Court determined that defendant did fraudulently induce plaintiffs to purchase property by misrepresenting the quality of the road that she intended to build as access to the property and further awarded monetary damages to each plaintiff. On appeal, defendant contended, among other things, that the trial court erred in admitting, without first requiring plaintiffs to prove intent to defraud, parol evidence that defendant orally promised to improve the road and also erred in determining that defendant intended to defraud plaintiffs by inducing them to enter into contracts for deed. However, defendant waived the right to appeal the parol evidence question by failing to object at trial, and substantial evidence that defendant had no intention to perform the promises to improve the road was sufficient to prove defendant's intent to defraud. Dew v. Dower, 258 M 114, 852 P2d 549, 50 St. Rep. 454 (1993).

Failure to Keep Promise: Allegation that executive vice-president of bank promised to find purchaser for defendant's corporation did not support claim of fraud under this section since mere making of promise which promisor fails to keep is not actionable fraud. Gallatin Trust & Sav. Bank v. Henke, 154 M 170, 461 P2d 448 (1969).

Promise Made Without the Intent to Perform: Where an oral contract was made between two real estate brokers to divide a commission, the mere fact that a promise was not carried out is not proof that such promise was made with no intention to perform; fraud in failing to perform was not proved when there was a possibility the sale would not go through. Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965).

Indefinite Promise: Where plaintiff invested funds in mining operations of defendant, defendant's indefinite promise that "they were going to form a corporation as soon as possible" without setting any time or date for doing so was insufficient to establish fraud where corporation was not formed 4 months later. Marlin v. Drury, 124 M 576, 228 P2d 803 (1951).

Intention — Proof Required: One charging fraud by reason of making a promise without any intention of performing it must prove that the maker of it had no such intention when he made it, the mere showing that it was not performed being insufficient to prove fraud. Howe v. Messimer, 84 M 304, 275 P 281 (1929).

Change of Mind: When a promise was made in good faith at the time when made, there is no fraud, though the promisor subsequently changes his mind and fails to perform. Cuckovich v. Buckovich, 82 M 1, 264 P 930 (1928).

Good Faith Presumed: The law presumes good faith and that at the time one charged with making a fraudulent promise made it, he intended to perform it. It never presumes fraud, but the burden of proving fraud is on the party alleging it. Cuckovich v. Buckovich, 82 M 1, 264 P 930 (1928).

Intention: The mere making of a promise which the promisor fails to keep does not constitute actionable fraud, intention not to keep it when it was made being necessary to constitute the promisor's action fraudulent under this section. Int'l Harvester Co. v. Merry, 60 M 498, 199 P 704 (1921).

Inducement by Promise: Where a married man by a promise made to his dangerously sick wife to devise both his own and her property to their daughter and son induces her to convey her property to him instead of to the daughter as she proposes, he intending at the time either to repudiate the promise afterward or to do as he pleases with the property after once getting it into his hands, there is actual fraud in his act from its inception. Huffine v. Lincoln, 52 M 585, 160 P 820 (1916).

DAMAGES

Damages — Purchase of Farmlands: The measure of damages for fraud in inducing the purchase of farmlands is the difference between their actual value at the date of sale and the contract price. Healy v. Ginoff, 69 M 116, 220 P 539 (1923).

Crop Loss: Where a purchaser of land was aware, after the first year of his occupancy, that the representations by the seller as to the amount of water available for irrigation by reason of which he lost the first year's crop were false, his recovery of damages was limited to the amount represented by the loss of that crop, and he could not claim damages based upon four successive failures thereafter, he having planted the crops with knowledge that water could not be obtained for irrigation. Healy v. Ginoff, 69 M 116, 220 P 539 (1923).

Boundaries of Land: The representations made by a landowner to an intended purchaser as to the boundaries of his property were, in effect, warranties, the owner being presumed to know its location. Where, after the consummation of a sale, the statements of the vendor in this regard proved false, the result was a fraud within the meaning of this section, whether made in good or bad faith, and the vendee had the right to rescind or sue for damages. Post v. Liberty, 45 M 1, 121 P 475 (1912).

MISCELLANEOUS

Material Misrepresentation on Application for Credit Life and Disability Insurance — Denial of Coverage Warranted: Schlemmer applied to the North Central Life Insurance Company (North Central) for credit life and disability insurance but misrepresented his health history. If he had answered correctly on the application, he would have been ineligible for the insurance. Nevertheless, he averred by his signature that he understood the form and that his application statements were true, so the policy was issued. Schlemmer later filed a claim for disability payments. North Central investigated, found that Schlemmer had been treated within the previous 2 years for hypertension, chronic obstructive lung disease, and disease or disorder of the kidneys, contrary to his statements in the application, and denied the claim and refunded Schlemmer's premiums. Schlemmer sued for damages, claiming that the application and underwriting procedures used by North Central violated 33-18-201, commonly known as the unfair claims settlement practices law, breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and constituted fraud. Schlemmer also maintained that the District Court erred in failing to rule on whether North Central's agent had knowledge of Schlemmer's condition, which might have created a question of material fact. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's rulings that: (1) Schlemmer's claim of ignorance of the contents of the written application could not prevail because the application language was clear and unambiguous and Schlemmer did not deny signing it; (2) Schlemmer materially misrepresented his health on the application; (3) the material misrepresentation was legally sufficient to allow North Central to deny coverage under the policy; and (4) Schlemmer's argument that North Central's agent knew or should have known about Schlemmer's health was mere speculation insufficient to create an issue of fact to defeat North Central's properly supported motion for summary judgment. Further, the Supreme Court declined to consider Schlemmer's argument that the misrepresentation could not serve as a basis to rescind the policy because he did not apply for benefits until more than 2 years after applying for the insurance, pursuant to 33-22-205, because Schlemmer never raised the issue at the District Court level. Schlemmer v. N. Cent. Life Ins. Co., 2001 MT 256, 307 M 203, 37 P3d 63 (2001).

Failure of Plaintiff to Appear at Trial or Present Evidence — Judgment for Defendant Proper: Objections by the plaintiff on appeal as to whether evidence was properly admitted at trial were waived because of plaintiff's failure to appear at trial, in person or by counsel, and to make a timely objection. Similarly, plaintiff's contention that the District Court should have found evidence of fraud failed because plaintiff failed to appear or present any evidence at trial to support the claim. Gibson v. Swanson, 239 M 380, 780 P2d 1137, 46 St. Rep. 1764 (1989).

Fraudulent Concealment of Wrongful Nature of Sexual Abuse — Discovery Doctrine Not Applicable: Plaintiff who was sexually abused as a child contended the discovery doctrine applied because her abuser fraudulently concealed the wrongful nature of the relationship. Plaintiff was not incompetent, did not psychologically repress the attacks, and was aware that child molestation was a wrongful act. Reliance upon a fraudulent representation must be reasonable, and the state of facts was sufficient to cause a reasonable person to inquire. E. & D.W. v. D.C.H., 231 M 481, 754 P2d 817, 45 St. Rep. 778 (1988).

Warranty Deed — Donative Intent — No Fraud or Lack of Consideration: Plaintiff filed an action to set aside a warranty deed to defendant transferring land that plaintiff had received originally as a tenant in common with defendant's father under the condition that they deed the land to defendant "when they were done with it". The District Court found that defendant was not guilty of deceit or false representation and that there was fair and adequate consideration for the transfer and refused to void the deed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that there was sufficient evidence to support the District Court's findings. Although the land was valued at $300,000 to $600,000 and the consideration for the transfer was $1, plaintiff's performance of the condition requiring transfer of the land to defendant, coupled with the payment of $1, constituted fair and adequate consideration in this case. Wright v. Blevins, 217 M 439, 705 P2d 113, 42 St. Rep. 1311 (1985).

No Fraud Found in Sale of Real Property — Theory of Negligent Misrepresentation Abandoned — Findings and Conclusions Not Clearly Erroneous: Where the plaintiffs agreed to purchase a bar and restaurant from the defendant seller and later brought an action for damages against the county and the county sanitarian, claiming that the sanitarian misrepresented the capacity of the sewer system and conditions of a county license, the findings and conclusions of the District Court were supported by substantial evidence and were not clearly erroneous. The District Court found that the plaintiffs failed to prove their claim of fraud and that the theory of negligent misrepresentation had been abandoned by the plaintiffs. The record contained conflicting evidence but showed that there could have been a misunderstanding between the parties, and a misunderstanding will not support a claim for fraud in the inducement. The statements made by the defendant may have been negligent, but the District Court properly concluded that by failing to argue the theory of negligent misrepresentation, the plaintiffs evidenced an intention to abandon that theory. Lacey v. Herndon, 205 M 379, 668 P2d 251, 40 St. Rep. 1375 (1983).

Reliance on Stockbroker's Representations: A customer has the right to rely on representations made by his stockbroker as the parties are not on equal footing and do not have equal means of knowing the truth. Brown v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 197 M 1, 640 P2d 453, 39 St. Rep. 305 (1982).

Faulty Execution of Quitclaim Deed: Although attorney was not qualified to notarize execution of client's quitclaim deed to himself, no question of fraud was raised as client admitted to signing execution. Matthews v. Berryman, 196 M 49, 637 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 2112 (1981).

Threat to Withdraw as Legal Counsel: Fraud was not present when attorney, minutes before he was to defend client on criminal charges, threatened to withdraw as counsel unless client executed security agreement and quitclaim deed as security for attorney's fee. Attorney had given the instruments to client weeks before trial, but client had failed to execute them. Matthews v. Berryman, 196 M 49, 637 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 2112 (1981).

Land Sale Contract: Summary judgment for seller was reversed as against buyer alleging fraud based upon misrepresentation. Bails v. Gar, 171 M 342, 558 P2d 458 (1976).

One Party in Superior Position: Record disclosing that buyer of real estate who was real estate broker and mineral dealer, knowledgeable in legal affairs, titles, and values of property and who handled drafting of contract, was in superior position as compared to seller who was almost illiterate, weakminded, and an irresponsible drinker who took no part in drafting contract, was sufficient to raise legal question of fraud on grounds of gross inadequacy of consideration and undue influence. Rock v. Birdwell, 149 M 449, 429 P2d 634 (1967).

Bad Faith: Where seller of land made representation that he had authority to sell his brother's land, which was adjoining, whereas in fact he did not have such authority, and where other evidence indicated that the seller made no effort to carry out other provisions of his contract for sale, the District Court was correct in finding him guilty of bad faith. Hart v. Honrud, 131 M 284, 309 P2d 329 (1957).

Fraud Defined: Fraud, in its generic sense, especially as used in courts of equity, comprises all acts, omissions, and concealments involving a legal or equitable duty which result in damages to another; it is any cunning or artifice used to cheat or deceive another. Bullard v. Zimmerman, 82 M 434, 268 P 512 (1928).

Sale of Stock: Representations made to a stockholder in a company by a broker that 100 shares of its capital stock had been turned back into its treasury by a subscriber unable to pay therefor and soliciting plaintiff to buy it "to help the company out" related to a material matter within the meaning of this section. Stillwell v. Rankin, 55 M 130, 174 P 186 (1918).

Effect on Parties Defrauding: A trust cannot result in one of two persons for the benefit of the other, if they intended and agreed to obtain land from the government unlawfully and fraudulently. The court, in such a case, in a suit between themselves as to the land, will leave the parties where it finds them. Keely v. Gregg, 33 M 216, 83 P 222 (1905).

ELEMENTS OF FRAUD

Tort Claims Not Precluded by Parties Contracting on Same Matter: The parties entered into an agreement for the defendant to purchase the plaintiff's home. After the defendant reneged on the agreement, the plaintiff filed an action for fraud, deceit, and negligence. The District Court dismissed the claims based on its conclusion that the plaintiff's injuries resulted from the defendant's breach of contract and therefore she was precluded from bringing any tort claims against him. The plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court explained that tort claims are not prohibited simply because the parties have entered into a contract on the same matter. However, given that the plaintiff had offered only speculative statements regarding the fraud and deceit claims, the Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's grant of summary judgment on behalf of the defendant on those claims, but it remanded the matter to the District Court to allow the negligence claim to proceed. Dewey v. Stringer, 2014 MT 136, 375 Mont. 176, 325 P.3d 1236.

Constructive Fraud May Rely on Duty to Disclose: In a constructive fraud action concerning a bank providing loan customers with misleading information about the repayment status of their existing loan and modification application, the Supreme Court held that constructive fraud may rely on a duty to disclose if one party has special knowledge of material facts and acts to mislead the other party. Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167.

Contractor Who Built Home So Defective as Not to Be Salvageable Guilty of Constructive Fraud: The Whites entered into a construction contract with Longley for the construction of their home. After failing to perform under the terms of the contract, Longley persuaded the Whites to buy him out of the contract for $30,000 and to let him continue to build the home without a contract. Subsequently, Longley failed to build a house that could be occupied or salvaged. Longley argued that he had not committed constructive fraud because the Whites had failed to disclose everything that they had assumed from their dealings with him. The Supreme Court said there is no support for the contention that a party being defrauded has an obligation to inform the defrauder that the party is being defrauded. The Supreme Court went on to say that the record showed many intentional misrepresentations on Longley's part and that the trial court had correctly found that all the elements necessary to prove constructive fraud were present. White v. Longley, 2010 MT 254, 358 Mont. 268, 244 P.3d 753.

Fraud Substantiated in Attorney's Handling of Probate Case — Violation of Attorney's Duty of Truthfulness — Public Censure Warranted: Attorney Potts represented parties in a will contest. Two of the parties knew that some joint tenancy accounts were not included in the value of the estate and, in an attempt to secure the funds in the accounts, directed Potts to remain silent as to whether the settlement agreement prepared by Potts included the accounts. Potts failed to notify the court and counsel for the estate that one of his clients intended to obtain the jointly held property regardless of the outcome of any settlement. The Supreme Court subsequently determined in In re Estate of Stukey, 2004, MT 279, 323 M 241, 100 P3d 114 (2004), that the parties intended that the total estate value, including the joint tenancy accounts, be included in the settlement. A professional misconduct complaint was later filed against Potts, alleging that Potts engaged in or assisted in client fraud by failing to disclose material information to opposing counsel and that Potts breached the duty of candor to the tribunal by failing to disclose material information to the court. The Commission on Practice found that Potts knew that his clients were using Potts' services to perpetuate fraud in violation of Rules 1.2(d) and 3.3(a)(2) of the Montana Rules of Professional Conduct (MRPC), that Potts failed to fulfill his ethical obligation to inform the clients that he would not participate in the fraudulent conduct, a violation of Rule 1.2(d), MRPC, and that Potts violated the duty of candor to the tribunal in violation of Rule 3.3(a)(2), MRPC. The Commission recommended that Potts be publicly censured and suspended from the practice of law for 30 days. Potts appealed, raising issues of client confidentiality, asserting that his clients did not engage in fraud because the accounts passed to his client as a matter of law and thus could not have been included as part of the settlement basis, contending that he had no duty to correct opposing counsel's erroneous understanding of the settlement, and arguing that the Commission's proposed sanctions were inappropriate. The Supreme Court held that, by definition, Potts' clients were engaged in fraudulent conduct, that Potts assisted in the conduct by not disclosing the conduct to the court and to opposing counsel in violation of the duty of truthfulness and by drafting a stipulation stating that all disputes had been settled when he knew that the parties relied on a misrepresentation in drafting a settlement, and that Potts could have avoided the situation by withdrawing from representation. Potts' conduct resulted in considerable injury to the parties, requiring one District Court proceeding and two appeals to determine the meaning and scope of the stipulation. The Commission's findings were affirmed. However, the court reversed the suspension of Potts' practice in light of mitigating factors of Potts' history of compliance with the rules of professional conduct and his good character and reputation to this point and held that public censure sufficed to apprise Potts of the gravity of the misconduct. In re Potts, 2007 MT 81, 336 M 517, 158 P3d 418 (2007).

False Impression Establishing Duty to Disclose Deficiencies in Irrigation System and Underlying Land — Doctrine of "Implied Findings": When Kimble sold his property and irrigation system, he represented that: (1) the irrigation equipment was in working order; (2) all pivots could be operated at the same time; (3) the system provided sufficient water for the acreage; and (4) he knew of no irrigation system deficiencies. Kimble also neglected to mention the extent and cause of the erosion on pivot three, even though it could be impliedly found that he had knowledge of that risk. Plaintiffs later claimed that Kimble, as defendant's agent, had misrepresented the efficiency and effectiveness of the irrigation system and failed to disclose relevant facts regarding the backfilled acreage at pivot three. The District Court held that Kimble's actions constituted constructive fraud. On appeal, defendants argued that they had no duty to disclose the erosion risk at pivot three because there was no evidence that Kimble created a false impression regarding that risk and that the District Court had made no such finding. Plaintiffs pointed out that the court's conclusion that Kimble failed to disclose the extent and cause of the erosion was based on the factual predicate that defendants had knowledge of the risk of erosion. The Supreme Court affirmed, applying the doctrine of implied findings as set out in Poulsen v. Treasure St. Indus., Inc., 192 M 69, 626 P2d 822 (1981). Although no fiduciary duty existed between the parties, Kimble created a false impression by exaggerating the efficiency of the irrigation system that established a duty on the part of defendants to disclose the fact that the old river channel had been filled, thereby creating an increased risk of serious impairment to pivot three and an increased risk of erosion resulting from planting a field in an old river channel with no riprap to prevent the river from reclaiming the channel. These facts were sufficient to support the legal conclusion that defendants were liable for constructive fraud. H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95, 57 St. Rep. 832 (2000).

Ignorance of Defect Precluding Rescission: Houdashelts sold Lutes a business that had a sump system that was believed by Houdashelts to be legal and properly permitted. Lutes sought to rescind the contract because of constructive fraud, based on Houdashelts's failure to disclose the fact that the sump system did not have the proper permits. Houdashelts were excused from disclosure because of their own ignorance. Therefore, no constructive fraud existed and rescission was improper. Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997).

Six Elements Required to Prove Negligent Misrepresentation — Exercise of Due Care Question for Jury: A real estate broker appealed a verdict finding that an employee had negligently misrepresented the boundary of property purchased by the Cechovics. The Supreme Court held that a plaintiff had to prove the following six elements in order to show negligent misrepresentation: (1) the defendant made a representation as to a past or existing fact; (2) the representation was untrue; (3) the defendant made the representation without any reasonable ground for believing it to be true; (4) the representation was made with the intent to induce the plaintiff to rely on it; (5) the plaintiff was unaware of the falsity of the representation and was justified in relying on it; and (6) the plaintiff was damaged as a result of relying on the representation. The Supreme Court also held that in addition to the six elements, the plaintiff had to show that the defendant failed to exercise due care in obtaining or communicating the information and that the question of whether the defendant had exercised due care was for the jury and would not be overturned on appeal so long as there was substantial evidence to support the jury's finding. Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995), followed in Walters v. Luloff, 2008 MT 17, 341 M 158, 176 P3d 1034 (2008). However, see Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167.

No Duty to Warn of Unjustified Construction Lien — No Constructive Fraud Found in Sale of Real Property: Hickingbothams agreed to purchase a part of tract 1-A (1-A-1) from Duncan. Later, Hickingbothams also negotiated for and purchased an additional adjoining tract (portion

A of 1-A) from Duncan. At the same time, Duncan was constructing a house on a separate part of tract 1-A. Because of a dispute with the contractor over the value of work performed by the contractor, the contractor placed a construction lien against all of parcel 1-A, including that part owned by Hickingbothams. Hickingbothams sued Duncan, alleging that Duncan committed fraud by executing the receipt and agreement to sell and purchase portion A while knowing that a construction lien had been placed against the property. The Supreme Court held that despite Duncan's knowledge of the ongoing dispute with the contractor, the construction lien had not yet been placed against the property, including portion A of 1-A. The Supreme Court held that because Duncan had no duty to warn of the impending filing of an unjustified and unwarranted construction lien against the property and because no real advantage was gained by Duncan, he did not commit constructive fraud. Hickingbotham v. Duncan, 271 M 525, 898 P2d 1215, 52 St. Rep. 574 (1995).

Failure to Keep Promise to Pay Medical Bills if Injured Person Travels to Exam — No Fraud: The District Court properly granted the church summary judgment on issues of fraud and misrepresentation in an action arising after plaintiff fell and was injured on church property. Plaintiff claimed that the church agreed in writing to pay medical bills if plaintiff would travel to Salt Lake City for a medical exam. Plaintiff did so, and the church failed to pay. The promise to pay money in the future was not a representation, the first element of a prima facie case for fraud or misrepresentation. Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640, 50 St. Rep. 535 (1993).

Alleged Representations Regarding Conditions of Loan Agreement — Failure of Fraud Claim Due to Admissions of Party: Debtor claimed actual or constructive fraud based on bank president's alleged representations that the due date on a note would not be enforced and that the note would only become due if the bank deemed itself insecure or if the debtor violated the agreement. However, debtor's statements and admissions directly conflicted with the claimed representations, and in light of debtor's subsequent violation of the agreement, the claim of fraud failed. Citizens First Nat'l Bank of Wolf Point v. Moe Motor Co., 248 M 495, 813 P2d 400, 48 St. Rep. 528 (1991).

Attempt by Corporate Director to Gain Negotiation Advantage Not Constructive Fraud: The District Court found that a corporate director's attempt to gain an unfair advantage over a stockholder through negotiation tactics constituted constructive fraud. The director's offer, however, was never accepted. Reversing, the Supreme Court found that the director's actions were more consistent with negotiation tactics than oppressive actions. There was no breach of fiduciary duty, and the director did not mislead the stockholder to his prejudice. Rejecting all the director's offers, the stockholder then failed to prove prejudice that would constitute constructive fraud. Daniels v. Thomas, Dean & Hoskins, Inc., 246 M 125, 804 P2d 359, 47 St. Rep. 2293 (1990).

Failure to Inform Claimant of Right to Attorney Not Constructive Fraud: The claimant argued that at the time he settled his claim, he was not informed that he could retain an attorney to handle his claim and that this failure constituted constructive fraud. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had not abused its discretion in finding that no constructive fraud existed because the claimant was articulate, had negotiated an earlier settlement with the State Fund, and was well aware of the significance of a sound economic future for himself and his family. Hartfield v. St. Comp. Ins. Fund, 246 M 259, 805 P2d 1293, 47 St. Rep. 2001 (1990).

Denying Opportunity to Discover Defects: The defendant argued that no constructive fraud existed on her part because the plaintiffs had ample time and the duty to discover all pertinent facts. The Supreme Court held that the defendant prevented the plaintiffs from examining the underlying contract despite their requests and that such an action by the defendant constituted constructive fraud. Lee v. Armstrong, 244 M 289, 798 P2d 84, 47 St. Rep. 1421 (1990).

No Evidence Alleged Fraud Benefit to Defendant: The plaintiff argued that the defendant bank's failure to disclose that certain escrow payments had not been applied by the bank as the plaintiff had been led to believe they would be applied constituted constructive fraud. The Supreme Court ruled that the evidence did not support the claim because the bank did not gain any advantage by the nondisclosure. Kitchen Krafters, Inc. v. Eastside Bank of Mont., 242 M 155, 789 P2d 567, 47 St. Rep. 602 (1990).

Fiduciary Relationship Between Insurer and Insured — Breach Constituting Constructive Fraud: Fiduciary duties are simply a statement of the kind of good faith duty owed by an insurer to an insured. An insurance company has to consider the interests of both itself and the insured, but failure to act in the highest good faith toward the insured may constitute constructive fraud. Tynes v. Bankers Life Co., 224 M 350, 730 P2d 1115, 43 St. Rep. 2243 (1986).

No Material Fact to Support Fraud Claims: Plaintiff brought action for fraud, both actual and constructive, as well as undue influence, arising out of a promise by his mother to compensate plaintiff, upon sale of the family corporation's assets, for a portion of value attributable to plaintiff's stock and partnership interest conveyed to corporation for cancellation of promissory note executed by plaintiff for a loan from the corporation. The respondent mother was granted summary judgment. The Supreme Court held that plaintiff failed to establish a fraud claim because of admissions that his mother did not intend to deceive him and that he never relied on his mother's promise to compensate. His claims were also barred by the Statute of Limitations. Fleming v. Fleming Farms, Inc., 221 M 237, 717 P2d 1103, 43 St. Rep. 776 (1986).

False Impression and Failure to Disclose Impairments — Constructive Fraud: The defendants made misleading general statements about the profitability of the business in addition to giving inaccurate figures in a prospectus and in financial statements. Plaintiffs claimed other facts were misrepresented as well. The Supreme Court, relying on Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980), found that these facts created a "pattern of concealment" which contributed to the plaintiffs' inability to discover the true condition and profitability of the business, constituting constructive fraud. McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986). See also Drilcon, Inc. v. Roil Energy Corp., Inc., 230 M 166, 749 P2d 1058, 45 St. Rep. 114 (1988), Hobbs v. Pac. Hide & Fur Depot, 236 M 503, 771 P2d 125, 46 St. Rep. 544 (1989), and Mattingly v. First Bank of Lincoln, 285 M 209, 947 P2d 66, 54 St. Rep. 1116 (1997).

Sale of Ranch by Joint Venturer — No Conversion or Fraud as Against Other Joint Venturers: Respondent and appellants attempted to start a dairy operation on respondent's ranch. Respondent sold the ranch after concluding that the operation would not work because adequate financing could not be obtained. There was conflicting evidence concerning respondent's intentions and whether appellants knew the ranch was for sale. Respondent made his agreed contribution to the operation, paid other expenses in an effort to find financing, and used his best efforts to make the operation a success. Appellants used some of the ranch's equipment as collateral for a loan. There was substantial credible evidence for the lower court's finding that respondent was not liable for constructive fraud for failure to inform appellants that he was going to sell the ranch. Furthermore, since appellants knew respondent did not intend to transfer ownership of the equipment to any of the appellants, their claim for conversion of the equipment must also fail. Farmers St. Bank of Victor v. Imperial Cattle Co., 218 M 89, 708 P2d 223, 42 St. Rep. 1419 (1985).

Parol Evidence Rule — Constructive Fraud as Within the Exception: Defendant represented plaintiff in a civil action in federal court. The parties agreed that the case was originally handled on a 50% contingency fee basis. The case lasted almost 10 years. Plaintiff signed a formal authorization for defendant to settle. At the time of settlement, plaintiff contended the parties agreed to replace their 50% of net fee agreement with a percentage distribution of the gross settlement amount. At some point in time, the parties signed an agreement in defendant's handwriting providing for a 75%-25% split of the settlement. The agreement contained a clause stating the agreed sums had been paid in full. Plaintiff contended defendant had retained half the settlement. Defendant contended that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify concerning the agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the fraud exception to the parol evidence rule addresses both actual and constructive fraud. The court stated that constructive fraud often exists where the parties to a transaction have a special confidential or fiduciary relation which affords the power and means to one to take undue advantage of or exercise undue influence over the other. The attorney-client relationship is a fiduciary one. Evidence presented along with plaintiff's testimony established constructive fraud on defendant's part. The court held that plaintiff's claim of conduct against defendant, which constituted at least constructive fraud, fell within the ambit of the fraud exception of the parol evidence rule. Eaton v. Morse, 212 M 233, 687 P2d 1004, 41 St. Rep. 1708 (1984).

Bank's Fiduciary Duty to Customers It Gives Financial Advice — Real Estate Sales: Wife, whose husband had recently died, signed a contract for a deed to her ranch with Dittman, who signed as "trustee". There were two other purchasers, who did not sign: a person to whom, according to the evidence, wife would not have knowingly sold and the marketing officer of the bank used by the wife and husband for some 24 years. Wife was unfamiliar with real estate and financial affairs and relied upon the advice of various bank officers with regard to the sale of the ranch. This put the bank in a prima facie fiduciary relationship as to the wife. The relationship and its attendant duties extended to the advising officers in their dealings with the wife in regard to sale of the ranch. The marketing officer thus had a duty to fully inform the wife and protect her interests. This duty he breached, and the breach amounted to constructive fraud, where evidence showed that: (1) the contract price and terms were disadvantageous to the wife; (2) the true purchasers were not disclosed to her either by the contract or the marketing officer; (3) the purchasers intended to and began to subdivide and sell the ranch, though the marketing officer knew wife apparently did not wish this, having refused an earlier offer to purchase with right to subdivide; (4) the marketing officer had extensive financial interests involving loans to him from his bank, and an audit of the bank recommended that in view of this his lending authority should be eliminated or curtailed; and (5) the lower court was unimpressed with the way in which wife's attorney in the negotiations represented her interests. The lower court properly ordered the contract for deed rescinded. Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188, 41 St. Rep. 286 (1984).

Negligent Misrepresentation by a Stockbroker: A stockbroker testified that what he told a customer regarding the risk of a transaction he believed to be true. The customer testified that he did not believe he had been deliberately misinformed by the broker. However, one who in the course of a transaction in which he has a pecuniary interest supplies information for the guidance of others in their transactions must exercise reasonable competence in obtaining or communicating the information. Negligent as well as intentional misrepresentation can be the basis of a tort action in fraud. Brown v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 197 M 1, 640 P2d 453, 39 St. Rep. 305 (1982), followed in Wagner v. Cutler, 232 M 332, 757 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1092 (1988).

Reliance on Stockbroker's Representations: A customer has the right to rely on representations made by his stockbroker since the parties are not on equal footing and do not have equal means of knowing the truth. Brown v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 197 M 1, 640 P2d 453, 39 St. Rep. 305 (1982).

Constructive Fraud — Requirement of Breach of Duty: Plaintiffs and defendant entered an agreement whereby defendant would lease condominiums from the plaintiffs and would sell plaintiffs her home. The lease of one of the condominiums contained an option for defendant to purchase the unit by forgiving plaintiffs their obligation under the promissory note on the home. Plaintiffs discovered that the floors in the home slope north at a rate of 5½ inches over 30 feet. Plaintiffs sought to rescind the contract, and defendant sought specific performance. Plaintiffs contended that their consent to the contract was obtained through constructive fraud. Constructive fraud requires the breach of a duty. Defendant and several contractors who performed work on the house testified that they were unaware of the condition of the floors. Plaintiffs inspected the house twice, and their professional appraiser was unaware of the condition during his appraisal. Since defendant was unaware of the defect, she was under no duty to disclose. Because defendant had no duty that she could breach, there was no constructive fraud. Woodahl v. Matthews, 196 M 445, 639 P2d 1165, 39 St. Rep. 238 (1982), followed in Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990). See also Harris v. St. Vincent Healthcare, 2013 MT 207, 371 Mont. 133, 305 P.3d 852, holding that, pursuant to a contract, health care providers had no duty to charge automobile insurance companies at the reduced reimbursement rate of the victims' private health care insurance.

Threat to Withdraw as Legal Counsel: Constructive fraud was not present when attorney, minutes before he was to defend client on criminal charges, threatened to withdraw as counsel unless client executed quitclaim deed as security for attorney's fee. Demand for security for fees was not a breach of duty by the attorney; the attorney did not mislead his client, as he had every intention of withdrawing; and the client was not prejudiced by having to provide security for a debt for which he was legally responsible. Matthews v. Berryman, 196 M 49, 637 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 2112 (1981).

Breach of Duty to Disclose: Breach of duty to disclose material facts is an indispensable element of constructive fraud. Mends v. Dykstra, 195 M 440, 637 P2d 502, 38 St. Rep. 2010 (1981).

Affirmative Misrepresentation — Failure to Advise in Good Faith: Plaintiffs entered an agreement to purchase the Texaco distributorship in Bozeman. At the time of entering the agreement, plaintiffs contacted Texaco's agents in Billings to check rumors that Texaco was planning to withdraw from the Montana market. Plaintiffs followed up on this rumor several times prior to purchasing the distributorship. The agents checked with the New York and Los Angeles offices and received assurances that Texaco was not planning to withdraw from Montana. Shortly after plaintiffs purchased the distributorship, Texaco withdrew from Montana. The Supreme Court found that Texaco's actions in failing to advise plaintiffs of its plans or intentions and in making affirmative misrepresentations concerning its marketing plans or intentions to plaintiffs were in bad faith and done for Texaco's gain without consideration of the risk or harm to the plaintiffs. Texaco was found to have committed a constructive fraud, and since its actions were deliberate and in reckless disregard of the consequences, punitive damages were awarded. Alexander v. Texaco, Inc., 530 F. Supp. 864, 38 St. Rep. 724 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Fraudulent Intent: Dishonesty of purpose or intent to deceive is not a requirement of this section. Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980).

Rescission of Contract — Fraudulent Misrepresentation — Failure to Disclose: During the course of the sale of their bar, defendants were under a duty to make such disclosures as would erase the false impressions created in the minds of plaintiffs that repairs to the premises were not needed and that winter earnings were sufficient to the plaintiffs' needs. Since defendants failed to meet this duty, plaintiffs are entitled to rescission of the contract of sale. Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980).

Concealment of Facts: Restaurant owner's withholding from potential buyers of information that she had received warning from State Board of Health concerning unsatisfactory condition of water supply and sewage disposal systems and that correction of difficulty was necessary to meet Board's standards was fraudulent, the concealment being in the nature of a constructive fraud. Russell v. Russell, 152 M 461, 452 P2d 77 (1969).

Deficiency in Amount of Land Sold: Sale of land later shown to consist of fewer acres than represented constituted constructive fraud, entitling buyer to rescission or damages under statute even though buyer, experienced in real estate transactions, failed to ascertain the true number of acres and even though the seller's representations were honest mistake, not intended to deceive anyone. Hardin v. Hill, 149 M 68, 423 P2d 309 (1967). However, see Turner v. Ferrin, 232 M 146, 757 P2d 335, 45 St. Rep. 946 (1988), in which a 6% acreage variation in a bulk real estate sale was held to be immaterial, and Cedar Lane Ranch, Inc. v. Lundberg, 1999 MT 299, 297 M 145, 991 P2d 440, 56 St. Rep. 1207 (1999), in which words of acreage estimation in a deed, combined with a negotiated lump-sum sale price and an absence of any reference to a price an acre, were determined to constitute a sale in gross.

PLEADINGS AND PROOF

Security Brokerage Contracts — Contract of Adhesion Rendering Arbitration Clause Unenforceable: Kloss opened a full-service brokerage account with defendant, which permitted Kloss to purchase securities and maintain a money market account and which included a living trust account. The account did well, and Kloss decided to set up a charitable trust with the bond proceeds. The initial account and the living trust agreement contained a mandatory arbitration clause, and the charitable trust incorporated the arbitration clause by reference. Kloss then had second thoughts about the charitable trust and petitioned to revoke it. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, and the District Court granted the motion, citing Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26 (1993), and Iwen v. U.S. W. Direct, 1999 MT 63, 293 M 512, 977 P2d 989 (1999), for the holding that defendant had no obligation to explain the terms of the contract because it was within Kloss's reasonable expectations and that even if the contract was considered a contract of adhesion, it was not unenforceable because it was not unconscionable. Kloss appealed, arguing that the arbitration clause was part of a contract of adhesion and that waiver of the constitutional right to jury trial should not be presumed from the signing of a contract of adhesion. Defendant maintained that form contracts prepared by securities brokers are not contracts of adhesion dictated by one party to another who has no voice in its formulation, and that arbitration clauses contained in the contracts are not unconscionable. The Supreme Court examined Passage v. Prudential-Bache Sec., Inc., 223 M 60, 727 P2d 1298 (1986), for an explanation of contracts of adhesion in the securities context and the circumstances under which they are unenforceable. The court distinguished both Chor and Passage, finding that the contracts in this case were clearly contracts of adhesion because they were standardized forms containing terms that Kloss had no opportunity to negotiate if wishing to invest with defendant. Further, the arbitration clause by which Kloss waived the right to access to state courts, the right to jury trial, the right to reasonable discovery, the right to findings of fact based on the evidence, and the right to enforce the law by way of appeal was clearly not within Kloss's reasonable expectations. The arbitration clause was never explained by defendant, and Kloss was not aware of the arbitration provision in the contract. Thus, the District Court committed reversible error when it concluded that the arbitration clause was enforceable. Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002), followed in Larsen v. W. St. Ins. Agency, Inc., 2007 MT 270, 339 M 407, 170 P3d 956 (2007), with regard to factors to be applied in determining a contract of adhesion.

District Court Jurisdiction to Decide Constructive Fraud Based on Pleadings and Final Pretrial Order: Plaintiffs filed a claim for misrepresentation and failure to disclose concerning the sale of an irrigation system. Defendants contended that plaintiffs did not notify them by pleadings or evidence at trial that plaintiffs were claiming that a false impression was created regarding the condition of the field at pivot three, arguing that the complaint concerned defects and misrepresentations related to the irrigation system, not to the land, and that the District Court thus lacked jurisdiction to enter judgment on the issue of the land rather than the irrigation system. A District Court does not have jurisdiction to grant relief outside of the issues presented by the pleadings unless the parties stipulate that other questions be considered or the pleadings are amended to conform to the proof. However, in this case, the pleadings and the final pretrial order, which cited misrepresentation of or failure to disclose problems with both the deficient irrigation system and the erosion of the river bank near pivot three, gave defendants sufficient notice of the disputed issues to vest the District Court with issue jurisdiction. H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95, 57 St. Rep. 832 (2000).

Alleged Failure to Disclose Easement in Real Estate Purchase — No Constructive Fraud Found: Garrison expressed an interest to Averill, a real estate broker, in purchasing real estate on Flathead Lake from Gainey. After Garrison made an offer on the property, Averill received a counteroffer from Gainey, who, at that time, told Averill about an easement on the property. Averill told Garrison of the easement, explaining that Garrison could back out of the deal because of it and that if Garrison chose to go ahead with the purchase, he would have an opportunity to review the language of the easement when title insurance was purchased. Later, Averill read the easement language to Garrison over the telephone, and when the two walked over the property, Averill had a copy of the easement language with him and told Garrison that, to his knowledge, the easement was not being used. After the closing, people who benefited from the easement informed Garrison of their intent to make use of the easement and Garrison sued Averill and Gainey, alleging constructive fraud. The Supreme Court noted that even if there had been a plan by some persons holding the easement to make future use of the easement, that testimony was fully consistent with the testimony presented at trial concerning nonuse of the easement by present lot owners. The Supreme Court held that there was substantial credible evidence from which the District Court could find that the existence and scope of the easement and the fact of nonuse of the easement were fully disclosed to Garrison. Garrison v. Averill, 282 M 508, 938 P2d 702, 54 St. Rep. 454 (1997).

Constructive Fraud Pleading — "Inartful" Pleading Held Sufficient — Relationship Between Former Rules 8(a) and 9(b): Berg was sued by the State Fund in a complaint that pleaded constructive fraud in three paragraphs that incorporated previous counts of the complaint by reference. Berg alleged that the constructive fraud count did not comply with the requirements of former Rule 9(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), that all of the elements of the constructive fraud claim be pleaded with "particularity" because all of the elements of constructive fraud were not pleaded. The Supreme Court held that the "particularity" requirements of former Rule 9(b) do not negate, and must be read in conjunction with, the provisions of former Rule 8(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), requiring a short and plain statement. The Supreme Court noted that Berg was able to sufficiently understand the state's pleading, that he made a responsive pleading denying the allegation of constructive fraud, that the State Fund pleading must be understood in its context of the facts of the case, and that there were no contradictory statements or statements made "on information and belief" in any of the State Fund's statements in its complaint. State ex rel. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund v. Berg, 279 M 161, 927 P2d 975, 53 St. Rep. 1098 (1996).

Sale of Home by Realtors — Negligent Misrepresentation, Actual and Constructive Fraud, and Real Estate Licensing and Consumer Protection Laws — Expert Witnesses Unnecessary to Prove Standard of Care: Durbins purchased a home through the seller's realtors. Contrary to the representations of the realtors, Durbins discovered that the property had no legal septic system, that the household water was unsafe to use for any purpose, and that the access road was located on the neighbor's property. Durbins brought an action against the realtors, alleging negligent misrepresentation, actual and constructive fraud, and statutory violations involving the Montana real estate licensing laws and the Montana Unfair Trade Practices and Consumer Protection Act of 1973. The defendants sought and achieved dismissal of the case on the grounds that Durbins failed to prove through expert testimony the applicable standard of care of the realtors. The Supreme Court held that because Durbins did not allege professional misrepresentation, the issues of whether the realtors negligently misrepresented the facts, were guilty of actual or constructive fraud, or were guilty of the statutory violations alleged by Durbins, were questions resolvable by common knowledge. The questions did not turn on a standard peculiarly within the knowledge of an expert witness, and scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge was not necessary to assist the jury. The Supreme Court therefore held that Durbins were not required to provide expert standard of care testimony to establish any of the violations. Durbin v. Ross, 276 M 463, 916 P2d 758, 53 St. Rep. 471 (1996).

Allegation of Constructive Fraud Based on Concealment or Misleading Conduct — Failure of Proof: Bengala asserted constructive fraud based on a bank's failure to notify him on the progress of premises repairs for which the bank was obligated by lease agreement. Evidence showed that the bank attempted to resolve the repair problems, even though Bengala was not made aware of those efforts until he withheld his rent in protest. Despite the lack of notification, the trial court properly found a failure of proof of constructive fraud. Bengala v. Conservative Sav. Bank, 250 M 101, 818 P2d 371, 48 St. Rep. 880 (1991).

Allegations of Constructive Fraud and Visitation Interference Unsubstantiated by Fact — Summary Judgment Proper: Appellant alleged that a counselor's testimony at a dissolution hearing was a misrepresentation constituting constructive fraud and that her observations and professional opinions affected the outcome of the visitation order to the point of visitation interference. However, the allegations were based on appellant's own speculation and opinion rather than substantial objective evidence contained in the record. Absent any genuine issue of material fact, summary judgment on both questions was proper. Thomas v. Hale, 246 M 64, 802 P2d 1255, 47 St. Rep. 2261 (1990).

No Pattern of Repeated Concealment to Support Finding of Constructive Fraud: The parties entered into a contract for the sale of a marketing by mail business. The plaintiff argued that the defendant had concealed the true financial status of the business from him and that the customer list supplied to him was in reality only a mailing list. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that there had been no constructive fraud. The Supreme Court stated that although there was conflicting testimony, there was sufficient evidence to support the trial court's findings. Amundson v. Wortman, 238 M 207, 777 P2d 315, 46 St. Rep. 1207 (1989).

Bank's Fiduciary Duty in Arm's-Length Debtor/Creditor Relationship: Evidence indicated a longstanding relationship between First Bank and customer but did not show that First Bank had ever acted as financial adviser to customer. Without a showing that parties had other than an arm's-length relationship, it was error to submit a fiduciary duty instruction to the jury. First Bank-Billings v. Clark, 236 M 195, 771 P2d 84, 46 St. Rep. 291 (1989).

Corporate Fraud Not Shown With Particularity: Claim of plaintiff who asserted fraud in sale of his interest in a corporation was summarily dismissed upon his failure to produce documentation showing any misrepresentation or to allege fraud with particularity. Pipinich v. Battershell, 232 M 507, 759 P2d 148, 45 St. Rep. 1237 (1988).

Dual Prongs for Piercing Corporate Veil — Evidence of Fraud Sufficient: There are two prongs to piercing the corporate veil. First, the person purporting to represent the corporation must be found to be the corporate "alter ego". Second, there must be a showing that the corporate entity was used as a subterfuge to defeat public convenience, justify wrong, or perpetrate either actual or constructive fraud. Drilcon, Inc. v. Roil Energy Corp., Inc., 230 M 166, 749 P2d 1058, 45 St. Rep. 114 (1988), followed in Berlin v. Boedecker, 268 M 444, 887 P2d 1180, 51 St. Rep. 569 (1994).

Duty, Not Fiduciary Relationship, Required: This section does not require that plaintiff demonstrate a fiduciary relationship for a constructive fraud claim to lie; it merely requires the establishment of a duty. A sufficient duty arose in a commercial transaction where defendants had a duty to refrain from intentionally or negligently creating a false impression by words or conduct. McJunkin v. Kaufman, 229 M 432, 748 P2d 910, 44 St. Rep. 2111 (1987), citing Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980), and distinguished in Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26, 50 St. Rep. 1234 (1993). See also Cohen v. Wedbush, Noble, Cooke, Inc., 841 F2d 282 (9th Cir. 1988), Eissinger v. Mullin Trucking, Inc., 263 M 38, 865 P2d 300, 50 St. Rep. 1695 (1993), and Mattingly v. First Bank of Lincoln, 285 M 209, 947 P2d 66, 54 St. Rep. 1116 (1997).

Instruction Given on Constructive Fraud — Instruction on Bad Faith Superfluous: The District Court instructed the jury on constructive fraud but not on breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which plaintiff contended was error. The Supreme Court noted that the jury found no breach of duty under the instruction on constructive fraud, which does not require a showing of fraudulent intent. An instruction on bad faith would require plaintiff to prove intentional concealment. The court held that if plaintiff could not meet the burden of proof on constructive fraud, she could not meet the higher burden of proof on bad faith; thus, the instruction would have been superfluous. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986), partially overruled in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995).

Instruction on Negligent Misrepresentation Not Given — Action for Fraud: There was no error when District Court instructed the jury on constructive fraud but not on negligent misrepresentation. In Montana, an action for negligent misrepresentation is an action for fraud, so the jury was adequately instructed. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986), partially overruled in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995).

No Fraud When Implications Based on Opinion: A plaintiff's opinions alone do not provide a sufficient basis in fact to prove constructive fraud when there is no evidence of any breach of duty or of a fraudulent act or omission. Westlake v. Osborne, 220 M 91, 713 P2d 548, 43 St. Rep. 200 (1986).

Confidential Relationship Not Found as Basis for Constructive Fraud: The plaintiff, son of a deceased rancher, received 24 ½% of the surface rights to his father's ranch in accordance with the terms of an estate plan established for the benefit of the plaintiff and his brothers, the defendants. Upon leaving the ranch, plaintiff executed one quitclaim deed to his mineral interest in 1977 and one quitclaim deed to his surface interest in 1968 in exchange for a promise that the defendants would hold him harmless on a promissory note. The District Court did not err (in a subsequent challenge by the plaintiff to the validity of the quitclaim deeds) in declaring both deeds to be valid and denying the plaintiff any interest in the ranch. The plaintiff's argument that because of the confidential, familial relationship which existed between himself and the other family members he failed to obtain independent advice as to the signing of the quitclaim deeds was not supported by the findings of the District Court. The type of "confidential relationship" that will support a presumption of fraud must include an abuse of confidence. Here there was no evidence of abuse and no evidence that the plaintiff was in any way misled. Moreover, independent advice is not a prerequisite to the validity of a deed. Turley v. Turley, 199 M 265, 649 P2d 434, 39 St. Rep. 1336 (1982).

No Fraud When No Advantage Gained by Breach of Duty: A real estate broker discussed the listing agreement with seller, and seller testified that he was familiar with standard real estate listing agreements. Even if there were a breach of a fiduciary relationship, there was no evidence that the broker gained an advantage that could result in constructive fraud. Nardi v. Smalley, 197 M 321, 643 P2d 228, 39 St. Rep. 606 (1982).

Constructive Fraud in Execution of Contract for Deed — Failure to Disclose Violation of Law: Where the plaintiffs sued for damages caused by the defendants' fraud in the execution of a contract for deed for the sale of a shale and concrete block plant, alleging misrepresentations by the defendant company and its agents as to the plant's status of compliance with air and water pollution laws, the court did not err in finding the defendants guilty of constructive fraud. The record shows that the defendants were put on notice of the pollution problems by both the notice of violation of county and state regulations and by complaints and threat of a lawsuit from a neighboring landowner. Because the record is void of any evidence that these impairments of the plaintiffs' property were ever disclosed to the plaintiffs, there is substantial evidence to support the finding of constructive fraud. Poulsen v. Treasure St. Indus., Inc., 192 M 69, 626 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 218 (1981).

Valuation of Land: Proof of inadequacy of value of land as security for indebtedness against it is not alone sufficient to prove fraud, either actual or constructive. Duffy v. Hastings, 78 M 22, 252 P 316 (1926).

GENERAL

Sufficient Indica of Mutual Assent to Find Written Contract — Compensatory Damages — Constructive Fraud — Statute of Frauds — Statute of Limitations: The defendants sold a tract of land from their parents' estate despite the fact that the plaintiffs had an oral agreement with the parents for the purchase of a portion of the property. The District Court properly determined that the plaintiffs had an enforceable contract to buy the property under 70-20-102 and 30-11-111 based on (1) an unsigned land purchase agreement, (2) a land survey, (3) a check issued by one of the plaintiffs that was endorsed and deposited, and (4) a letter to a tax preparer referencing the check received as partial payment for the property at issue. Because the plaintiffs had an enforceable contract, the District Court properly determined that the plaintiffs suffered compensatory damages and that the personal representative's statements showed constructive fraud. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in its conclusion that the limitations provided under 72-3-803 did not bar the plaintiffs' claim. Wood v. Anderson, 2017 MT 180, 388 Mont. 166, 399 P.3d 304.

Arbitration Provision in Adhesive Contract Enforceable — Noncompetition Clause Within Weaker Party's Reasonable Expectation: Larsen asserted that an employment contract containing a noncompetition clause was a contract of adhesion and that the arbitration clause in the contract was unenforceable. The Supreme Court applied the factors in Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002), and determined that the contract was indeed adhesive. However, simply being adhesive does not render a contract invalid and unenforceable under Kloss. The contract must also either fall outside the weaker party's reasonable expectation or be unconscionable. In this case, Larsen had 20 years' experience in the insurance industry and had entered various similar employment agreements that contained arbitration clauses during those years, and the arbitration provision was stated in bold letters on the first page of the agreement. These facts constituted sufficient grounds to support the conclusion that the arbitration clause fell within Larsen's reasonable expectations and was therefore enforceable. However, once the District Court determined the validity of the arbitration clause, the court exceeded its authority in deciding additional substantive issues under the agreement that should have been decided by an arbitrator, so the case was remanded for arbitration. Larsen v. W. St. Ins. Agency, Inc., 2007 MT 270, 339 M 407, 170 P3d 956 (2007), following Martz v. Beneficial Mont., Inc., 2006 MT 94, 332 M 93, 135 P3d 790 (2006).

Validity of Voluntary Easement Affirmed: The Permanns requested that Urick grant an easement across Urick's property for the Permanns to go camping and move cattle, and Urick agreed. When Urick's sons discovered that the voluntary easement had been granted, they persuaded Urick to rescind the easement. Urick requested that the Permanns convey the easement back to her. They refused. Urick filed suit and then subsequently died. Urick's son Gliko, as trustee of Urick's estate, brought an action against the Permanns seeking to have the easement rescinded, citing mutual mistake, constructive fraud, undue influence, and lack of consideration. The District Court held that the easement was valid, and Gliko appealed. The Supreme Court considered each of Gliko's rescission arguments in turn. The language of the easement was simple and unambiguous, so there was no mutual mistake. Urick had testified by deposition that no misleading statements were made relating to the easement, so there was no constructive fraud. There was no confidential relationship between Urick and the Permanns, Urick was not possessed of weakness of mind, and no advantage was taken of Urick's necessities or distress, so there was no undue influence. Last, there was no evidence that consideration was meant to be given, so lack of consideration was not a valid ground for rescission. The District Court was affirmed. Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006).

Constructive Fraud for Failure to Disclose Risk of Erosion to Field Planted in Old River Channel: The sellers of farm land and an irrigation system failed to disclose to the buyers that the field at pivot three was an old river bed that had been filled but not riprapped and that the field was subject to increased risk of erosion. The buyers spent $99,575 to fix the impairment and sued for damages. The District Court found that the sellers were liable for constructive fraud for failure to disclose, and the sellers contested the District Court findings. The Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court was capable of finding that a risk of increased erosion existed without the benefit of expert testimony. Further, the court's conclusion, that filling the old river bed and creating a greatly increased risk of erosion was a serious impairment, was not clearly erroneous. Moreover, the court did not err in holding that the buyers had no way of knowing of the increased risk, even though a conversation with the the sellers' employee who performed the backfill work would have revealed the problem. The buyers were not required to speak with the sellers' employees before purchasing, particularly given the fact that when the field at pivot three was cleared and leveled, it looked like any other field. The sellers also contended that the buyers had merely to ask their own consultant, who would have informed them of the origin and obvious condition of the field. However, the buyers' consultant did not inspect the fields until after closing of the sale and thus could not have provided the buyers with any knowledge. H-D Irrigating, Inc. v. Kimble Properties, Inc., 2000 MT 212, 301 M 34, 8 P3d 95, 57 St. Rep. 832 (2000).

Bank Loan for Purchase of Contaminated Real Property — Negligent Misrepresentation, Constructive Fraud, and Punitive Damages — Summary Judgment Reversed: After the Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) discovered that soil had been contaminated with gasoline leaking from Habets' and other service station gas tanks in violation of 75-10-715, Habets entered into a buy-sell agreement for sale of his service station to Mattingly. Mattingly then met with First Bank Vice President Joe Dolan to secure financing. Dolan conducted a physical inspection of the service station property in order to obtain an impression of the value of the property and to determine whether First Bank would be secure in its loan. At the time of his inspection, Dolan was aware of the contamination caused by the service station gas tanks. The loan was approved by the First Bank loan committee made up of Dolan, Susan Hemmer, the bank president, and John Mulcare, an owner of another service station, all three of whom were aware of the contamination but did not discuss it with Mattingly or the loan committee. Mattingly learned of the contamination much later when he tried to sell the station. He then brought an action against Habets, Habets' realtor, and First Bank, alleging constructive fraud, negligence, and negligent misrepresentation by First Bank and seeking punitive damages. The District Court granted summary judgment to First Bank on all issues. The Supreme Court, following Kitchen Krafters, Inc. v. Eastside Bank of Mont., 242 M 155, 789 P2d 567 (1990), which was overruled, with regard to the elements for a claim of negligent misrepresentation against a financial institution, in Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167, stated that a threshold issue in a claim of negligent misrepresentation is whether the defendant made a representation as to a past or existing material fact upon which the claim is based. The Supreme Court pointed out that except for some basic facts involving the existence of the contamination, Dolan's visit to the gas station, and the action of the loan committee, the parties disagreed over the nature, scope, and import of the valuation of the property; disagreed whether First Bank's appraisal of the property and approval of the Mattingly loan constituted a representation as to the value of the property; and, if it was a representation, disagreed over whether Mattingly relied upon that representation. Citing McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536 (1986), the Supreme Court also stated that special circumstances may support a claim for constructive fraud when a party makes misleading statements concerning the physical condition or commercial value of real estate and pointed out that a jury might find that representations by First Bank with regard to the property would constitute these "special circumstances". Concerning the requirement of this section that in a claim for constructive fraud one party must gain an advantage over the other, the Supreme Court cited the fact that upon closing the sale of the station to Mattingly, First Bank was able to pay off a loan for the property made to Habets and that in making the loan to Mattingly, First Bank was able to collect interest income from the loan. Because there were facts in dispute as to the foregoing issues, the Supreme Court held that summary judgment was not appropriate and that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment in favor of First Bank. Because 27-1-221 allows punitive damages against a party guilty of actual fraud or malice, the Supreme Court also reversed the District Court on the issue of punitive damages. Mattingly v. First Bank of Lincoln, 285 M 209, 947 P2d 66, 54 St. Rep. 1116 (1997).

Contract Clause Requiring Independent Investigation Not Bar to Negligent Misrepresentation Action: A real estate broker appealed a verdict finding that an employee had negligently misrepresented the boundary of property purchased by the Cechovics. The basis for the appeal was that the contract between the parties contained a clause requiring the Cechovics to conduct an independent investigation, which the Cechovics had not conducted, and that therefore the Cechovics' reliance on the employee's representation was not justified. The Supreme Court held that an independent investigation clause does not preclude justifiable reliance by a buyer on misrepresentations made by the seller and that in the present case, the jury had found that such reliance existed. Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995), following Wagner v. Cutler, 232 M 332, 757 P2d 779 (1988).

Negligent Misrepresentation Governed by Three-Year Negligence Statute of Limitations — Tolls Until Plaintiff Suffers Damages: A real estate broker appealed a verdict finding that he was liable because of his employee's negligent misrepresentation of a boundary on land purchased by the plaintiffs. The basis for the appeal was that the applicable statute of limitations was the 2-year time limit governing actions for fraud and that the suit had not been timely filed. The Supreme Court held that negligent misrepresentation involves breach of a reasonable standard of care and therefore is couched in terms of negligence and as such is subject to the 3-year negligence statute of limitations. The Supreme Court further held that the statute did not begin to run until damages were suffered and that did not occur in the present case until the plaintiffs learned that their house had been built on another's property. Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995), partially overruling Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665 (1986).

Prima Facie Fraud Not Shown — No Instruction Required: A party that failed to establish a prima facie case of constructive fraud by proving or even asserting the existence of any breach of duty or fraudulent act or omission was not entitled to an instruction on the subject of constructive fraud. Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993).

Relationship of Negligent Misrepresentation to Fraud and Negligence Liability: Depending on circumstances, negligent misrepresentation can give rise to a case of constructive fraud under this section. Yet under Restatement (Second) of Torts 552, a negligent misrepresentation may be insufficient to constitute actual or constructive fraud but nevertheless give rise to negligence liability under 27-1-701 through the want of ordinary care of the defendant in managing his property or person. In the latter case, the test of liability is the exercise of reasonable care and is subject to comparative negligence. Bottrell v. Am. Bank, 237 M 1, 773 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 561 (1989), followed in Mattingly v. First Bank of Lincoln, 285 M 209, 947 P2d 66, 54 St. Rep. 1116 (1997).

Fiduciary Relationship Basis for Constructive Fraud Cause of Action: Dealings or transactions between parties who have a fiduciary relationship provide a sufficient contract to support an action for constructive fraud. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986). See also Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Constructive Fraud in Real Estate Brokerage Agreement: Where defendant agreed to pay commission for brokerage services rendered by out-of-state plaintiff not licensed in Montana and services were performed by plaintiff both within and without Montana, the court found the parties had entered into a fiduciary relationship whereby neither party may take advantage of the other. Therefore, the fact that recovery may not be had for services rendered in Montana because of the proscription of 37-51-401 does not prevent recovery for services rendered out of the state. Ryckman v. Wildwood, Inc., 197 M 154, 641 P2d 467, 39 St. Rep. 378 (1982).

Sale of House: The prospective buyer of a house should surely not be required to take the house apart board by board to determine its condition. Where the jury could have found the seller often gave buyers misleading information and half-truths, the seller admitted on cross-examination that he was aware of many serious flaws in the house and did not inform buyers, and many of the flaws were not obvious and required far more than a superficial inspection to find them, constructive fraud on the seller's part was a crucial and perhaps the crucial element of the buyers' suit for damages or rescission. There also being numerous facts in dispute, it was reversible error to refuse buyers' constructive fraud instructions (to give an instruction that if material facts are known to one party and not the other, failure to disclose them is not actionable fraud) and to refuse to allow mention of constructive fraud in closing argument. The fact that the parties had a contract and had neither a fiduciary nor a confidential relationship would not bar a jury from finding constructive fraud. Mends v. Dykstra, 195 M 440, 637 P2d 502, 38 St. Rep. 2010 (1981), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Trustee Gaining Advantage Through Fraud: Plaintiff's husband and defendant were brothers and partners in a ranching operation, although each owned the land individually. Plaintiff's husband died and defendant was named executor. A corporation was formed on May 1, 1973, to operate the ranch. Both parties transferred all assets to the corporation. Defendant's family got 364 more shares than plaintiff, and defendant was named president of the corporation. Restrictions were placed on the valuation and transfer of stock. On May 29, 1975, plaintiff consulted her own attorney and for the first time fully realized her position. All corporate votes became deadlocked. On April 29, 1977, plaintiff filed suit to dissolve the corporation, alleging fraud and oppressive conduct by defendant and mistake at the formation. The court found that defendant occupied a position of trust and confidence in relation to plaintiff. He was executor of her husband's estate and partner to her husband at the date of death; that status imposed on defendant the duties of a trustee. Because the result of incorporation was to give defendant control over plaintiff's assets, the trustee statutes were clearly violated. Defendant used his position to gain an advantage over plaintiff without fully disclosing the consequences and was guilty of fraud. Skierka v. Skierka Bros., Inc., 192 M 505, 629 P2d 214, 38 St. Rep. 754 (1981).

Constructive Fraud — Failure of Plaintiffs to Investigate Misrepresentation: Where plaintiffs seek rescission of a contract for sale of a bar, defendants' contention that plaintiffs could have discovered, upon investigation, defects of the premises does not mitigate defendants' duty to erase false impressions, especially where, as here, defendants knew of the defects, investigation was made difficult by defendants, repairs were substantial, and plaintiffs were novices. Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980), relied on in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Waiver of Right to Rescind: Plaintiffs do not waive their rights to rescind a contract for sale of a bar even if they wait 9 months after execution of the contract where defects in premises did not surface until the end of the 9-month period. Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980).

Failure to Read Deed Carefully: Where plaintiff's principal reason for wishing to rescind mineral deed was her mistaken belief that she had granted a royalty interest, evidence that plaintiff was astute in negotiations and that consideration for the deed was fair and adequate but that plaintiff failed to read carefully the instrument she signed did not establish constructive fraud under this section. Clough v. Jackson, 156 M 272, 479 P2d 266 (1971).

Deed From Mother to Son: Constructive trust would not be imposed on lands deeded son by aged mother in absence of evidence to show that son gained land by accident, mistake, undue influence, violation of trust, or other wrongful act or by constructive fraud as defined in statute. Bodine v. Bodine, 149 M 29, 422 P2d 650 (1967).

Case Notes

Gift of Shares of Family Farm to Son — Undue Influence Not Proven by Other Son: The mother owned a family farm where one of her two sons worked as the full-time manager. The mother expressed interest in preserving the farm and she gifted her controlling shares to the manager son. After taking the mother to Billings for medical evaluations and facilitating a gift of a convertible to himself, the other son filed suit alleging undue influence. The District Court found that the mother's gift of shares to the manager son was not the result of undue influence, that the other son failed to meet his burden of proving undue influence, that the gift of shares without condition became irrevocable upon acceptance, and that the essential elements of an irrevocable gift inter vivos were satisfied. Larson v. Larson, 2017 MT 299, 389 Mont. 458, 406 P.3d 925.

Two Contested Wills and Trusts — Appointment of Neutral Representative — Undue Influence, Fraud, or Duress: The decedent executed a will and trust in 2010 leaving the majority of her estate to her niece, with whom she shared a close relationship. In 2012, the decedent executed a new will leaving a sizable portion of her estate to her housekeeper and handyman. The decedent died a year later. The housekeeper petitioned for probate of the 2012 will, and the niece objected and cross-petitioned for probate of the 2010 will. The District Court appointed a neutral personal representative to serve as a special fiduciary to the decedent's trust. A jury found that the 2012 will was procured by undue influence, fraud, or duress. However, the District Court rejected the niece's requests to receive fees and costs and to admit the 2010 will and trust because the special verdict form did not ask the jury to make any findings on the 2010 will or trust. On appeal by both parties, the Supreme Court affirmed in part, upholding the District Court's appointment of a neutral personal representative and special fiduciary, admission of settlement document evidence because one party opened the door to the line of questioning, and suppression of testimony by the decedent's attorneys relating to her dispositional intentions. The Supreme Court also found that while the District Court erred in precluding testimony because a party violated a sequestration order, numerous professional witnesses and friends of the decedent provided similar testimony. The Supreme Court held that the will contestants have the burden of establishing undue influence, fraud, or duress and that the jury properly found that the 2012 will was procured in this manner. However, the Supreme Court found that the District Court erred in refusing to admit the 2010 will to probate and in finding that the niece was statutorily barred from recovering attorney fees. In re Estate of Edwards, 2017 MT 93, 387 Mont. 274, 393 P.3d 639.

Allegation of Undue Influence When Testator Is Taking Heavy Medication at Time Will Is Executed — No Evidence of Specific Acts of Undue Influence Presented — Summary Judgment Proper: After the testator's death, one of his daughters claimed that her father had been under undue influence at the time he executed the will. The daughter argued that her father was taking heavy medication at the time the will was executed; however, she did not point to specific acts of undue influence and the District Court granted summary judgment against the daughter. She appealed the decision to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the District Court ruling. The court agreed that summary judgment was proper because the daughter's suspicion of undue influence was not supported by any admissible evidence of specific acts of undue influence outlined in this section. In re Estate of Mead, 2014 MT 264, 376 Mont. 386, 336 P.3d 362.

Substantial Circumstantial Evidence of Undue Influence in Order to Acquire Parent's Assets: A son and a daughter both sought probate of different wills signed by their mother. The District Court found that the decedent was subject to undue influence at the time she transferred certain property to the son, so probate was denied, resulting in intestacy. The son appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. There was substantial circumstantial evidence that the son took advantage of the mother's physical and mental weakness when she transferred the property to the son. Based on the nature and timing of the transfer, the District Court did not err in concluding that the transfer was the result of undue influence by the son. In re Estate of Lightfield, 2009 MT 244, 351 M 426, 213 P3d 468 (2009).

Sufficient Finding of Undue Influence Over Parent — Constructive Trusts Properly Imposed and Damages Awarded: When Josephine became too ill to manage herself and her affairs, her daughter Melissa agreed to move in with Josephine and care for her. In the process, as Josephine's health steadily declined, Melissa used her confidential relationship with Josephine to manipulate Josephine and her finances, controlling Josephine's checking account, mail, and payment of bills and expenses. By the time Josephine died, Melissa had obtained title to all of Josephine's real property, sold Josephine's property in Ovando and Florida, encumbered the remaining property with over $175,000 in loans taken out in Josephine's name, used part of the loan proceeds to buy property in Missoula and Las Vegas, exhausted all cash in Josephine's house, repeatedly overdrawn Josephine's checking account, fraudulently cashed one of Josephine's certificates of deposit by forging Josephine's name to it, used and obtained credit cards in Josephine's name and charged the account to the credit limit, exhausted all of Josephine's savings, Social Security, retirement, and annuity income, retained rental income from Josephine's rental units without accounting for it, destroyed years of Josephine's financial records while keeping very few records after assuming control of Josephine's affairs, fabricated lease documents and forged signatures on them to obtain loans in Josephine's name, used Josephine's money to pay all personal bills and obligations, never informed her siblings or provided an accounting of expenditures of Josephine's income and assets, and refused to provide a copy of Josephine's will, answer questions, or provide any other information. Melissa's brother Robert obtained a copy of the will and commenced an action to recover assets of Josephine's estate from Melissa. The District Court held Melissa accountable for a money judgment of $177,000 and for other items, totaling nearly $400,000. The court imposed a constructive trust on all real property that Melissa had obtained from Josephine or purchased with loan proceeds obtained in Josephine's name and awarded Robert costs and attorney fees. Melissa appealed. The Supreme Court applied the criteria in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001), and determined that Melissa had exercised undue influence over Josephine. It concluded that there were ample reasons for imposition of the constructive trusts because the properties were obtained through undue influence and would have unjustly enriched Melissa if she were allowed to retain title to the properties. The damage award was based on substantial evidence and did not constitute error. The award of attorney fees and costs was within the equitable powers of the District Court based on the extraordinary efforts by Melissa to conceal her use of Josephine's property and money, which required Robert to make substantial efforts to successfully uncover and prove Melissa's wrongful conduct. The District Court was affirmed on all issues. Monroe v. Marsden, 2009 MT 137, 350 M 327, 207 P3d 320 (2009).

Summary Judgment Proper Absent Proof of Undue Influence: Stanton sued for distribution of trust proceeds that were bequeathed to him in Barker's will. Defendants asserted that Stanton had exerted undue influence over Barker, invalidating the will, and that a prior version of the will should be followed, which included defendants as beneficiaries. The District Court found that defendants did not prove undue influence and granted summary judgment to Stanton. On appeal, the Supreme Court applied the criteria in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001), to determine whether Stanton had exerted undue influence, noting that the defendants bore the burden of proof. Stanton admitted a confidential relationship with Barker, but that fact was insufficient in itself to prove undue influence. Because of the relationship, Stanton had the opportunity to exercise undue influence. However, opportunity alone is not sufficient to prove undue influence and invalidate a will. Barker's physical and mental condition and the naturalness of the disposition were not at issue. Defendants failed to prove undue influence, and summary judgment for Stanton was affirmed. Stanton v. Wells Fargo Bank Mont., N.A., 2007 MT 22, 335 M 384, 152 P3d 115 (2007). See also In re Estate of Mead, 2014 MT 264, 376 Mont. 386, 336 P.3d 362.

No Finding of Undue Influence Under Bradshaw Criteria: Contestants to their father's will asserted that their father was unduly influenced by one of his sons. The District Court found no undue influence, and on appeal, the Supreme Court examined each of the criteria in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001), and affirmed. All of the children had confidential relationships with their father at certain points in their lives, but the mere opportunity to exercise influence on a testator is not sufficient to prove undue influence. Although the contestants may have suspected that the father was unduly influenced, they did not meet their burden of proving that fact. Also, the District Court made the requisite findings regarding the father's physical and mental capacity and condition, the possibility of unnaturalness of the disposition, and the timing and circumstances surrounding the demands and importunities that may have affected the father's ability to withstand any possible influence, and the findings were supported by credible evidence. In re Estate of Harms, 2006 MT 320, 335 M 66, 149 P3d 557 (2006).

Validity of Promissory Note Executed to Satisfy Charge-Back Liability in Nigerian Scam: Hughes executed a promissory note to satisfy a charge-back liability necessitated by Hughes' participation in a Nigerian scam. Hughes made the first payment on the note, but failed to make any more payments, and the bank that issued the note initiated an action for judicial foreclosure. The District Court granted summary judgment to the bank on the promissory note, and Hughes appealed. The Supreme Court considered Hughes' arguments regarding lack of consideration, menace, and undue influence. Hughes became liable under 30-4-212 for satisfying the entire charge-back debt, so the note did not fail for lack of consideration. Hughes' first quarterly payment comprised a ratification of the contract, so the note did not fail for consent because of menace. Whatever influence the bank employee exerted over Hughes, it did not rise to the level of substituting the employee's will for that of Hughes, nor was there any indication that Hughes was in a mentally or physically weak state or in a confidential relationship with the employee, so the note did not fail for lack of consent as a result of undue influence. Based on the claims made and the facts asserted, summary judgment for the bank was affirmed. Valley Bank of Ronan v. Hughes, 2006 MT 285, 334 M 335, 147 P3d 185 (2006), following Averill Mach. Co. v. Taylor, 70 M 70, 223 P 918 (1924), and Heintz v. Vestal, 185 M 233, 605 P2d 606 (1980).

Validity of Voluntary Easement Affirmed: The Permanns requested that Urick grant an easement across Urick's property for the Permanns to go camping and move cattle, and Urick agreed. When Urick's sons discovered that the voluntary easement had been granted, they persuaded Urick to rescind the easement. Urick requested that the Permanns convey the easement back to her. They refused. Urick filed suit and then subsequently died. Urick's son Gliko, as trustee of Urick's estate, brought an action against the Permanns seeking to have the easement rescinded, citing mutual mistake, constructive fraud, undue influence, and lack of consideration. The District Court held that the easement was valid, and Gliko appealed. The Supreme Court considered each of Gliko's rescission arguments in turn. The language of the easement was simple and unambiguous, so there was no mutual mistake. Urick had testified by deposition that no misleading statements were made relating to the easement, so there was no constructive fraud. There was no confidential relationship between Urick and the Permanns, Urick was not possessed of weakness of mind, and no advantage was taken of Urick's necessities or distress, so there was no undue influence. Last, there was no evidence that consideration was meant to be given, so lack of consideration was not a valid ground for rescission. The District Court was affirmed. Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006).

No Requirement That All Five Statutory Criteria Be Proved to Show Undue Influence — Return to Discretionary Standard and Line of Cases Requiring That All Criteria Must Be Satisfied Overruled: This section sets forth the statutory definition of undue influence. In 1965, in In re Maricich, 145 M 146, 400 P2d 873 (1965), the Supreme Court set forth five criteria as factors that a court may consider in determining a question of undue influence: (1) any confidential relationship between the person alleged to be exercising undue influence and the donor; (2) the physical condition of the donor as it may affect the donor's ability to withstand influence; (3) the mental condition of the donor as it may affect the donor's ability to withstand influence; (4) the unnaturalness of the disposition as it relates to showing an unbalanced mind or a mind easily susceptible to undue influence; and (5) demands and importunities as they may affect the donor, taking into account the time, place, and surrounding circumstances. The court continued this discretionary approach in Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978). Then, beginning with In re Estate of Aageson, 217 M 78, 702 P2d 338 (1985), the court strayed from that approach and held that a court must consider the five criteria and set a standard for their consideration in which a proponent of an undue influence theory must satisfy each of the statutory criteria. In the present case, the Supreme Court was asked to consider whether the District Court incorrectly determined that a person's status as a beneficiary was the result of undue influence. The District Court found all five factors to be present, but the presence of four of the five factors was challenged on appeal. The court noted that the standard requiring a finding of all five statutory criteria was not supported by any authority and did not square with the alternative statutory definitions of undue influence in this section. Therefore, the court returned to the Cameron standard and overruled subsequent cases holding to the contrary, stating that a court may consider the five criteria in determining the existence of undue influence but that the five criteria need not all be proved to show undue influence in any given case. The statutory requirements control, and the five criteria are simply nonexclusive considerations available to guide the District Court in its application of the requirements. In the present case, the District Court correctly determined that each of the criterion for establishing a claim of undue influence had been established. In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001), overruling Christensen v. Britton, 240 M 393, 784 P2d 908 (1989), In re Estate of Luger, 244 M 301, 797 P2d 229 (1990), Taylor v. Koslosky, 249 M 215, 814 P2d 985 (1991), In re Estate of Jochems, 252 M 24, 826 P2d 534 (1992), Flikkema v. Kimm, 255 M 34, 839 P2d 1239 (1992), In re Estate of Lien, 270 M 295, 892 P2d 530 (1995), In re Estate of DeCock, 278 M 437, 925 P2d 488 (1996), In re Estate of Lande, 1999 MT 162, 295 M 160, 983 P2d 308 (1999), and Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377 (2000), and followed in In re Estate of Wittman, 2001 MT 109, 305 M 290, 27 P3d 35 (2001), Pense v. Lindsey, 2003 MT 182, 316 M 429, 73 P3d 168 (2003), and In re Estate of Harms, 2006 MT 320, 335 M 66, 149 P3d 557 (2006).

Inappropriate Control, Advanced Age of Donor, and Unnatural Disposition of Donor's Property as Sufficient Evidence of Undue Influence: Mowrer, a 104-year-old woman, was physically weak when the Eddies arrived at her home in Kansas, moved into her home, immediately secured several hundred thousand dollars of her money, and then moved her to Montana away from family and long-time friends, keeping her isolated in their home even though she was mentally competent. In determining whether Mowrer had exercised free will in transferring property to the Eddies, consideration was given to the nature of the relationship between the parties, Mowrer's susceptibility to undue influence, and the reasonableness of the transfers in light of existing circumstances. In this case, the evidence supported the determination that: (1) Mowrer was under the Eddies' absolute and inappropriate control; (2) Mowrer was susceptible to undue influence because of advanced age and physical infirmity; and (3) the Eddies took advantage of Mowrer's weakness and their control over her to secure an unnatural disposition of essentially all her property to them. The gift was the result of fraud, duress, or undue influence and was properly set aside. In re Guardianship of Mowrer, 1999 MT 73, 294 M 35, 979 P2d 156, 56 St. Rep. 300 (1999).

Leaving Bulk of Estate to One Child Not of Itself an Unnatural Disposition: Shodin brought an action to block having her mother's will admitted to probate, alleging that the will was a product of undue influence asserted by her sister over their mother. The Supreme Court held that the fact that a parent leaves the majority of assets to just one child is not, by itself, evidence that the transfer was an unnatural disposition. In re Estate of Tipp, 281 M 120, 933 P2d 182, 54 St. Rep. 90 (1997), following In re Estate of Lien, 270 M 295, 892 P2d 530 (1995).

Charitable Immunity Rejected: Montana has never adopted the doctrine of charitable immunity, and the District Court properly declined to allow the defense in a church member's action against a church for breach of fiduciary duty. Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640, 50 St. Rep. 535 (1993).

Fiduciary Duty Between Church and Member: In an action by a church member injured during a fall on church property, the existence of a fiduciary duty depended upon the satisfactory proof of a special relationship. The lower court's finding of existence of the duty was not appropriate for determination on a summary judgment motion, but the lower court properly refused the church summary judgment on the member's claim that the church breached its fiduciary duty. Whether the duty existed, whether the member's reliance on the duty was reasonable, and whether her reliance on the duty could be justified after a certain point in time could not be resolved by summary judgment. The member contended that the church plays a major role in all aspects of a member's life, that member had contributed over $75,000 to the church over a 10-year span and had contributed much time and effort to the church, and that the church provides a member with an extended family and a vast network of support for all financial and other problems. Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640, 50 St. Rep. 535 (1993), overruled, to the extent that the issue of whether a fiduciary duty or a special relationship exists between two parties is a question of law, not fact, in Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006).

Suit for Breach of Fiduciary Duty After Suing for Negligence — Res Judicata: A church member who successfully sued in a negligence action for damages resulting from a fall on church property later sued for breach of fiduciary duty, claiming physical and mental pain and suffering arising from the breach. Recovery for emotional distress on a breach of fiduciary duty claim must be supported by tortious conduct that results in a substantial invasion of a legally protected interest and causes a significant impact upon the plaintiff. The suffering alleged in this action is alleged to have arisen from defendants' conduct after the injury and is not related to the suffering from the injury itself. Damages for invasion of a legally protected interest were not barred by res judicata. Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640, 50 St. Rep. 535 (1993), overruled, to the extent that the issue of whether a fiduciary duty or a special relationship exists between two parties is a question of law, not fact, in Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006).

Termination Agreement — No Undue Influence or Economic Duress: Employee who signed an employment termination agreement contended that his wife's illness created emotional distress and increased financial demands, enhanced his need to remain in the community, increased his demand on the company group health insurance plan, and enhanced the need to avoid further stress on his family, all of which imposed undue influence on him to sign the agreement. The undue influence claim necessarily included an argument of economic duress. After considering the facts, including claimant's voluntary signing of the agreement by his free will and after reading and understanding the terms of the agreement, his claims were insufficient to meet the tests of undue influence or economic duress. Somersille v. Columbia Falls Aluminum Co., 255 M 101, 841 P2d 483, 49 St. Rep. 904 (1992), following Horgan v. Indus. Design Corp., 657 P2d 751 (Utah 1982), and Hoven v. First Bank (N.A.)-Billings, 244 M 229, 797 P2d 915 (1990).

Contested Trust — Summary Judgment Appropriate: Summary judgment in a case contesting a trust agreement was proper when Taylor failed to demonstrate a material fact issue regarding the naturalness of the disposition. Mere allegation that because her brother was acting as the decedent's fiduciary and that because of alleged animosity between her and her brother, he exercised undue influence over the decedent to have her left out of the will was insufficient to meet her burden of showing disputed material facts regarding whether the disposition was unnatural. Taylor v. Koslosky, 249 M 215, 814 P2d 985, 48 St. Rep. 649 (1991), followed in In re Estate of Eggebrecht, 1998 MT 249, 291 M 174, 967 P2d 388, 55 St. Rep. 1028 (1998), and overruled, to the extent that a court is not required to but may consider the criteria in Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), in determining the existence of undue influence, but the five criteria need not all be proved to show undue influence in any given case, in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001).

Undue Influence Not Contingent Upon Showing of Incompetence: The lower court found that an elderly man's giving of all his personal and real property to the defendants was fair and regular because the man was competent. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case, directing the lower court to determine the amount of damages the man's estate was entitled to recover. The court held that although the evidence indicated that the man was competent and knew what he was doing, his competence had nothing to do with the issue of undue influence. The court ruled that there was overwhelming evidence of undue influence and that the lower court had abused its discretion in not finding for the plaintiff. Christensen v. Britton, 240 M 393, 784 P2d 908, 46 St. Rep. 2223 (1989).

Economic Duress Not Established: Economic duress is not established merely by proof that consent was secured by the pressure of financial circumstances or by the fact that one party insisted upon a legal right and the other party yielded to such insistence. Where plaintiffs were forced to continue to refinance because of inability to pay their loans and consequent threat of bank foreclosure, there is no "economic duress" that will void the loan contract. Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, Inc., 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988).

No Question of Fiduciary Duty When Judgment Based Only on Good Faith and Fair Dealing: Appellant argued that District Court prejudiced its interests by improperly instructing the jury that, as franchisor, appellant owed a fiduciary duty to respondents as franchisees. The Supreme Court noted that a franchise relationship is inherently a business relationship rather than a fiduciary relationship. However, the questioned jury instruction was found to be primarily definitional; therefore, the Supreme Court found it unnecessary to rule on whether the special facts of the case gave rise to a fiduciary duty since the District Court only held appellant to the responsibility of acting in good faith and fair dealing with respondents. Dunfee v. Baskin-Robbins, Inc., 221 M 447, 720 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 964 (1986).

No Undue Influence When Implications Based on Opinions: A plaintiff's opinions alone do not provide a sufficient basis in fact to prove undue influence when there is no evidence of abuse of confidence or of grossly oppressive or unfair advantage. Westlake v. Osborne, 220 M 91, 713 P2d 548, 43 St. Rep. 200 (1986).

Undue Influence on Testator Making Will: Undue influence was present when testator made 1980 wills at urging of three of his four children when at time of making the wills testator was 91 years old, confined to a rest home, hard of hearing, and suffering from a brain disorder, and the wills disinherited the fourth child, whose interests testator's actions since 1948 had been directed toward protecting. The Supreme Court held there was substantial credible evidence to support the District Court's determination that there was undue influence and dismissal of petition for probate of the 1980 wills. In re Estate of Aageson, 217 M 78, 702 P2d 338, 42 St. Rep. 1038 (1985).

Incompetence and Undue Influence Never Presumed — Presumption of More Satisfactory Evidence Not Error: Although incompetence or undue influence is never presumed and it is clearly the burden of the plaintiff to prove such matters, when the defendant failed to engage in the usual practice of calling upon doctors and nurses from the confining hospital to clearly show mental capacity at the time the instrument was signed, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the presumption in 26-1-602 that provides that more satisfactory evidence would be adverse if weaker and less satisfactory evidence is offered and it is within the pertinent party's power to produce more satisfactory evidence. That presumption relates only to the type and lack of evidence of the defendant, not to the plaintiff's burden of proof. Adams v. Allen, 209 M 149, 679 P2d 1232, 41 St. Rep. 610 (1984).

Will Versus Deed — Test for Undue Influence Different: Plaintiff obtained a power of attorney from his sick and elderly aunt and then brought her to Montana to live with him. The aunt later executed a new will leaving her estate to the plaintiff and deeded a ranch to plaintiff. It was alleged that plaintiff exercised undue influence over his aunt in the execution of the deed, the will, and the power of attorney. The court employed 28-2-407 in concluding that plaintiff had exercised undue influence in the execution of the deed. A different test is employed when establishing undue influence in the execution of a will. A will may not be defeated on grounds of undue influence unless the testator is induced to execute an instrument which is in form and appearance his will but in reality expresses testamentary dispositions which he would not have voluntarily made. In this case the will was drafted by the lawyer the testator had used for many years, and there is no evidence that plaintiff participated in the preparation of the will or that he dictated the will's terms. The will should therefore not have been set aside. Dybvik v. Dybvik, 201 M 389, 654 P2d 989, 39 St. Rep. 2184 (1982).

Voidance of Quitclaim Deeds Properly Denied — Family Relationship Not Found as Basis for Undue Influence: The plaintiff, son of a deceased rancher, received 24½% of the surface rights to his father's ranch in accordance with the terms of an estate plan established for the benefit of the plaintiff and his brothers, the defendants. Upon leaving the ranch, plaintiff executed one quitclaim deed to his mineral interest in 1977 and one quitclaim deed to his surface interest in 1968 in exchange for a promise that the defendants would hold him harmless on a promissory note. The District Court did not err (in a subsequent challenge by the plaintiff to the validity of the quitclaim deeds) in declaring both deeds to be valid and denying the plaintiff any interest in the ranch. The District Court found that the facts of the case did not satisfy the stated statutory requisites, and the Supreme Court will not substitute its judgment for the judgment of the trial court. Turley v. Turley, 199 M 265, 649 P2d 434, 39 St. Rep. 1336 (1982).

Threat to Withdraw as Legal Counsel: Undue influence was not present when attorney, long after initiation of attorney-client relationship but only minutes before he was to defend client on criminal charges, threatened to withdraw as counsel unless client executed security agreement and quitclaim deed as security for attorney's fee. The security arrangement was fair and equitable. The per hour charge for attorney's services was established by earlier agreement; papers executed on day of trial simply established method of payment. Matthews v. Berryman, 196 M 49, 637 P2d 822, 38 St. Rep. 2112 (1981).

Promissory Note — Undue Influence in Making: A promissory note was executed to appellant by the deceased, with whom he had a close confidential relationship. The decedent's age caused her to rely quite heavily on appellant in running her farm and made her more susceptible to his influence. The amount of the note was also quite large in relation to the alleged consideration. Under the five-factor test enumerated in Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), there was substantial evidence to support a finding of undue influence in the creation of the note. Heintz v. Vestal, 185 M 233, 605 P2d 606 (1980).

Elements Constituting Undue Influence: In determining the issue of undue influence, the court may consider the confidential relationship of the person attempting to influence the donor, the physical and mental conditions of the donor as they affect his ability to withstand the influence, the unnaturalness of the disposition as it relates to showing an unbalanced mind or a mind easily susceptible to undue influence, and demands and importunities as they may affect the particular donor, taking into consideration the time, place, and all surrounding circumstances. Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), followed in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001), and In re Estate of Wittman, 2001 MT 109, 305 M 290, 27 P3d 35 (2001). Christensen was followed in Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000). Christensen, Estate of Luger, Estate of Jochems, Flikkema, Estate of DeCock, and Estate of Lande, as well as Taylor v. Koslosky, 249 M 215, 814 P2d 985 (1991), In re Estate of Lien, 270 M 295, 892 P2d 530 (1995), and Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377 (2000), were overruled, to the extent that a court is not required to but may consider the five criteria in Cameron v. Cameron, 179 M 219, 587 P2d 939 (1978), in determining the existence of undue influence, but the five criteria need not all be proved to show undue influence in any given case, in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001).

Testimony of Attorney: Although testatrix was 85 and had infirmities associated with old age at the time her will was executed, testimony of her attorney, that due to her age and failing eyesight and her desire to make unequal distribution of her property he had made a special effort to assure himself of her competence before preparing her will and deeds, was sufficient to overcome allegations of contestants. Blackmer v. Blackmer, 165 M 69, 525 P2d 559 (1974).

Failure to Read Instrument Carefully: Where plaintiff's principal reason for wishing to rescind mineral deed was her mistaken belief that she had granted a royalty interest, evidence that plaintiff was astute in negotiations and that consideration for the deed was fair and adequate but that plaintiff failed to read carefully the instrument she signed did not establish undue influence under this section. Clough v. Jackson, 156 M 272, 479 P2d 266 (1971).

Burden of Proof:

In cases involving undue influence, contestant has the burden of proof and must produce substantial evidence to prove undue influence. In re Maricich's Estate, 145 M 146, 400 P2d 873 (1965).

The burden of proving undue influence upon testator in making his will is upon the contestant, and in order to establish it as a fact it must be shown by proof that it was exercised upon the mind of the testator directly to procure its execution. Mere suspicion that by reason of the close relation between the testator and the beneficiary the latter may have had opportunity to ingratiate himself in the former's favor and thus exercise influence over him is insufficient. Hale v. Smith, 73 M 481, 237 P 214 (1925).

Sufficiency of Evidence to Support Undue Influence:

Facts that beneficiary under a second will was never close to his alleged godfather until discovery that latter had bank account, the poor physical condition of the testator, the unnaturalness of the disposition, and importunities made upon the testator by telling him his friends were going to put him in an insane asylum constituted substantial evidence to support a verdict setting aside second will. In re Maricich's Estate, 145 M 146, 400 P2d 873 (1965).

Evidence in an action to set aside a will on the ground of undue influence alleged to have been exercised by a testator's niece, who was made the principal beneficiary under the will, who for the last 9 years of the life of deceased had cared for him, and whom he had treated as his own daughter showed an entire absence of proof of undue influence and therefore was insufficient to warrant its setting aside on that ground. Hale v. Smith, 73 M 481, 237 P 214 (1925).

Facts Tending to Prove or Disprove Undue Influence:

Facts to be considered in proving whether undue influence was exercised are: confidential relationship of person attempting to influence testator, the testator's physical and mental condition, unnaturalness of the disposition, and the demands and importunities as they affected testator. In re Maricich's Estate, 145 M 146, 400 P2d 873 (1965), followed in In re Estate of Hogan, 218 M 428, 708 P2d 1018, 42 St. Rep. 1711 (1985), In re Estate of Lien, 270 M 295, 892 P2d 530, 52 St. Rep. 190 (1995), In re Estate of Eggebrecht, 1998 MT 249, 291 M 174, 967 P2d 388, 55 St. Rep. 1028 (1998), In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001), and In re Estate of Wittman, 2001 MT 109, 305 M 290, 27 P3d 35 (2001). Estate of Lien was distinguished in In re Estate of Lande, 1999 MT 162, 295 M 160, 983 P2d 308, 56 St. Rep. 642 (1999), and Estate of Lien and Estate of Lande were overruled, to the extent that a court is not required to but may consider the criteria in determining the existence of undue influence, but the five criteria need not all be proved to show undue influence in any given case, in In re Estate of Bradshaw, 2001 MT 92, 305 M 178, 24 P3d 211 (2001). See also Pense v. Lindsey, 2003 MT 182, 316 M 429, 73 P3d 168 (2003).

One influenced by love and affection and gratitude for services performed is not acting under undue influence. In re Maricich's Estate, 145 M 146, 400 P2d 873 (1965).

Where no fiduciary relations existed between mortgagor and mortgagee and they dealt at arm's length, each being represented by counsel when the mortgage was executed, there was no undue influence exerted toward securing its execution, within the meaning of subsection (1) of this section, defining "undue influence" as abuse of a confidence or authority reposed in one for the purpose of obtaining an unfair advantage over another. Pederson v. Thoeny, 88 M 569, 295 P 250 (1930).

Undue influence sufficient to invalidate a will must be such as to control the mental operations of the testator, overcome his power of resistance, and thus cause him to adopt the will of another in the disposition of his property which he would not have made if left freely to act in accordance with his own pleasure. Hale v. Smith, 73 M 481, 237 P 214 (1925).

Relationship of the Parties:

In a will contest where the jury found undue influence, trial judge did not abuse discretion in granting proponents a new trial on the question of influence that the jury found to exist with respect to proponents' mother where the will was executed without the knowledge of the beneficiaries, it was drafted by an attorney chosen by the testatrix, and testatrix did not change the will for 20 months before her death. In re Cocanougher's Estate, 141 M 16, 375 P2d 1009 (1962).

To meet the requirement of this definition, the one party to the negotiations must occupy a superior position with reference to the other by reason of a real or apparent authority he holds over him, arising out of preexisting relations, or assumes at the time because of the weakness of mind or distress or necessities of the other, by reason of which he knowingly gains an advantage, which in contemplation of law is unconscionable. Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co. v. Anderson, 58 M 617, 194 P 160 (1920).

Sufficiency of Pleading: Answer in an action on a promissory note stating facts that defendant was afflicted with a diseased and resultant weak mind, that he reposed special confidence in plaintiff (his brother), and that the latter, taking advantage of this confidence, unduly influenced defendant to make the note was sufficient to constitute a plea of undue influence under this section. Stagg v. Stagg, 96 M 573, 32 P2d 856 (1934).

Demands and Importunities May Amount to Undue Influence: Demands and importunities may amount to undue influence, without being coupled with fraud, threats, or misrepresentation; whether they do or not depends upon what they were, how persistently and under what circumstances they were employed, and whether the mind of the testator was so infirm as to be overpowered by them. Murphy v. Nett, 47 M 38, 130 P 451 (1913).

Theory: The theory underlying the doctrine of undue influence is that the testator is induced, by the means employed, to execute an instrument in form and appearance his will but in reality expressing testamentary dispositions which he would not have voluntarily made. Murphy v. Nett, 47 M 38, 130 P 451 (1913).

Sufficient Evidence for Rescission of Workers' Compensation Settlement Agreement Based on Mutual Mistake of Material Fact Not Discovered Until After Settlement: Gamble was injured on the job, the parties entered a settlement agreement, and the employer began paying benefits based on a medical diagnosis, yet Gamble's condition worsened. Finally, Gamble went to a specialist who ran additional tests and discovered that Gamble had suffered an odontoid fracture of the spine that was consistent with the job injury but that had been unnoticed at the time of the settlement. Gamble's request for additional medical benefits was denied by the employer because payment for the fracture was not part of the settlement. The Workers' Compensation Court held that the fracture was compensable, and the employer appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. If Gamble's fracture existed at the time of settlement, the parties were mutually mistaken regarding the material fact concerning the nature of Gamble's injury, requiring that the agreement be rescinded. The Supreme Court reviewed the findings and found that substantial credible evidence supported the facts that: (1) the fracture was consistent with and caused by the on-the-job injury; (2) Gamble's symptoms were consistent with the injury; (3) there was a basis for ruling out other potential causes of injury; and (4) there was an explanation as to why the injury was not diagnosed at the time of settlement. Because the mutual mistake of fact existed, the settlement agreement was properly rescinded. Gamble v. Sears, 2007 MT 131, 337 M 354, 160 P3d 537 (2007).

Contract Based Upon Mutual Mistake as to Workers' Compensation Law on Subrogation Rights of Insurer: Brown entered into a settlement agreement with the State Fund for $52,329.17, less $18,666.67 characterized as the "subrogation due the State Fund". Brown then pursued a third-party claim and settled for less than the policy limits. After the Supreme Court's decision in Zacher v. Am. Ins. Co., 243 M 226, 794 P2d 335 (1990), holding that an insurer is not entitled to subrogation unless the claimant is fully compensated for the injury, Brown sued to recover the money withheld by the State Fund. The Supreme Court held that Brown was entitled to rescind the agreement because the parties had made a mutual mistake as to state law that pertains to subrogation rights. However, the Supreme Court refused to award Brown the money retained by the State Fund on the basis that the whole agreement was void and that the lower court would have to determine the amount of money that Brown was entitled to receive. Brown v. Richard A. Murphy, Inc., 261 M 275, 862 P2d 406, 50 St. Rep. 1330 (1993).

Authority of Workers' Compensation Court to Reopen Final Compromise Settlement Agreement Based on Mutual Mistake: Settlement agreements for workers' compensation benefits, like other agreements, are subject to the law of contracts. A Montana court that is not otherwise limited by statute, including the Workers' Compensation Court, has the authority to set those contracts aside based upon a mutual mistake regarding the nature and extent of a claimant's injuries even when express language in the settlement agreement purports to prohibit setting the agreement aside. Wolfe v. Webb, 251 M 217, 824 P2d 240, 49 St. Rep. 1 (1992), distinguishing Bowen v. Anaconda Co., 220 M 185, 714 P2d 142 (1986), and Hutchinson v. Pierce Packing Co., 219 M 18, 710 P2d 64 (1985), and followed in Gamble v. Sears, 2007 MT 131, 337 M 354, 160 P3d 537 (2007).

Workers' Compensation Settlement — Lack of Foresight of Future Symptoms Not Basis for Rescission: Claimant entered a final settlement agreement on September 8, 1981, and on December 27, 1982, petitioned the Workers' Compensation Court for rescission of the agreement. The District Court rescinded the agreement and awarded permanent total disability benefits on the ground of mistake. The Supreme Court reversed and stated that a mistake justifying rescission must be a mistake made in unconscious ignorance of a past or present fact and that because speculation as to later symptoms is a conscious ignorance of future fact, an error of foresight cannot justify a finding of rescission for mistake. The Supreme Court found claimant's reported symptoms were not credible evidence of past or present disability or a change in disability and distinguished Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), in which medical evidence became available later as to true extent of injury at time of settlement. Supreme Court also held that claimant did not suffer economic duress in freely accepting offer of settlement. Claimant must rely on statutory scheme of award modification despite fact that he entered into settlement only months before Supreme Court ruling making tender of value of an undisputed impairment rating mandatory. Claimant could not claim detrimental reliance on "good cause" clause in agreement when agreement was a standard form prepared by the Workers' Compensation Division and not the insurer. When there was no medical evidence in record that claimant's disability had changed, the Workers' Compensation Court was statutorily without power to reopen the settlement. Veterans' Administration (federal veterans') disability ratings are irrelevant under Montana workers' compensation laws. Hutchinson v. Pierce Packing Co., 219 M 18, 710 P2d 64, 42 St. Rep. 1810 (1985).

28-2-409. What constitutes mistake of fact.

Case Notes

No Posttrial Relief Based on Surprise or Mistake of Fact — Surprise Issue Not Preserved for Appeal — District Court Considered Best Available Information at Time of Trial: The uninsured employers' fund (UEF) breached a contract and the District Court awarded consequential damages to the prevailing party. Subsequently, UEF moved for posttrial relief on two grounds. First, UEF claimed the District Court should have set aside the judgment due to surprise because consequential damages were not sought in the complaint. Second, UEF claimed the District Court should have set aside the judgment based on a mistake of fact because the party that was awarded damages continued to keep a franchise despite a finding by the District Court that the franchise would be terminated. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that UEF did not preserve the surprise defense based on a failure to object at trial and that the District Court did not make a mistake of fact since it relied on the best available information regarding the franchise at the time of trial. Elk Mtn. Motor Sports, Inc. v. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2012 MT 261, 367 Mont. 36, 289 P.3d 165.

Incorrect Burden of Proof Imposed — Possibility of Reliance on Misdiagnosis Sufficient for Reversal and Remand: After suffering a workplace injury, Keller saw numerous health care providers in attempting to gain a correct diagnosis of her back pain. At least one of those providers raised the possibility of long thoracic nerve injury and scapular winging, although most of the providers diagnosed Keller's condition as occurring from another cause. Keller settled her case based upon the latter diagnoses but continued to see health care providers until several concluded that her pain was caused by long thoracic nerve injury. Keller attempted to open up the settlement agreements based upon mutual mistake but the Workers' Compensation Court refused, holding that Keller must show that the insurer had no knowledge that long thoracic nerve injury or scapular winging might be the cause of her pain. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that the Workers' Compensation Court imposed an incorrect burden of proof. Citing Weldele v. Medley Dev., 227 Mont. 257, 738 P.2d 1281 (1987), the Supreme Court held that since the evidence showed it was possible that the parties relied upon a misdiagnosis in settling the case, even though they knew of the existence of the possibility of different sources of Keller's pain, the imposition of the stricter burden of proof was sufficient error for remanding the case to the lower court because of a mistake of fact. Keller v. Liberty NW., Inc., 2010 MT 279, 358 Mont. 448, 246 P.3d 434.

Error in Rescinding Workers' Compensation Settlement Agreement Based on Mutual Mistake of Fact: In 2004, some 16 years after Kruzich suffered a traumatic brain injury in an industrial accident, Kruzich began developing signs of Parkinson's disease, which was determined was likely a result of the brain injury. Kruzich had entered a settlement agreement with the insurer in 1994 that expressly closed all present and future domiciliary care benefits while reserving medical and hospital benefits. When Parkinson's disease developed, Kruzich petitioned the Workers' Compensation Court to rescind the settlement agreement and reopen the claim, which the court did, on grounds that a material mutual mistake of fact had occurred regarding the nature of Kruzich's injuries. The insurer appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. Under contract law, parties make a mutual mistake of fact only if they are unconsciously ignorant or forgetful of a fact that existed prior to or at the time of settlement, but ignorance of a future event does not constitute a mistake of fact. In this case, there was no evidence that at the time that the settlement agreement was executed, Kruzich suffered an injury of Parkinson's disease or that Kruzich would develop the disease 16 years later. The parties could not have been mutually mistaken about a fact that did not exist prior to or at the time of settlement, so the Workers' Compensation Court erred in reopening Kruzich's case based on mutual mistake of fact. Kruzich v. Old Republic Ins. Co., 2008 MT 205, 344 M 126, 188 P3d 983 (2008).

Validity of Voluntary Easement Affirmed: The Permanns requested that Urick grant an easement across Urick's property for the Permanns to go camping and move cattle, and Urick agreed. When Urick's sons discovered that the voluntary easement had been granted, they persuaded Urick to rescind the easement. Urick requested that the Permanns convey the easement back to her. They refused. Urick filed suit and then subsequently died. Urick's son Gliko, as trustee of Urick's estate, brought an action against the Permanns seeking to have the easement rescinded, citing mutual mistake, constructive fraud, undue influence, and lack of consideration. The District Court held that the easement was valid, and Gliko appealed. The Supreme Court considered each of Gliko's rescission arguments in turn. The language of the easement was simple and unambiguous, so there was no mutual mistake. Urick had testified by deposition that no misleading statements were made relating to the easement, so there was no constructive fraud. There was no confidential relationship between Urick and the Permanns, Urick was not possessed of weakness of mind, and no advantage was taken of Urick's necessities or distress, so there was no undue influence. Last, there was no evidence that consideration was meant to be given, so lack of consideration was not a valid ground for rescission. The District Court was affirmed. Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006).

Public Contracts Subject to Fundamental Contract Analysis — Public Bidding and Contract Modification Statutes Not Inherently Inconsistent: Public contracts are not necessarily exempt from fundamental contract analysis because competitive bidding statutes were established for the benefit of the public rather than to establish the rights of bidders. Nothing in the competitive bidding statutes places public contracts out of reach of remedies at law or the equitable relief provided under 28-2-1611 if a party is otherwise qualified for relief under the terms of the statute. Further, public bidding statutes and contract modification statutes are not inherently inconsistent, so 28-2-1611 may be applied to public contracts. E.H. Oftedal & Sons, Inc. v. St., 2002 MT 1, 308 M 50, 40 P3d 349 (2002).

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977), and Mont. Defaulting Buyer Under Unambiguous Written Contract Cannot Rely Upon Expectations Not Covered by Contract to Avoid Contract — Disposition of Downpayment Amounts Paid and Due — County Not Liable for Negligent Misrepresentation as to Recordability of Deeds and Seller's Title Insurer Not Liable for Loss in Marketability: Documents for the sale and purchase of two sections of land unambiguously showed, and it was undisputed, that the resale of 20-acre parcels by the buyer, the immediate acceptance by the county of 20-acre resale deeds of a type that would make subdivision review unnecessary, and the ability to resell without having to undergo subdivision review were not parts of the bargain. The parties knew that these things were contemplated, but the documents did not refer to them or make them a part of the contract. Before the contract was made, the county indicated that it would accept the 20-acre resale deeds. The deal fell through when the county changed its position after the contract was signed. The buyer failed to pay the whole downpayment, and the seller terminated the contract and kept the paid portion of the downpayment. Precontract discussions on the matter must be disregarded as parol evidence because the documents were unambiguous and did not refer to the matter. The buyer was not entitled to rescind the contract and have the paid portion of the downpayment returned based on mutual mistake or failure of consideration. There was no mutual mistake because the parties knew that it was not a certainty that the county would accept the deeds. There was no failure of consideration because the resale, county acceptance of the deeds, and avoidance of subdivision review were not part of the written contract. In addition, the need for a subdivision review would not make the land unmarketable; at most, its market value decreased and it would take longer to sell it. Furthermore, a party in default is not entitled to rescission. The seller was entitled to terminate the contract. The seller was also entitled to keep an amount of the paid portion of the downpayment equal to the amount by which the contract price for the land exceeded the market value of the land at the time of the breach. The seller was not entitled to keep the remainder of the paid portion of the downpayment or to a judgment for the unpaid portion of the downpayment because the contract did not provide for that remedy. The county was not liable in tort to the seller for negligent misrepresentation, and the buyer's title insurance company was not liable to the seller for the loss in the marketability of the land caused by the need for subdivision review. Yellowstone II Dev. Group, Inc. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 2001 MT 41, 304 M 223, 20 P3d 755

(2001), overruled in Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), to the extent that Yellowstone II held that the determination of whether a term in a contract is ambiguous is not a question involving parol evidence.

Authority of Workers' Compensation Court to Reopen Final Compromise Settlement Agreement Based on Mutual Mistake: Settlement agreements for workers' compensation benefits, like other agreements, are subject to the law of contracts. A Montana court that is not otherwise limited by statute, including the Workers' Compensation Court, has the authority to set those contracts aside based upon a mutual mistake regarding the nature and extent of a claimant's injuries even when express language in the settlement agreement purports to prohibit setting the agreement aside. Wolfe v. Webb, 251 M 217, 824 P2d 240, 49 St. Rep. 1 (1992), distinguishing Bowen v. Anaconda Co., 220 M 185, 714 P2d 142 (1986), and Hutchinson v. Pierce Packing Co., 219 M 18, 710 P2d 64 (1985).

Reopening Workers' Compensation Settlement for Mutual Mistake — Statute of Limitations: Workers' compensation claimant was held to have discovered in October 1986 that back surgery was a possibility when at that time his doctor discussed with claimant the possibility of surgery and advised claimant to consider it. Furthermore, in that month, claimant's attorney for a social security disability claim notified the administrative law judge of the doctor's conclusion, and the judge's decision in claimant's favor was based in part on a possibility of surgery. Therefore, the 2-year statute of limitations for a claim based on mutual mistake (assuming that there was one) expired in October 1988 because a full and final compromise settlement approved by the Workers' Compensation Court was made without knowledge that surgery might well be necessary. The claim was barred because claimant's petition to reopen the compromise settlement was filed in July 1990. Rath v. St. Labre Indian School, 249 M 433, 816 P2d 1061, 48 St. Rep. 758 (1991).

No Mutual Mistake in Workers' Compensation Settlement: Claimant sought to have his workers' compensation settlement reopened on grounds of mutual mistake. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's denial of the request after finding: (1) claimant was capable of understanding the terms of the settlement agreement; (2) although claimant may have experienced an increased level of pain, there was no evidence to indicate the parties were mutually mistaken about the condition of claimant's back at the time of settlement; (3) there was no evidence to link claimant's personality disorder to his back injury; and (4) the claim was barred by the statute of limitations. Whitcher v. Pac. Employers Ins. Co., 236 M 289, 769 P2d 1215, 46 St. Rep. 367 (1989). See also Giles v. Bozeman Pub. Schools, 257 M 289, 849 P2d 180, 50 St. Rep. 273 (1993).

Ignorance of Contract Contents Not Grounds for Relief From Liability: One who executes a written contract is presumed to know its contents and to assent to them. Ignorance of the contents is not grounds for relief from liability. Johnson v. Estate of Shelton, 232 M 85, 754 P2d 828, 45 St. Rep. 887 (1988), citing Quinn v. Briggs, 172 M 468, 565 P2d 297 (1977).

No Mistake as to Subdivisibility of Land: Buyer breached a buy-sell agreement, claiming there was a mutual mistake of fact as to the subdivisibility of certain real property covered by the contract. The court found there was not mistake of fact because the buyer has not proven the land cannot be subdivided. The buyer was an experienced businessman who was aware of certain obstacles to subdividing the land when he executed the buy-sell agreement. He was under a duty to execute the agreement with the prudence and care of a reasonable, cautious businessman. Hillstrom v. O'Neil, 226 M 452, 736 P2d 126, 44 St. Rep. 795 (1987).

Mutual Mistake Regarding Zoning Ordinance — Rescission Proper: When both parties believed, at the time a contract for deed was executed, that a business was in compliance with a zoning ordinance but the business was later found not to comply, it constituted a mutual mistake of fact under 28-2-409 and rescission was therefore proper under 28-2-1711. Carey v. Wallner, 223 M 260, 725 P2d 557, 43 St. Rep. 1706 (1986), affirmed, 229 M 57, 744 P2d 881, 44 St. Rep. 1778 (1987), and followed in Mitchell v. Boyer, 237 M 434, 774 P2d 384, 46 St. Rep. 928 (1989).

Res Judicata Inapplicable — Issues Not Same: Plaintiff suffered a back injury in October 1980, underwent surgery, and was judged to have reached a stationary state. Plaintiff was given an impairment rating of 25% and in August 1981 entered a final settlement for 125 weeks of permanent and partial disability benefits. In June 1981, while employed by a different employer, plaintiff experienced a sexual incident which she characterized as a sexual assault. In September 1981, while employed by a third employer, plaintiff suffered an industrial accident. In March 1984, the Workers' Compensation Court determined that the sexual incident did not constitute a compensable injury and that plaintiff as of that date was entitled to temporary total disability benefits by reason of the September 1981 injury. The benefits were to continue until the disability ceased. In October 1984, plaintiff sought to have the settlement entered in August 1981 set aside, claiming mutual mistake of fact. The Workers' Compensation Court held that its March 1984 decision barred this issue as res judicata. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the issues were not identical so that res judicata was inapplicable. In the first case, the question was basically one of amount. In the second case, the question went to the validity of the settlement itself. The mistake plaintiff alleged was her total disability by reason of the second industrial accident. No ruling in the first case addressed whether the settlement had to be reopened in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Holton v. F.H. Stoltze Land & Lumber Co., 195 M 263, 637 P2d 10, 38 St. Rep. 1835 (1981). The court also noted that the question of mutual mistake of fact could not have been raised in the first case. The case was reversed and remanded with directions to hear the petition on its merits. Phelan v. St. Paul Mercury Ins. Co. 220 M 296, 716 P2d 601, 43 St. Rep. 381 (1986).

Workers' Compensation Settlement — Lack of Foresight of Future Symptoms Not Basis for Rescission: Claimant entered a final settlement agreement on September 8, 1981, and on December 27, 1982, petitioned the Workers' Compensation Court for rescission of the agreement. The District Court rescinded the agreement and awarded permanent total disability benefits on the ground of mistake. The Supreme Court reversed and stated that a mistake justifying rescission must be a mistake made in unconscious ignorance of a past or present fact and that because speculation as to later symptoms is a conscious ignorance of future fact, an error of foresight cannot justify a finding of rescission for mistake. The Supreme Court found claimant's reported symptoms were not credible evidence of past or present disability or a change in disability and distinguished Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), in which medical evidence became available later as to true extent of injury at time of settlement. Supreme Court also held that claimant did not suffer economic duress in freely accepting offer of settlement. Claimant must rely on statutory scheme of award modification despite fact that he entered into settlement only months before Supreme Court ruling making tender of value of an undisputed impairment rating mandatory. Claimant could not claim detrimental reliance on "good cause" clause in agreement when agreement was a standard form prepared by the Workers' Compensation Division and not the insurer. When there was no medical evidence in record that claimant's disability had changed, the Workers' Compensation Court was statutorily without power to reopen the settlement. Veterans' Administration (federal veterans') disability ratings are irrelevant under Montana workers' compensation laws. Hutchinson v. Pierce Packing Co., 219 M 18, 710 P2d 64, 42 St. Rep. 1810 (1985).

Purchase Money Mortgages — Reformation: The bank prepared a mortgage from the buyer to the sellers and a deed of trust from the buyer to the bank as a service to and at the request of the buyer and the sellers. The bank inadvertently inserted the term "no exceptions" into the mortgage through a typographical error. Upon default of the buyer, the sellers filed an action for declaratory ruling that their purchase money mortgage was prior in time and right to the bank's deed of trust. The trial court reformed the sellers' mortgage to delete the term "no exceptions" and held that the bank's deed of trust was prior in time and right to the mortgage. The Supreme Court affirmed. The bank's mistake, while negligent, did not amount to neglect of a legal duty that would preclude reformation. The mistake was mutual because the mortgage as written did not reflect the mutual intentions of the parties which, the evidence indicated, were for the bank to receive a first mortgage and the sellers to receive a second mortgage. Pulse v. N. Am. Land Title Co. of Mont., 218 M 275, 707 P2d 1105, 42 St. Rep. 1578 (1985).

No Mutual Mistake of Fact — Insurance Compromise Settlement: The Workers' Compensation Court concluded that claimant had testified that his back was in much the same condition in 1982 as it had been on the date of his insurance compromise settlement in 1979. Accordingly, the parties to the settlement were not laboring under a mutual mistake of fact as to the nature and extent of injuries when they entered into a full and final compromise. This case was distinguished from Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), in which it was held that the lack of knowledge that the industrial accident possibly aggravated preexisting cerebral palsy, leading to a worsening condition, was a mutual mistake of fact. The court reiterated in this instant case that 39-71-204 and 39-71-2908 (now repealed) preclude reopening of workers' compensation settlements. Sollie v. Travelers Indem. Co., 212 M 197, 686 P2d 920, 41 St. Rep. 1684 (1984).

Contract Not Voidable for Mistake: A party to a contract who did not read the contract carefully and who did not understand it is bound by the contract nonetheless when there has been no misrepresentation and no ambiguity in the terms of the contract, and where the other party acts in good faith and has no notice of the first party's mistake. Robertson v. Hughes, 204 M 515, 668 P2d 1025, 40 St. Rep. 1041 (1983).

Mutual Mistake to Defeat Object of Contract: Plaintiffs and defendant entered an agreement whereby defendant would lease condominiums from the plaintiffs and would sell plaintiffs her home. The lease of one of the condominiums contained an option for defendant to purchase the unit by forgiving plaintiffs their obligation under the promissory note on the home. Plaintiffs discovered that the floors in the home sloped north at a rate of 5½ inches over 30 feet. Plaintiffs sought to rescind the contract, and defendant sought specific performance. Plaintiffs contended mutual mistake in the making of the contract. The District Court found that the object of the contract was to furnish plaintiffs with a home to live in. This purpose was not frustrated by the unlevel condition, as defendant's family had lived in the house for 10 years. In order for mutual mistake to warrant rescission of a contract, the mistake must be so substantial and fundamental as to defeat the object of the parties in making the contract. Here, the mistake did not affect the object of the parties and rescission did not lie. Woodahl v. Matthews, 196 M 445, 639 P2d 1165, 39 St. Rep. 238 (1982), followed in Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990). See also Halcro v. Moon, 226 M 121, 733 P2d 1305, 44 St. Rep. 504 (1987).

Mutual Mistake — Basis for Rescission: Defendants purchased an irregular tract of land and commenced construction of a commercial building. They were contacted by plaintiff concerning purchase of the building. They consulted an attorney and discussed condominiumizing the building. He suggested as a tax matter that defendant should hold the property long enough to qualify for long-term capital gain treatment. An option to purchase with contract for deed was entered. The deeds and contract were not completed, as a survey was needed for a legal description of the property. The contract contained a provision that defendants provide and pave parking lots north and south of the building. The survey was completed and showed that the building encroached on state and county rights-of-way to the north and south. Plaintiffs then sought to rescind the contract and recover their money. The Supreme Court held that the providing of parking lots was material to the contract and that mutual mistake of fact as to the parking lots was an adequate basis for rescinding the contract. It also held that any findings not made could be implied to support the trial court's decision. Berry v. Romain, 194 M 400, 632 P2d 1127, 38 St. Rep. 1434 (1981).

Reliance on Trustee — Creation of Corporation: Plaintiff's husband and defendant were brothers and partners in a ranching operation, although each owned the land individually. Plaintiff's husband died and defendant was named executor. A corporation was formed to operate the ranch on May 1, 1973. Both parties transferred all assets to the corporation. Defendant's family got 364 more shares than plaintiff, and defendant was named president of the corporation. Restrictions were placed on the valuation and transfer of stock. On May 29, 1975, plaintiff consulted her own attorney and for the first time fully realized her position. All corporate votes became deadlocked. On April 29, 1977, plaintiff filed suit to dissolve the corporation, alleging fraud and oppressive conduct by defendant and mistake at the formation. The court found that defendant occupied a position of trust and confidence in relation to plaintiff. He was executor of her husband's estate and partner to her husband at the date of death; that status imposed on defendant the duties of a trustee. At the time of incorporation, the unequal stock division was not believed to be of any particular legal or practical significance, so that the parties were mistaken as to legal effect. Defendant claimed no mistake could be claimed because plaintiff failed in her duty to fully read the documents before signing. However, the duty was not so much on plaintiff to discover as on defendant as trustee to fully disclose. In view of the fact that no disclosure was made, the mistake under which the parties were acting was evident. Skierka v. Skierka Bros., Inc., 192 M 505, 629 P2d 214, 38 St. Rep. 754 (1981).

Finality of Workers' Compensation Decision — Grounds for Overturning: A full and final compromise settlement agreement between an injured worker and the Workers' Compensation State Fund was set aside because of mutual mistake of material fact by both parties. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), distinguished in Sollie v. Travelers Indem. Co., 212 M 197, 686 P2d 920, 41 St. Rep. 1684 (1984). A petition for rehearing was filed. The Supreme Court reaffirmed the decision. The petitioner argued the Workers' Compensation Court had no power to alter or rescind the agreement 4 years after its execution. The Supreme Court pointed out that it, not the Workers' Compensation Court, set aside the agreement. It noted the scope of its appellate power and also the code provision on lack of consent through mutual mistake of material fact. The Supreme Court was not broadening the possibilities of reopening such settlements; it merely found that no contract existed initially. Kienas v. Peterson, 38 St. Rep. 320 (1981) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports or Pacific 2d Reporter).

Workers' Compensation Settlement — Mutual Mistake: Plaintiff injured his back when he fell in the restaurant where he worked and a rack of dishes fell on him. He submitted his claim to the Workers' Compensation Division but was not represented by an attorney. He was examined by physicians who found him to be 5% disabled. Plaintiff entered into a full and final compromise settlement. Later examinations by physicians showed that plaintiff's fall had aggravated his preexisting cerebral palsy condition. This information was not available to either party at the time the settlement was entered into. Both parties were mistaken as to a fact material to the contract. The court found that the need to fairly compensate the injured worker is the intent and purpose of the Workers' Compensation Act. The full and final compromise settlement was set aside for mutual mistake of a material fact as to the nature and extent of the injury caused by claimant's accident. The case was remanded to the Workers' Compensation Court to determine the extent of claimant's disability. Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1, 37 St. Rep. 1747 (1980), followed in Kimes v. Pac. Employers Ins. Co., 233 M 175, 759 P2d 986, 45 St. Rep. 1402 (1988), Weldele v. Medley Dev., 227 M 257, 738 P2d 1281, 44 St. Rep. 1062 (1987), and Keller v. Liberty NW., Inc., 2010 MT 279, 358 Mont. 448, 246 P.3d 434.

Rescission of Sale Agreement: In an action for rescission of a contract, plaintiff was under a legal duty to execute the sale agreement with the prudence and care of a reasonable and cautious businessman. When the evidence showed a failure to exercise such care, plaintiff could not obtain relief from a court of equity on the ground of unilateral mistake of fact. Quinn v. Briggs, 172 M 468, 565 P2d 297 (1977), followed in Silva v. McGuinness, 189 M 252, 615 P2d 879, 37 St. Rep. 1401 (1980).

Reformation of Instruments Because of Mistakes: Before equity will intervene to correct an alleged mutual mistake in a written instrument, the evidence of the mistake must be clear, convincing, and satisfactory. Humble v. St. John, 72 M 519, 234 P 475 (1925).

Failure to Read Instrument:

The complaint alleged that plaintiff had agreed to sell and defendant to buy a parcel of land and that plaintiff had accurately described the land to an attorney who undertook to reduce the terms of the agreement to writing. It further alleged that in doing so the attorney included more land than was intended to be conveyed and that, relying upon and having confidence in the attorney's integrity and ability, plaintiff failed to observe the inaccuracy, as did also the defendant, or made no mention of it if observing it. The contract was completed in this faulty condition. The complaint was sufficient to state a case for reformation on the ground of mutual mistake of the parties. Cox v. Hall, 54 M 154, 168 P 519 (1917).

One is guilty of negligence in failing to read a promissory note before signing it. Parchen v. Chessman, 49 M 326, 142 P 631 (1914), distinguished in Comerford v. USF&G Co., 59 M 243, 196 P 984 (1921).

Where the parties entrust the duty of formulating a writing embodying their agreement to an attorney or scrivener, and he, by his own mistake or fraud, embodies in it stipulations and conditions other than those agreed upon, the party against whom it is sought to be enforced may have it reformed, though it was signed by him and delivered to the other party, without reading. Parchen v. Chessman, 49 M 326, 142 P 631 (1914), overruling Hennessy v. Holmes, 46 M 89, 125 P 132 (1912).

28-2-410. What constitutes mistake of law.

Case Notes

No Unilateral Mistake of Law if Other Party Unaware of Misapprehension: The claimant argued that he had entered into the settlement believing that he was not entitled to receive benefits after age 65. The Supreme Court ruled that there can be no relief for a unilateral mistake of law unless it can be shown that the other party knew of the misapprehension. Hartfield v. St. Comp. Ins. Fund, 246 M 259, 805 P2d 1293, 47 St. Rep. 2001 (1990).

Rescission of Sale Agreement: A misunderstanding by the plaintiff of tax consequences attendant to a sale agreement is not ground for rescission as a mistake of law when the other party is not aware of or under the same misapprehension. Quinn v. Briggs, 172 M 468, 565 P2d 297 (1977).

Bank Unlawfully Pledging Note to County: Prior to amendment of the National Banking Act of 1930, national banks were prohibited from pledging any of their assets to secure deposits; hence, where in 1924, a depositor executed his note to a bank which unlawfully pledged it to a county as security for its funds then on deposit in the bank, which soon thereafter became insolvent, the county was without right to enforce payment of the note because it was not the owner or rightful holder thereof. The receiver's sending the dividend check for funds of the depositor to the County Treasurer was immaterial because it was a mistake. McFarland v. Stillwater County, 109 M 544, 98 P2d 321 (1940).

Justification of Mistake: The complaint of a County Surveyor in an action to recover from the county the difference between $7 and $8 per day compensation during 4 years of service, on the ground that owing to the mutual mistake of himself and the Board of County Commissioners he was allowed and accepted the smaller amount whereas under the law he was entitled to the larger one, stated a cause of action (as against the assertion that mistake of what the law allowed him was not a proper basis for relief), it being apparent from an inspection of various statutes relating to the compensation of the County Surveyor that there was ample justification for laymen, such as plaintiff and the Board, to fall into the mutual mistake as to the amount he was entitled by law to receive. Hicks v. Stillwater County, 84 M 38, 274 P 296 (1929).

Affecting Contract Obligations: Every person is charged with knowledge of the law, and generally speaking a mistake of law is not an adequate ground for relieving one from a contract obligation, more especially so where the mistake was not mutual, but the party relying thereon not only knew of his legal rights and asserted them, but nevertheless agreed to monthly settlements for several years, constituting accounts stated, accepting less than he was legally entitled to; under such conditions he may not thereafter be permitted to surcharge the accounts and recover the difference. Norum v. Ohio Oil Co., 83 M 353, 272 P 534 (1928).

Sufficiency of Complaint Based on Mistake of Law:

Where a fraud is alleged in the alternative in an action or the reformation of one and the cancellation of another instrument because executed under the influence of mutual mistake, it does not render the plea of mutual mistake ineffective. Brundy v. Canby, 50 M 454, 148 P 315 (1915).

Where plaintiff in a suit to recover an overpayment made on a repurchase of property sold under foreclosure, under a mistake of law, induced by defendant, alleges a cause of action under subsection (2) of this section, and the proof adduced brings it within subsection (1), there is a fatal variance, and recovery cannot be had by reason of a mistake of law. Bottego v. Carroll, 31 M 122, 77 P 430 (1904). See Brundy v. Canby, 50 M 454, 148 P 315 (1915).

28-2-411. Mistake of foreign laws — mistake of fact.

Case Notes

Nonresident Seeking Foreclosure in Montana: The rule that mistakes of foreign law are mistakes of fact was not available to nonresident bringing foreclosure proceedings in Montana through a local attorney where the nonresident failed to advise attorney of a payment that kept the debt alive in the belief the law here was the same as in his state, and attorney entered into an agreed statement of facts upon the trial of which the court found that the debt was outlawed. Rieckhoff v. Woodhull, 106 M 22, 75 P2d 56 (1937).

Part 5
Communication of Consent — Revocation of Proposal

Part Case Notes

Blank Security Agreement Signed by Borrower and Filled Out by Bank: Borrower signed a blank security agreement that bank then filled out and mailed to her. The record shows that she had the agreement in her possession in December 1985; thus, she had the means to discover the fraud that she alleged bank committed in setting the agreement's terms. Because she did not file a claim until December 1988, her claim was barred by the 2-year statute of limitations. Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045, 48 St. Rep. 730 (1991).

Valid Release of Insurance Claims as Binding: Plaintiff injured in an automobile accident received $4,362.85 for medical expenses, lost wages, car rental costs, headaches, and inconvenience. In return for the settlement payments, the adjuster obtained a general liability release discharging the insurance company "from all claims, demands, damages, actions, causes of action or suits of any kind or nature whatsoever . . . [for] all injuries, known or unknown". Plaintiff sent a thank you note to the adjuster to express her pleasure with the "settlement and prompt service" but also retained an attorney on the case who attempted to obtain rescission of the release after receiving a copy of plaintiff's medical report. Rescission was denied upon a finding that plaintiff executed a valid release of all claims and that the terms of the agreement and release were clear and unambiguous. Plaintiff was bound by the settlement terms. Hanson v. Oljar, 231 M 272, 752 P2d 187, 45 St. Rep. 602 (1988), followed in Hetherington v. Ford Motor Co., 257 M 395, 849 P2d 1039, 50 St. Rep. 325 (1993), which was distinguished in Murphy v. The Home Depot, 2012 MT 23, 364 Mont. 27, 270 P.3d 72.

Letters of Offer and Acceptance on Real Property Sale Exchanged — Terms of Response Immaterial — Contract for Sale Enforced by Specific Performance: Two sisters owned 78 acres as tenants in common. The defendant sister, who held a majority interest, sent a letter to the plaintiff sister, offering to sell her the majority interest or to purchase the minority interest. The letter set a deadline for a response and requested it be sent to a specified third party. Before the deadline expired, the plaintiff sister wrote back directly to her sister and agreed to purchase the majority interest. However, the defendant sister claimed she had decided to sell the property to their brother. The plaintiff sister sued, seeking specific performance of the contract. The defendant sister argued that the plaintiff had not accepted the original offer because she had not responded to the third party as requested. The District Court concluded that, as phrased in the letter, the request to direct the response to the third party was not a condition precedent to acceptance. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the letters exchanged by the sisters formed a contract and that the mode of acceptance was not a condition precedent. The court affirmed the District Court's grant of specific performance ordering the defendant sister to sell her majority interest to the plaintiff. Olsen v. Johnston, 2013 MT 25, 368 Mont. 347, 301 P.3d 791.

Acceptance of Performance — Contract Established: In a construction contract dispute, substantial credible evidence supported the District Court's conclusion that the general contractor accepted the subcontractor's offer although the general contractor crossed out portions of the offer and added additional language. The general contractor's representative signed the offer, and the general contractor, who controlled access to the site, allowed the subcontractor to begin work without any other agreement in place. Assuming the general contractor's interlineations created a counteroffer, a meeting of the minds occurred when the subcontractor started performing its contractual obligations. AAA Constr. of Missoula, LLC v. Choice Land Corp., 2011 MT 262, 362 Mont. 264, 264 P.3d 709.

Attorney's Agreement to Settle Disputed Claim Binding Client Despite Attorney's Receipt of Funds or Filing With District Court — Estate of Goick Overruled: Following protracted litigation, the parties' attorneys agreed by telephone to settle a disputed claim, specifying a dollar amount and the preparation of a general release. Defendant's counsel prepared and faxed a release to plaintiff's counsel, who in turn replied by letter that the settlement terms were accepted. Defendant's counsel then prepared and signed a stipulation to dismiss the action and ordered a settlement check. About 2 weeks later, plaintiff's counsel advised that plaintiff refused to settle. Defendant's counsel moved to compel settlement, and the District Court granted the motion on the basis that plaintiff had agreed to the terms of the settlement. Plaintiff appealed, arguing that the settlement statement was only an attempt by counsel to reach an agreement that would then be forwarded to plaintiff for final agreement. However, plaintiff presented no evidence that counsel was not authorized to enter a settlement. Plaintiff also relied on 37-61-401(1) and on In re Estate of Goick, 275 M 13, 909 P2d 1165 (1996), for the proposition that he was not bound by the settlement because the agreement was not filed with the Clerk of Court or entered in the court's minutes. The Supreme Court affirmed. The literal interpretation of 37-61-401(1)(a) in Goick was inconsistent with prior case law and would preclude an attorney from binding a client to a settlement agreement, although 37-61-401(1)(b) would allow an attorney to discharge a claim or acknowledge satisfaction of judgment once the attorney received money. Precluding an attorney from binding a client to a settlement unless the attorney received funds does not make sense and is an absurd result. The Supreme Court therefore overruled that portion of Goick stating that a client is not bound to a settlement agreement unless the agreement is filed with the District Court or entered in the court's minutes. Lockhead v. Weinstein, 2003 MT 360, 319 M 62, 81 P3d 1284 (2003), following Hetherington v. Ford Motor Co., 257 M 395, 849 P2d 1039 (1993), which was distinguished in Murphy v. The Home Depot, 2012 MT 23, 364 Mont. 27, 270 P.3d 72.

Silence as Grounds for Estopping Party From Denying Existence of Contract: A manufacturing company received a government contract to produce combat helmets. Farmers State Bank supplied a letter to the Department of Defense stating that Farmers Bank and First National Bank of Missoula would provide the necessary financing. Neither bank provided funds, and the company sued under tort and contract law. The Supreme Court found that Farmers Bank was not an agent of First National solely on the basis of statements made by Farmers Bank in its letter to the Department of Defense. The court also held that First National's silence in not denying that it agreed to finance the company did not amount to a representation or concealment of material facts estopping it from claiming that there was no agreement on its part to fund the project. NW. Polymeric, Inc. v. Farmers St. Bank, 236 M 175, 768 P2d 873, 46 St. Rep. 275 (1989).

Obligation to Refund Payment for Gas Field Option: Plaintiff corporation rescinded a gas field option upon which it had paid $50,000 to defendant. After defendant failed to refund money due, plaintiff filed suit and was granted summary judgment for $71,320.55. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, based upon the exhibits, affidavits, and briefs before the lower court, there was no evidence of a genuine issue of material fact. The escrow agreement and release based upon plaintiff's rescission were supported by adequate consideration since release from contract obligations and forbearance to sue are both adequate consideration. Ayers Oil and Gas, Inc., was a party to both the option and the release agreements as evidenced by Ayers' signature as president. Devon Oil & Gas Co., Inc. v. Ayers, 218 M 223, 707 P2d 523, 42 St. Rep. 1536 (1985).

Oral Contract for Purchase of House — Part Performance — Statute of Frauds Inapplicable — No Refund to Purchasers on Default: Defendant agreed to sell home to friends upon a $10,000 downpayment and assumption of defendant's loan. Plaintiffs did not qualify for assumption, so defendant prepared lease for plaintiffs' signature. They refused to sign because it was not a contract for deed. Defendant allowed plaintiffs to take occupancy, and they made sporadic payments for 4 years. Defendant's patience waned when the bank exercised acceleration provision for delinquencies. Plaintiffs sued for refund of payments. The court found an oral contract for deed. The Statute of Frauds was inapplicable because defendant was, at all times, willing to effect sale and transfer of the home. He was not required to refund plaintiffs' payments. Since no lease was ever signed and no rental relationship created, landlord and tenant law was inapplicable. Hayes v. Hartelius, 215 M 391, 697 P2d 1349, 42 St. Rep. 457 (1985).

Offer Followed by Suggested Changes, Passage of Time, and Acceptance: Following oral modification of written lease to allow lessee to use additional space for additional rent, lessor sent lessee a new lease that incorporated the modification and was essentially the same as the current lease. Lessee's attorney suggested changes not accepted by lessor. Lessor did not revoke his offer of the new lease, and a few months later lessee told lessor on the phone that her attorney's changes were not important to her and she would sign and deliver the lease, which she did the next month. The attorney's suggested changes were not a rejection, the time between the suggestions and the delivery of the signed lease by lessee was not unreasonable under the circumstances and did not work a revocation of the offer of the new lease, and the new lease was executed when lessee signed and delivered it. Lemley v. Allen, 203 M 37, 659 P2d 262, 40 St. Rep. 279 (1983).

No Error in Finding of No Unjust Enrichment: Plaintiff contended that defendant company was unjustly enriched when a promissory note was unilaterally entered into by one of the owners of defendant business without the knowledge or authorization of the other owners. The District Court held that the company was not unjustly enriched, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The company had no knowledge of the speculative transaction between plaintiff and the owner until shortly before suit was filed, so plaintiff could show no misconduct or fault on the company's part, nor was the owner authorized to engage in entering promissory notes on the company's behalf. Thus, the District Court did not err in holding that the company was not unjustly enriched. Estate of Pruyn v. Axmen Propane, Inc., 2009 MT 448, 354 M 208, 223 P3d 845 (2009). See also Maxted v. Barrett, 198 M 81, 643 P2d 1161 (1982).

City Resolution Allowing Implied Consent to Annexation Upon Continued Use of Utility Services Affirmed: The city of Whitefish adopted a municipal resolution requiring that property owners consent to annexation in order to continue to receive city utility services and allowing the city to imply consent to annexation from property owners that continued to receive the services after they received notice requiring them to disconnect from the utilities. Property owners contended that the resolution was invalid, but the District Court held the resolution valid, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Attorney General held in 46 A.G. Op. 12 (1995), that a municipality may establish a rule requiring consent to annexation as a condition for continued receipt of services, and that opinion is in accord with 69-7-201. Further, the utility rule in this case put the burden on the property owner to arrange to disconnect from services if protesting annexation, so once proper notice was given, under 7-2-4710 and this section, the city's procedure to imply consent was a proper method to determine if a property owner wished to continue to receive city services or to protest annexation. Gregg v. Whitefish City Council, 2004 MT 262, 323 M 109, 99 P3d 151 (2004).

No Meeting of Minds Concerning Stock Transfer: Wife offered to convey shares of stock to husband to satisfy a dissolution judgment, but husband did not accept her offer; he merely agreed to consider it. Husband subsequently rejected wife's offer because of negative tax consequences associated with the transfer. There can be no binding contract without the mutual consent of the parties, and consent is established if there has been an offer and an acceptance of that offer. In re Marriage of Dalley, 237 M 287, 773 P2d 295, 46 St. Rep. 808 (1989).

Oral Contract for Purchase of House — Part Performance — Statute of Frauds Inapplicable — No Refund to Purchasers on Default: Defendant agreed to sell home to friends upon a $10,000 downpayment and assumption of defendant's loan. Plaintiffs did not qualify for assumption, so defendant prepared lease for plaintiffs' signature. They refused to sign because it was not a contract for deed. No Implied Acceptance — Contract Governs: This section does not apply if the terms of a valid contract govern the transaction. Hence, city of Billings failed in its contention that Grays, by accepting benefits of subdivision improvement agreement and waiver of protest to creation of SID, are bound to the terms of the agreement by implied acceptance. If the terms of the agreement are disputed and no enforceable contract exists, the city's remedy lies in this section's quasi-contractual, restitutionary relief. "The theory of unjust enrichment and restitution is brought into play when no contract between the parties exists and the court implies a contract in law." (Maxted v. Barrett, 198 M 81, 643 P2d 1161 (1982).) Gray v. Billings, 213 M 6, 689 P2d 268, 41 St. Rep. 1910 (1984).

Obligations Arising Out of Lawful Contract Not to Be Repudiated: A contract between two interstate trucking firms under which the appellant was to provide workers' compensation coverage for his employees and agreed to save appellee's carrier harmless from any liability arising from any relationship between the appellant and his employees did not violate rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and appellee was entitled to be indemnified for an amount paid in settlement of a workers' compensation claim. Indus. Indem. Co. v. McIntosh, 185 M 158, 604 P2d 1233 (1980).

Estoppel by Acquiescence — Direct or Implied: If a party seeking reformation of a contract on the ground of mistake in its execution, after becoming aware of the mistake or the circumstances are such that he will be presumed to have known of it, acquiesces in the instrument, he loses his right to reformation; acquiescence may be implied from an unreasonable delay in applying for redress after getting notice of the mistake. Cook-Reynolds Co. v. Beyer, 107 M 1, 79 P2d 658 (1938).

Waiver of Fraud: Plaintiff, shortly after entering into a contract with defendant agreeing to trade his farm for that of the latter, discovered that he had been defrauded and gave notice of his intention to rescind, but continued in possession of the land acquired by him for nearly 14 months and for a period of 6 months after he commenced action for rescission. Plaintiff continued to use it as his own, paying an installment of taxes after knowledge of the fraud and 6 months after the deal assured defendant that he would attend to the payment of a mortgage assumed by him on the trade. Under these circumstances, plaintiff waived the fraud and ratified the contract by his conduct. Beebe v. James, 91 M 403, 8 P2d 803 (1932).

Notice of Facts: Under 28-10-604 plaintiff corporation must be deemed to have had notice of the facts known to its manager in entering into an agreement whereby its debtor was released from liabilities by his assignment for the benefit of creditors, and its voluntary acceptance of the benefits of the transaction was equivalent to a consent to it. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co. v. Anderson, 66 M 64, 212 P 853 (1923).

Case Notes

Acceptance of Sale of Real Property With New Terms, Including Foregoing Attorney Fees — Constituted Release: The husband had been ordered to pay his wife's attorney fees in the parties' divorce proceeding. After the divorce, the wife sought to purchase real estate in which the husband had an interest. The husband's attorney responded to the wife's offer with a letter containing several modifications to the wife's offer and also a request that the attorney fees owed by the husband be waived. The Supreme Court ruled that when the wife purchased the property pursuant to the modified terms, she also released the husband from paying the fees owed. The sale of the real estate was adequate consideration for the release. In re Marriage of Lyman, 240 M 336, 783 P2d 1362, 46 St. Rep. 2174 (1989).

Contract Part Oral, Part Written — Bid Not Contract — Parol Evidence Rule Inapplicable — Time of Essence by Oral Agreement: The plaintiff in a breach of contract case obtained a bid on a job building a basement. The defendant contractors on appeal argued: (1) that their bid constituted a contract and therefore the parol evidence rule barred testimony concerning a completion date not contained in the writing; and (2) time was not of the essence unless expressly provided in the writing. The Supreme Court said that the bid was an offer and that a purported acceptance which varied or added to the terms of the offer was not an acceptance but a counteroffer. The trial court's finding that the parties had agreed orally to a specific completion date was not clearly erroneous. The contract was partially written and partially oral. Because there was not a final, complete written document intended by the parties to contain all of the terms of the contract, the parol evidence rule did not apply. By agreeing to the completion date with the knowledge that the plaintiff considered the date essential because of approaching cold weather, the defendants agreed that time was of the essence. Therefore, the defendants were in substantial breach on the agreed date. Carriger v. Ballenger, 192 M 479, 628 P2d 1106, 38 St. Rep. 864 (1981), distinguishing Higby v. Hooper, 124 M 331, 221 P2d 1043 (1950).

Insurance Contract: Where a renewal policy was sent to an insured, the sending of policy constituted an offer and offer by insured to take the policy for as long as $10 would pay the premium was a new proposal, requiring acceptance by the insurer. Kudrna v. Great N. Ins. Co., 175 F. Supp. 783 (D.C. Mont. 1959).

Acceptance to Conform to Offer: To conclude an agreement the acceptance of the offer must be unconditional and must in every respect meet and correspond with the terms of the offer. State ex rel. Henderson v. Bd. of St. Prison Comm'rs, 37 M 378, 96 P 736 (1908), the principle being applied in this case to a contract with the Board of State Prison Commissioners for the care of inmates of the prison.

Corporation Considered Real Party in Interest on Claim for Lost Corporate Profits — No Exception for S. Corporations: Gullett paid $10,000 earnest money for the purchase of real property. The money was drawn on the account of Gullett's corporation. When defendants refused to return the money after the purchase agreement failed, Gullett filed a complaint for return of the money and for profits allegedly suffered by the corporation's business through lack of the funds. Although the money was ultimately repaid to Gullett, the District Court summarily dismissed the claim for lost business profits on grounds that the corporation, not Gullett, was the real party in interest. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The cause of action for recovery of lost business profits belonged to the corporation, not to a shareholder. Gullett's argument that he should not be barred from the claim because the corporation was an S. corporation also failed because even though an S. corporation is treated differently for taxation purposes, it remains a corporation in all other ways, and the corporation and its shareholders remain separate entities. Gullett v. Van Dyke Constr. Co., 2005 MT 105, 327 M 30, 111 P3d 220 (2005), following Richland Nat'l Bank & Trust v. Swenson, 249 M 410, 816 P2d 1045 (1991), and followed in Cleveland v.

Ward, 2016 MT 10, 382 Mont. 118, 364 P.3d 1250. See also Smith Setzer & Sons, Inc. v. S.C. Procurement Review Panel, 20 F3d 1311 (4th Cir. 1994).

Summary Judgment on Breach of Contract Affirmed — Wrongful Discharge Claim Reversed for Determination of Whether Claimant Was Employee or Independent Contractor: Tvedt brought a claim for breach of contract, wrongful termination, and indemnification of expenses, alleging that defendant group had breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, waived the at-will clauses in their employment agreement, and mischaracterized Tvedt as an independent contractor, rather than an employee. Defendant group moved for summary judgment and filed a contingent counterclaim stating that in the event that Tvedt was found to be defendant group's employee, then defendant group's obligation to pay Tvedt the contract value should cease and all payments made to Tvedt should be returned. The District Court determined that Tvedt was not an employee and granted summary judgment to defendant group on all claims, and Tvedt appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed summary judgment on the breach of covenant issue because Tvedt was given adequate notice of termination, defendant group was exercising the specific language of the at-will termination provision of the contract, and Tvedt did not demonstrate that defendant group had waived the right to enforce that provision. However, the court reversed summary judgment on the wrongful discharge claim because the District Court incorrectly applied defendant group's novation argument and because genuine issues of fact remained whether Tvedt was an employee or independent contractor and whether a manager's agreement that recognized Tvedt individually was in effect at the time of termination. Remand was ordered because the District Court never considered whether Tvedt was entitled to relief for wrongful discharge as a matter of law and, if so, whether the claim for indemnification was appropriate. Tvedt v. Farmers Ins. Group of Co., 2004 MT 125, 321 M 263, 91 P3d 1 (2004).

Offer Followed by Suggested Changes, Passage of Time, and Acceptance: Following oral modification of written lease to allow lessee to use additional space for additional rent, lessor sent lessee a new lease that incorporated the modification and was essentially the same as the current lease. Lessee's attorney suggested changes not accepted by lessor. Lessor did not revoke his offer of the new lease, and a few months later lessee told lessor on the phone that her attorney's changes were not important to her and she would sign and deliver the lease, which she did the next month. The attorney's suggested changes were not a rejection, the time between the suggestions and the delivery of the signed lease by lessee was not unreasonable under the circumstances and did not work a revocation of the offer of the new lease, and the new lease was executed when lessee signed and delivered it. Lemley v. Allen, 203 M 37, 659 P2d 262, 40 St. Rep. 279 (1983).

Revocation of Offer Contained in Letter of Intent to Contract: An offer may only be revoked prior to its acceptance. Sawyer-Adecor Int'l, Inc. v. Anglin, 198 M 440, 646 P2d 1194, 39 St. Rep. 1118 (1982).

Acceptance of Offer:

Where there was an agreement between an optionee and a prospective purchaser that "it will have to be first man up with the money" who could take up an option for the purchase of an interest in a block of real estate leases, and the prospective purchaser notified the optionee that the money had been raised, the purchaser's action constituted an acceptance and the optionee could not then revoke the offer. Aasheim v. Hoven, 137 M 179, 350 P2d 1025 (1960).

A contract is not created by a mere offer, even though kept open for nearly 2 months, which is revoked before acceptance. Donlan v. Arnold, 48 M 416, 138 P 775 (1914).

Resignation of Professor: A tender of resignation by a professor of the state university was, under the facts presented, a mere offer to resign, i.e., an offer to terminate his contract of employment, and as such could be withdrawn by him at any time before its acceptance by the State Board of Education. State ex rel. Phillips v. Ford, 116 M 190, 151 P2d 171 (1944).

Deposit in Bank for Inspection — Failure to Act: Where the owner of oil land transmitted a lease to a bank with draft to be paid before delivery of the lease, and no payment was made, the lessee requesting and being granted additional time within which to examine the title, and no acceptance of the offer to lease was communicated to the owner after expiration of the time for acceptance, the owner had a right to revoke his offer by requesting a return of the lease and draft. Nadeau v. Tex. Co., 104 M 558, 69 P2d 586 (1937).

Oil and Gas Lease: In the absence of a consideration, a written offer to lease oil and gas lands was revocable by the offeror at any time prior to the creation of a contract by acceptance, even though the time specified in which acceptance could be made had not expired, and withdrawal of the instrument by the offeror from the bank in which it had been deposited and notification of the fact to the offeree by the bank was a revocation, formal notice not having been necessary. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co. v. Neville, 79 M 550, 257 P 1016 (1927).

Contract for Sale of Illegal Slot Machines Void and Unenforceable: In December 1984, MPH Company (MPH) contracted to purchase 24 "Poker All Keno" electronic gambling machine kits. The kits were delivered in March 1985, but by May and June 1985 had proved to be inoperable. MPH sued the manufacturer for breach of contract, breach of warranty, fraud, and bad faith. In lieu of trial, the parties stipulated that the machines contained design defects rendering them commercially unacceptable and constituting a breach of contract. The District Court awarded MPH $193,663, representing funds expended in satisfaction of the contract, plus $79,354 in prejudgment interest. The Supreme Court reversed after finding that at the time the parties entered into the contract, the machines were not authorized under Montana gambling law and were at best illegal slot machines. Because the machines were unlawful, the entire contract was void. A party to an illegal contract may not use the courts of this state to enforce the agreement. MPH Co. & Tropic Indus. v. Imagineering, Inc., 243 M 342, 792 P2d 1081, 47 St. Rep. 947 (1990).

Novation of Lease — New Lessee's Obligation Not Affected by His Ownership Rights: Franchisor took possession of franchise after franchisee indicated a desire to sell the franchise. To make the franchise more attractive to prospective purchasers, franchisor agreed with Godwin, who had leased equipment to the franchise, to make the rental payments on the equipment if Godwin would forgo repossession of the equipment. In a proceeding involving right to possession of the equipment and recovery of rental payments, although franchisor claimed a right under the Uniform Commercial Code to possession of the equipment under its security agreement with franchisee, the lower court correctly found franchisor liable for rent. That franchisor may have been entitled to possession did not preclude it from making a binding agreement with Godwin to take over franchisee's rental payments. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

Unlawful Agreement to Transfer Radio Station: The plaintiff and defendant entered into a lease and sales right agreement for a radio station. Because the agreement contemplated a de facto transfer of the station without the consent of the Federal Communications Commission, it was unlawful. Because the transfer of the station was the single object of the agreement and because the object was unlawful, the agreement was void. McPartlin v. Fransen, 199 M 143, 648 P2d 729, 39 St. Rep. 1220 (1982).

Certainty of Option Contract — Specific Performance of Reformed Contract: Where the plaintiff and defendant entered into an option contract giving the plaintiff an option to purchase certain real estate but the parties failed to specify the interest which would be retained by the defendant in certain improvements and failed to specify the dates upon which the downpayment and annual payments would be made and the date upon which interest would accrue, the contract was nonetheless sufficiently definite to allow its enforcement by specific performance. At trial, the court took testimony of the parties and reformed the contract so as to make it sufficiently definite as to the defendant's retained interest to allow specific performance. The fact that certain dates were not specified is not fatal to the contract, as it need not be absolutely certain in every detail, and where a time of performance is not specified, a reasonable time will be implied. Keaster v. Bozik, 191 M 293, 623 P2d 1376, 38 St. Rep. 194 (1981).

Case Notes

Validity of Forum Selection Language in Employment Contract: A clause in an employment contract provided that in case of disputes, venue for enforcement of the contract would be in the state District Courts of Lewis and Clark County, Montana, or in the district of choice set by the independent contractor. A dispute arose, and plaintiff independent contractor sought to enforce the contract in Lewis and Clark County. Defendant moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, and the motion was granted on grounds that the contract's forum clause did not give the court personal jurisdiction over defendant, a resident of Illinois. Plaintiff appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. As held in May v. Figgins, 186 M 383, 607 P2d 1132 (1980), parties to a contract may agree in advance to submit to the jurisdiction of a given court, and as such, forum selection clauses are prima facie valid and should be enforced unless the resisting party shows that the agreement was not deliberately and understandably made and that the contractual language did not clearly, unequivocally, and unambiguously express a waiver of personal jurisdiction. In this case, the parties knowingly consented to personal jurisdiction in Montana and the forum selection clause was clear and unambiguous. The case was remanded for further proceedings in the Montana court. Milanovich v. Schnibben, 2007 MT 128, 337 M 334, 160 P3d 562 (2007).

Timely Exercise of Third-Party Option to Purchase Real Property — No Breach of Buy-Sell Agreement: A provision in a buy-sell agreement between Palmer and Bahm allowed a third party 72 hours after the Palmer-Bahm agreement was signed to decide whether to purchase a strip of land from Bahm that was contained in the parcel covered by the agreement. Although the third party did not complete the transaction or enter into a separate buy-sell agreement within 72 hours, the buy-sell agreement required only that a purchase decision be made within 72 hours. Uncontroverted evidence showed that the third party made a timely decision to purchase the strip and communicated that decision to Bahm, so Bahm did not violate the agreement with Palmer or break the covenant of good faith and fair dealing by selling the strip to the third party. Palmer v. Bahm, 2006 MT 29, 331 M 105, 128 P3d 1031 (2006).

General Scheme Unlawful — Contract Unenforceable: When the general scheme of contracting parties is to bring about unlawful results, the contract is unenforceable. (See 15 Williston on Contracts 1752, 1755 (3rd Ed. 1972).) MPH Co. & Tropic Indus. v. Imagineering, Inc., 243 M 342, 792 P2d 1081, 47 St. Rep. 947 (1990).

Summary Judgment Proper on Question of Existence of Employment Relationship: A quarrel developed between a store employee and the prospective new store owner over dress policy. The employee walked out and later filed wrongful discharge allegations. The charges were summarily dismissed on the grounds that no employment relationship existed at the time of termination after it was determined that: (1) the prospective owner did not own or control the store on the day of termination; (2) the employee's wages were paid for that day by the former owner; and (3) the employee refused to give the store keys to the prospective owner, claiming they still belonged to the former owner. Janz v. Quenzer, 232 M 439, 756 P2d 1174, 45 St. Rep. 1178 (1988).

Certainty as to Terms of Contract Required — Summary Judgment: In suit for breach of alleged oral contract between law partners to find "a place" in the law firm for any of their children who might wish to become lawyers, District Court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Supreme Court affirmed and held that the contract was unenforceable for lack of certainty as to its terms. Defendant's daughter's work for the firm as a law clerk did not perfect the alleged agreement. Plaintiff failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact to preclude entry of summary judgment. Bishop v. Hendrickson, 215 M 158, 695 P2d 1313, 42 St. Rep. 259 (1985). See also Janz v. Quenzer, 232 M 439, 756 P2d 1174, 45 St. Rep. 1178 (1988).

When Contract Impossible or Void — Failure to Act on Defense as Harmless Error: A seller argued on appeal from a verdict for a purchaser in a breach of contract action that the cattle sales contract was void because he did not own the calves at the time of execution of the contract. The seller claimed the contract was wholly impossible and unlawful under 28-2-603. The Supreme Court said that the mere fact that a party contracts to sell something he does not own did not raise the defense of impossibility. The burden of proving impossibility rested on the party asserting it, and he had to show he took virtually every action within his powers to perform his duties under the contract. Here, the seller offered no evidence why it was impossible for him to obtain his wife's consent to the sale or to buy her out. The object of a contract had to be lawful when the contract was made and possible by the time the contract was to be performed. The District Court's failure to rule on the seller's motion for summary judgment on this ground was harmless error because the motion should have been denied. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

Requirements of an Escrow — Improper Delivery: In this case concerning a contract for deed, an issue on appeal was whether a warranty deed was delivered improperly by the escrow bank. The Supreme Court noted the caveat of this section that the object of an escrow must be lawful when the contract is made and possible and ascertainable by the time the contract is to be performed. To constitute an instrument in escrow, it must be deposited with the intention that it take effect upon the performance of an express condition or the happening of a certain event. When the instruments here were deposited on condition of payment of a promissory note, it was foreordained that the warranty deed be delivered to the seller. This was not the arrangement at the time of the escrow deposit, according to the testimony of the parties in this case. The escrow deposit was not made until after the time for performance of the condition. The warranty deed thus was delivered to the seller improperly. Stoddard v. Grokin, 191 M 495, 625 P2d 529, 38 St. Rep. 326 (1981).

Real Estate Listing — Vagueness to Be Raised at Trial Level: Plaintiff and defendant entered into a real estate listing agreement. Defendant was a cotenant with her husband. Defendant contended that the listing contained an erroneous asking price, did not adequately describe the property, and was signed only by the defendant. Defendant contended the contract should be declared void due to vagueness. Defendant participated in the contract throughout its entire existence without any objection of vagueness and did not raise the issue at trial. The surrounding circumstances and positions of the parties clearly indicate their intent to enter into and perform an agreement. When reviewing a conflict in testimony regarding ambiguity, the trier of fact is entitled to determine the meaning of the contract in its own right. The reviewing court looks only to determine whether there is substantial credible evidence supporting the verdict. The vagueness issue was not raised in the District Court, thus it could not be considered on appeal. Barrett v. Ballard, 191 M 39, 622 P2d 180, 37 St. Rep. 2038 (1980).

Certainty of Description — Preemptive Right to Purchase Land: Where an agreement stipulated that the plaintiffs were to have the right of first refusal on "any additional tracts seller may offer", that preemptive right agreement was fatally defective because it was impossible to determine the description of the property to which the right applied with accuracy, even though resorting to extrinsic evidence. Klien v. Brodie, 167 M 47, 534 P2d 1251 (1975).

Purpose Ascertainable: A contract relating to the sale of mining property which could be construed as either authorizing plaintiff to secure a purchaser or to purchase the property himself was sufficiently clear to be enforceable. Smith v. Jack Pot Min. Co., 109 M 445, 97 P2d 368 (1939).

28-2-603. When contract wholly void.

Case Notes

Challenge to Contract or to Arbitration Clause — When Arbitration Appropriate: Plaintiffs defaulted on a loan with defendant, and nonjudicial foreclosure proceedings were begun. The loan contract contained an arbitration clause, but plaintiffs challenged the validity of the contract as a whole, not the validity of the arbitration clause. On defendant's motion, the District Court ordered arbitration, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court held that under federal law, when a complaint specifically challenges a contract arbitration clause, the doctrine of severability set out in Prima Paint Corp. v. Flood & Conklin Mfg. Co., 388 US 395 (1967), in conjunction with the Federal Arbitration Act, allows a court to hear the challenge. However, when, as here, a complaint challenges a contract as a whole, Prima Paint and Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna, 546 US 440 (2006), require a court to grant a motion to compel arbitration if the contract contains an arbitration provision. Thus, despite plaintiffs' contention that the contract itself was void ab initio, the District Court was affirmed. Martz v. Beneficial Mont., Inc., 2006 MT 94, 332 M 93, 135 P3d 790 (2006). However, see Thompson v. Lithia Chrysler Jeep Dodge of Great Falls, 2008 MT 175, 343 M 392, 185 P3d 332 (2008), in which a narrow exception to the Martz rule established that when a party challenges a contract containing an arbitration clause on the ground that the parties never entered a contract, the court, not arbitration, is the appropriate forum to decide whether a contract existed, prior to compelling arbitration.

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977), and Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236 (1999).

Questions as to Buyer's Intent and Seller's Impossibility of Performance — Summary Judgment Improper: Seller sold 20 acres with a separate option agreement to reacquire 15 of the acres. The option agreement stated that if the option was not exercised within a year, buyer was to retain the 15 acres and the option was void. The buyer's affidavit stated that it was his intent to purchase 20 acres, subject to the option, and to retain all 20 acres if the option was not exercised in accordance with its terms. Because of a conflict between the local government master plan (now growth policy) and zoning map for the area, which was not resolved within the year of the option, the option could not be exercised. The District Court granted seller summary judgment in the seller's action for declaratory relief, ruling that it was impossible for seller to comply with the option because of the master plan (now growth policy)-zoning map conflict and that equity and good conscience required that seller be given reasonable additional time to comply with the option conditions. The language of the option agreement and the buyer's affidavit showed a genuine issue of material fact with regard to the parties' intent. In addition, the buyer's contention that seller was dilatory in exercising the option and that the delay caused the option to expire raised a genuine issue of material fact as to the question of impossibility of performance. Therefore, the grant of summary judgment was error. Furthermore, the District Court exceeded its authority in granting equitable modification of the express terms of the option contract to give seller additional time to perform. 360 Ranch Corp. v. R&D Holding, 278 M 487, 926 P2d 260, 53 St. Rep. 1038 (1996).

Employment Contract for Performance of Embryo Transfers by Nonveterinarian Void for Illegal Purpose: Employment contracts entered into in 1980 by an embryonics corporation and two persons who were not veterinarians, for the performance of bovine embryo transfers in Montana, were contracts for the illegal purpose of unauthorized practice of veterinary medicine and were therefore void. Actions arising from alleged breach of the contracts were unenforceable. Portable Embryonics, Inc. v. J.P. Genetics, Inc., 248 M 242, 810 P2d 1197, 48 St. Rep. 415 (1991).

Contract for Sale of Illegal Slot Machines Void and Unenforceable: In December 1984, MPH Company (MPH) contracted to purchase 24 "Poker All Keno" electronic gambling machine kits. The kits were delivered in March 1985, but by May and June 1985 had proved to be inoperable. MPH sued the manufacturer for breach of contract, breach of warranty, fraud, and bad faith. In lieu of trial, the parties stipulated that the machines contained design defects rendering them commercially unacceptable and constituting a breach of contract. The District Court awarded MPH $193,663, representing funds expended in satisfaction of the contract, plus $79,354 in prejudgment interest. The Supreme Court reversed after finding that at the time the parties entered into the contract, the machines were not authorized under Montana gambling law and were at best illegal slot machines. Because the machines were unlawful, the entire contract was void. A party to an illegal contract may not use the courts of this state to enforce the agreement. MPH Co. & Tropic Indus. v. Imagineering, Inc., 243 M 342, 792 P2d 1081, 47 St. Rep. 947 (1990).

Illegal Loan Agreement — Bar to Counterclaim: The Supreme Court upheld a District Court's grant of summary judgment, ruling that counterclaims arising out of an illegal loan agreement are barred. Powder River County Bank v. Arness-McGriffin Coal Co., 225 M 358, 732 P2d 1326, 44 St. Rep. 300 (1987).

Release and Subrogation as Single, Nonseverable Contract: Plaintiff was severely burned after a truck driven by an employee of H. Pierce Manufacturing Co. ran into the rear of her 1970 Ford Mustang, which caught fire. Plaintiff retained James Reno to represent her. Reno began negotiations with Pierce's insurer, St. Paul Fire and Marine Co. At the time Pierce was insured with St. Paul for up to $100,000 and with an excess carrier, Atlantic Co., for up to $2 million. Reno did not inquire as to what the excess carrier's coverage limits were. Reno and the adjuster agreed to a settlement entered by plaintiff for $300,000. Two separate documents consisting of the combined release and indemnification agreements and a subrogation agreement were executed. Reno agreed with the insurers to also pursue their interests against Ford. The insurers later retained independent counsel, and Reno filed an action against Ford. Ford sought to have the subrogation provision declared invalid. The release and subrogation agreements were so indivisible as to prevent enforcing one without the other, since both were offered in consideration of the settlement, and there was no way to allocate the settlement among the release, indemnification, and subrogation portions of the contract. Voiding the subrogation agreement requires voiding the entire release agreement. Abell v. Ford Motor Co., 39 St. Rep. 1347 (D.C. Mont. 1982) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Money Owed Under Unlawful Agreement to Transfer Radio Station: The plaintiff buyer and the defendant seller entered into a lease and sales right agreement for a radio station. Because the agreement contemplated a de facto transfer of the station without the consent of the Federal Communications Commission, it was unlawful and void. Because parties to an illegal contract cannot come into a court of law to have its illegal objects carried out, the defendant may keep the plaintiff's downpayment, the plaintiff may keep the accounts receivable he collected that were owned by the defendant, and the plaintiff need not pay unpaid rent owing to the defendant. McPartlin v. Fransen, 199 M 143, 648 P2d 729, 39 St. Rep. 1220 (1982).

Contract Provisions Ascertainable by Conduct of Parties: Where electrical contractor submitted a bid on a job based not on written specifications but on a previous similar job and the previous pattern of conduct between the parties indicated that both parties contemplated the rendering of particular services and materials, contract was not so ambiguous as to render its object wholly unascertainable. Mathis v. Daines, 196 M 252, 639 P2d 503, 39 St. Rep. 73 (1982).

When Contract Impossible or Void — Failure to Act on Defense as Harmless Error: A seller argued on appeal from a verdict for a purchaser in a breach of contract action that the cattle sales contract was void because he did not own the calves at the time of execution of the contract. The seller claimed the contract was wholly impossible and unlawful under this section. The Supreme Court said that the mere fact that a party contracts to sell something he does not own did not raise the defense of impossibility. The burden of proving impossibility rested on the party asserting it, and he had to show he took virtually every action within his powers to perform his duties under the contract. Here, the seller offered no evidence why it was impossible for him to obtain his wife's consent to the sale or to buy her out. The object of a contract had to be lawful when the contract was made and possible by the time the contract was to be performed. The District Court's failure to rule on the seller's motion for summary judgment on this ground was harmless error because the motion should have been denied. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

Contract Establishing Life Estate Not Void: A claim that under this section a contract for the sale of an apartment building which contains a provision reserving a life estate to appellant is impossible because appellant did not hold title to the property and thus could not reserve a life estate to herself cannot stand given the terms of the contract, which clearly indicate the agreed intention on the part of the titleholders that appellant be entitled to remain in possession of the property for the rest of her life. A reservation need not be implied on the part of the appellant. Harbeck v. Orr, 192 M 243, 627 P2d 1217, 38 St. Rep. 668 (1981).

Real Estate Listing — Capability of Performance — Sale by Cotenant: Plaintiff and defendant entered into a real estate listing agreement. Defendant was a cotenant in the property with her husband. The defendant contended that listing contained an erroneous asking price, did not adequately describe the property to be sold, and was signed only by the defendant. A cotenant in a joint tenancy has a right and ability to sell her interest. Defendant was free to act and capable of acting without her husband, even though the husband knew at all times that she had put the property up for sale. Because she was capable of entering and performing contracts and was legally responsible for her acts, the contract was fully capable of being performed. Barrett v. Ballard, 191 M 39, 622 P2d 180, 37 St. Rep. 2038 (1980).

Impossibility of Performance: A Montana contract for construction of a complete operating oil refinery to process Oregon Basin crude oil so as to yield 60% gasoline containing not more than 10% sulphur had but a single object and was void under 1-1-108, 1-1-109, 1-2-103, 28-2-601, this section, and section 10704, R.C.M. 1935 (since repealed), where it was impossible to obtain such a yield of gasoline, whether or not contractor knew or should have known of such impossibility, and contractor was entitled to a recovery on the quantum meruit. His bond did not permit recovery of damages, a collateral promise in the contract consisting of warranty was invalid and would not support action for breach of warranty, and contractor's lien was supported by the implied contract. Smith Eng'r Co. v. Rice, 102 F2d 492 (9th Cir. 1938).

Void When Prohibited by Statute: A contract expressly prohibited by a valid statute is void, and courts may not disregard such prohibition. Johnson v. Kaiser, 104 M 261, 65 P2d 1179 (1937), overruled on another point in Aitken v. Lane, 108 M 368, 92 P2d 628 (1939).

Wagering or Gambling Transactions — Grain Market: In order to invalidate a contract as a wagering or gambling transaction (instant case grain market transaction) both parties must have intended that instead of delivery of the article there should be a mere payment of the difference between the contract price and the market price, i.e., a settlement of the difference, and burden of proof is on the party assailing the transaction. H. Earl Clack Co. v. Oltesvig, 104 M 255, 68 P2d 586 (1937).

When Uncertainty Makes Contracts Void:

Agreement that is so vague and indefinite that it is impossible to collect from it the full intention of parties is void, since neither court nor jury can make agreement for parties. Schwartz v. Inspiration Gold Min. Co., 15 F. Supp. 1030 (D.C. Mont. 1936).

In an action to quiet title to an interest in a ditch and water right, based upon conversations had by plaintiff with defendant, for work done on the ditch by him, evidence of plaintiff as to the alleged contract was so indefinite and uncertain under this section as not to constitute an enforceable agreement, it not appearing therefrom what amount of work plaintiff was to perform or in which one of several ditches he was to have an interest. Thrasher v. Schreiber, 77 M 221, 250 P 600 (1926).

A covenant in a lease of a building which required the lessee to complete the upstairs portion thereof without any specifications as to how it was to be completed, whether for office, living room, or storage purposes, or as to the kinds of materials to be used, etc., was so vague and uncertain as to be incapable of enforcement and therefore void under this section. Alderson v. Republican-Courier Co., 69 M 271, 221 P 544 (1923).

A lease of agricultural lands which did not impose upon either party the work of preparing them for crops or provide who should furnish seed, bear the expense of harvesting, extra help, etc., was not void for uncertainty, it being implied under 28-3-702 from the fact that the lessees were to have possession for the purpose of producing crops, that they were to do these things. McDonald v. McNinch, 63 M 308, 206 P 1096 (1922).

In an action for damages for breach of a lease of farm lands by the lessors, the lease was not void for uncertainty for failing minutely to describe a building site and right-of-way reserved by the lessors, where it was apparent therefrom that the burden of selecting them within a reasonable time was upon the lessors and that they themselves had caused the uncertainty to exist. McDonald v. McNinch, 63 M 308, 206 P 1096 (1922).

In an action by a lessor to recover his share of grain, alleged to have been raised by the defendant under a contract of lease of agricultural land, the only definite portion of which was that which secured to defendant, without naming a consideration, the possession of the land for a specified time but which did not bind him to do anything or raise any grain, the contract was void for uncertainty. Schwab v. McVey, 54 M 422, 171 P 277 (1918).

Where it could not be determined from a printed order blank containing many pages and covering a large variety of jewelry how many articles of a particular kind and price had been ordered, the memorandum of sale was so indefinite and uncertain as to make it unenforceable at law. Price v. Stipek, 39 M 426, 104 P 195 (1909).

Duty of Parties in Contracting:

The parties to a contract must express themselves in terms direct and explicit enough to enable their full intention to be ascertained to a reasonable degree of certainty. Evankovich v. Howard Pierce, Inc., 91 M 344, 8 P2d 653 (1932).

In order that a contract may be enforceable, the parties must express themselves in terms direct and explicit enough to enable their full intention to be ascertained to a reasonable degree of certainty. Schwab v. McVey, 54 M 422, 171 P 277 (1918).

28-2-604. When contract partially void.

Case Notes

Unenforceability of Part of Noncompetition Covenant: The District Court found that part of a noncompetition covenant was void. Tucker argued that the District Court erred in not ruling that an entire noncompetition covenant was void and that he was entitled to a refund for the full amount paid for the covenant. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had properly applied the "blue pencil approach" in limiting the covenant to the contiguous counties and, in so doing, did not void the covenant in its entirety. Dumont v. Tucker, 250 M 417, 822 P2d 96, 48 St. Rep. 996 (1991).

Limitation on Tax-Free Exchange Clause: Defendants contacted plaintiff to sell their ranch. The agreement allowed for a multiple listing. An interested buyer was found. Later a tax-free property exchange clause was inserted in the contract. Defendants located property in Arizona, but the buyer would not purchase it for exchange because of a defect in defendants' title. The Arizona property was sold before defendants cleared their title. Defendants eventually sold their property to the buyer. Defendants refused to pay the realtor commission, and a suit was filed. Defendants counterclaimed against the buyer for refusing to purchase the Arizona property pursuant to the exchange clause. The District Court refused defendants' offered instructions on alleged breach of the exchange clause. On appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the District Court, saying that as drafted the exchange clause placed an unreasonable burden on the buyer. The buyer could have been forced to exchange for an unmerchantable title. The court held the exchange clause in the contract invalid. The court did not reject the use of exchange clauses in real estate contracts but said they should be conditioned so as to require merchantability to be proven before the buyer must obligate himself to purchase exchange property. Adams v. Cheney, 203 M 187, 661 P2d 434, 40 St. Rep. 383 (1983).

Illegal Objects and Provisions

Part Case Notes

Shared Well Agreement Valid Despite Subdivision Requirement for Individual Wells When Approved by State and County Regulators: Despite conditions in the subdivision certificate that called for individual water wells on each tract, the predecessors in interest to the Williamses and the Schwagers entered a shared water well agreement that endured between the tract owners for about 20 years. The subdivision certificate was approved by both the state and county. A disagreement arose between the Williamses and the Schwagers regarding use of the shared well, and the Williamses sought to enjoin the Schwagers from interfering with the well. The Schwagers responded that the well was in violation of the subdivision certificate and that the shared water well agreement was thus void. The District Court concluded that the agreement was valid and enforceable, and granted the Williamses' injunction. The Schwagers appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The agreement was not void ab initio because the subdivision certificate was approved as required prior to installation of the water system, nor was the agreement illegal per se, because a county health department official testified that the parties could still obtain approval for a shared well, which was encouraged by the county in cases in which sufficient water existed, despite the requirement in the subdivision certificate that called for individual water systems. Further, the Schwagers could not attempt to benefit from repudiating the contract after previously accepting the benefits of the agreement in the form of water fees from the Williamses, and the District Court did not err in enforcing the agreement. Williams v. Schwager, 2002 MT 107, 309 M 455, 47 P3d 839 (2002).

Validity of Alleged Forfeiture Upheld — Necessity of Right in Property: Where the plaintiff and defendant entered into a commission contract providing that the defendant would not pay any commission to the plaintiff unless the purchaser of the defendant's property fulfilled its duties under a contract for deed, the Supreme Court held that the failure of the defendant to pay a portion of the plaintiff's commission did not constitute an unlawful forfeiture. In order for there to be a forfeiture, the plaintiff in this case must, under the rationale of Ridgeway v. City of Akron, 42 NE2d 724 (Ohio Ct. App., 1940), have a right in the commission. No such right could arise as the condition precedent had not been satisfied, and there was therefore no forfeiture. Martin v. Community Gas & Oil Co., 205 M 394, 668 P2d 243, 40 St. Rep. 1385 (1983).

Medical Payment Subrogation Clauses in Insurance Policies — Invalid: Welton was insured by Allstate when she was injured in an accident caused by Reitler. Allstate paid Welton $2,000 for the medical expenses she incurred as a result of the accident. Welton also received a $9,500 settlement from Reitler. Allstate then brought suit against Reitler to recover the $2,000 it paid Welton under a subrogation clause in its policy with Welton. The Supreme Court held that medical payment subrogation clauses are invalid and unenforceable. Allstate Ins. Co. v. Reitler, 192 M 351, 628 P2d 667, 38 St. Rep. 821 (1981), clarified in Youngblood v. Am. St. Ins. Co., 262 M 391, 866 P2d 203, 50 St. Rep. 1601 (1993). See also Farmers Ins. Exch. v. Christenson, 211 M 250, 683 P2d 1319, 41 St. Rep. 1342 (1984). However, see Scheafer v. Safeco Ins. Co., 2014 MT 73, 374 Mont. 278, 320 P.3d 967, holding that a requirement that primary coverage be exhausted before secondary insurance coverage is triggered is not subrogation.

Third Party May Not Question Legality: While either party to an agreement may raise the question of its illegality, it may not be invoked by a third party. Owens v. Davenport, 39 M 555, 104 P 682 (1909).

VIOLATION OF STATUTE

Terms of Plea Agreement Illegal — Defendant Not Entitled to Specific Performance of Plea Agreement: The defendant entered into a plea agreement under which he would receive a deferred sentence. Later, however, it was learned that he did not qualify for a deferred sentence and the District Court instead imposed a suspended sentence. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the terms of the plea agreement were illegal and unenforceable and the defendant was therefore not entitled to specific performance of the agreement. St. v. Cleveland, 2014 MT 305, 377 Mont. 97, 338 P.3d 606.

Failure to Conform With Literal Language of Administrative Rule Not Illegal and Therefore Not Justification for Breach of Contract: Lewis subcontracted to do the electrical work on five units being built by Huyser. In the first four units, some of the rough-in wiring was covered, but the electrical inspector did not require that all the wiring be visible even though the literal language of the administrative rule indicated that it should be. On the fifth unit, shelving had been installed before the inspection. Lewis insisted that it all be taken down, claiming that he could lose his license if it was not. Huyser had some of the shelving removed, exposing some of the rough-in wiring. Lewis refused to complete the work, and Huyser hired another electrician to complete the job. Lewis sued for payment, and Huyser counterclaimed. The lower court found for Huyser on the basis that the inspector had informed Lewis that he would not lose his license and that the inspector would accept part of the rough-in wiring being exposed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the administrative rule should be reasonably interpreted to allow for waiver by the inspector of the requirement that all rough-in wiring be exposed. The Supreme Court further held that violation of the rule was not a statutory ground for losing an electrical license. The rule having been waived, the contract was not contrary to the policy of express law so that Lewis had a good faith duty to perform the remainder of the contract. Lewis v. Huyser, 264 M 141, 870 P2d 95, 51 St. Rep. 192 (1994).

Employment Contract for Performance of Embryo Transfers by Nonveterinarian Void for Illegal Purpose: Employment contracts entered into in 1980 by an embryonics corporation and two persons who were not veterinarians, for the performance of bovine embryo transfers in Montana, were contracts for the illegal purpose of unauthorized practice of veterinary medicine and were therefore void. Actions arising from alleged breach of the contracts were unenforceable. Portable Embryonics, Inc. v. J.P. Genetics, Inc., 248 M 242, 810 P2d 1197, 48 St. Rep. 415 (1991).

Failure to Pay Wage Rates Prescribed in Contract — Employer Liable for Penalties: Contractors appealed from a District Court order, arguing that because wage rates were not adopted in compliance with administrative procedures, inclusion constituted an illegal provision in the contract with which contractors were not required to comply. The Supreme Court held that contractors were legally bound to pay the wage rates agreed to by all parties and contained in a voluntarily executed contract. Lix v. Kenney, 246 M 426, 804 P2d 391, 48 St. Rep. 23 (1991).

Contract for Sale of Illegal Slot Machines Void and Unenforceable: In December 1984, MPH Company (MPH) contracted to purchase 24 "Poker All Keno" electronic gambling machine kits. The kits were delivered in March 1985, but by May and June 1985 had proved to be inoperable. MPH sued the manufacturer for breach of contract, breach of warranty, fraud, and bad faith. In lieu of trial, the parties stipulated that the machines contained design defects rendering them commercially unacceptable and constituting a breach of contract. The District Court awarded MPH $193,663, representing funds expended in satisfaction of the contract, plus $79,354 in prejudgment interest. The Supreme Court reversed after finding that at the time the parties entered into the contract, the machines were not authorized under Montana gambling law and were at best illegal slot machines. Because the machines were unlawful, the entire contract was void. A party to an illegal contract may not use the courts of this state to enforce the agreement. MPH Co. & Tropic Indus. v. Imagineering, Inc., 243 M 342, 792 P2d 1081, 47 St. Rep. 947 (1990).

Contract Made Without License: The District Court erred in concluding that the contract entered into between the parties was illegal and therefore void. Appellant admits that it did not have a public contractor's license as required by statute when it accepted the bid proposal. It admits that it may have violated the law and may be assessed a misdemeanor fine. Nowhere in the statutes is it declared that a contract made without a license is unenforceable or void. Taurman v. Cascade, 192 M 529, 629 P2d 226, 38 St. Rep. 906 (1981).

Public Policy: The absence of "omnibus" coverage in a liability insurance policy with car dealer is not violative of public policy if there is no violation of any statute. Universal Underwriters Ins. Co. v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 166 M 128, 531 P2d 668 (1975).

Contract to Extinguish Tax Liability: A resolution of the Board of County Commissioners which extinguished the assessed tax of a taxpayer was void because such Boards have no power, authority, or jurisdiction under the 1889 Montana Constitution or statutes to reduce, compromise, remit, release, cancel, diminish, or extinguish any state tax, obligation, or liability, or any assessed tax valuation or percentage assignments of property after the same has been found, determined, and fixed by the State Board of Equalization (now State Tax Appeal Board). Likewise, the direction of the Board directing the County Attorney to stipulate with the attorneys for the taxpayer, to request the court to enter judgment against the county and state was and is wholly void and of no legality whatever. Such void act, understanding, or agreement by public officials, void in its inception, is not validated by performance and remains a void act or agreement under the public policy established by the Legislature. Carlson v. Flathead County, 130 M 36, 293 P2d 279 (1956).

Contract Not to Contravene Law: Plaintiff entered a lease on certain mining claims with a lessee. Lessee operated the mines pursuant to the lease. Pursuant to the lease, what would normally be treated as royalty payments were called purchase money payments. The court held that the payments were subject to taxation, as a law established for a public reason cannot be contravened by private contract. Silver Bell Min. Co. v. Lewis & Clark County, 129 M 269, 284 P2d 1012 (1955).

Contracts Violating Statutes: Contracts made in violation of express statutes are contrary to public policy and void. Hutterian Brethren v. Haas, 116 F. Supp. 37 (D.C. Mont. 1953); Hames v. Polson, 123 M 469, 215 P2d 950 (1950); Glass v. Basin & Bay St. Min. Co., 31 M 21, 77 P 302 (1904).

Law Cannot Prohibit and Enforce Contract: A broker in the state of Illinois there entered into a contract with an oil well owner operating in Montana to sell stock of the company in which the latter was interested. The Securities Act of Illinois required that before stock of the kind in question could be sold, certain information relative thereto had to be filed with the Secretary of State and declared sales made in that disregard of the requirements of the Act a misdemeanor. The broker sold the stock notwithstanding that the first-mentioned provisions had not been complied with and forwarded the proceeds to his principal in Montana without deducting his commission. The stock thereafter increased greatly in value. In an action by the broker for breach of contract for failure of payment of the commission, the court held that the contract was void, since it was expressly prohibited by a valid statute, and the law cannot at the same time prohibit a contract and enforce it. McManus v. Fulton, 85 M 170, 278 P 126, 67 ALR 690 (1929).

Lawful Contracts Void When Object Becomes Unlawful: A contract under which defendant was granted the right to use a patented process for dealcoholizing malt beverages which was lawful when it was first entered into became unlawful when the prohibition law took effect (December 31, 1918) and was void thereafter insofar as it remained executory, thereby depriving plaintiff patent owner of his remedy to recover under a clause of the contract providing that, in addition to a certain royalty per barrel of beverage manufactured, defendant should pay for the use of the process not less than $500 per year for 3 years from and after December 18, 1917. Baltimore Process Co. v. Red Lodge Brewing Co., 66 M 407, 213 P 798 (1923).

Contract Contrary to Law: A statute requiring the County Commissioners to contract with a newspaper of general circulation published within the county for the county printing, including blanks and blank books, was a prohibition against contracting with any other than a newspaper of the county, and any contract in derogation thereof is void. Hill County v. Shaw & Borden Co., 225 F 475 (9th Cir. 1915).

VIOLATION OF PUBLIC POLICY

Limited Exceptions for Only One Party Insufficient to Render Arbitration Clause Facially Unconscionable: A contract between the defendant-appellee and a third-party provider ("TPP") of home automation products allowing remote control over property access, HVAC, and hot water systems included a clause requiring the parties to arbitrate disputes, with two narrow exceptions, both of which would allow the TPP to seek relief in court in lieu of arbitration. The District Court held that the arbitration clause was unenforceable because the exceptions unreasonably favored the TPP, resulting in a lack of mutuality. The Supreme Court disagreed and upheld the arbitration clause. The two exceptions allowed the TPP to join the defendant-appellee as a third-party defendant for purposes of enforcing the contract indemnification provisions and allowed the TPP to seek injunctive relief if the defendant-appellee breached the contract with respect to the TPP's intellectual property, proprietary rights, or business reputation. The Supreme Court held that the defendant-appellee and TPP were dissimilarly situated such that the defendant-appellee had no need for either of the narrow exceptions. Therefore, the limited exceptions being available only for the TPP was insufficient to show the arbitration agreement was lacking in mutual consideration or was otherwise unconscionable. Stowe v. Big Sky Vacation Rentals, Inc., 2019 MT 288, 398 Mont. 91, 454 P.3d 655.

Choice of Law — Nonbeneficiary Third Party Cannot Assert Defenses and Counterclaims Arising From Contract: The defendant set up Limegrove Corporation for tax purposes, and he informally ran the day-to-day operations. Limegrove's sole shareholder was a trust for the defendant's children. To secure a property loan for a Montana-based property to be held by Limegrove, the defendant signed a promissory note and a term loan agreement, both subject to New York law, and Limegrove and the plaintiff bank signed a trust indenture security agreement subject to Montana law. Because judicial foreclosures must occur where the property is located, the parties correctly agreed that the subsequent foreclosure action on the property was governed by Montana law, but the parties disagreed on which state governed the defendant's defenses and counterclaims. Because the defendant was not a party to the trust indenture, his defenses and counterclaims could not arise from it, and because New York law did not offend Montana public policy, the District Court did not err in concluding that New York law governed the defendant's defenses and counterclaims. HSBC Bank USA, N.A. v. Anderson, 2017 MT 257, 389 Mont. 106, 406 P.3d 416.

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977), and Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236 (1999).

Subrogation of Medical Payments Under Motor Vehicle Insurance Policy — Against Public Policy: Subrogation is an equitable doctrine that is not dependent on privity or on a contractual relationship between the parties. Its purpose is to prevent injustice by compelling the ultimate payment of a debt by the one who, in justice, equity, and good conscience, should pay it, and it is an appropriate means of preventing unjust enrichment. Subrogation is distinguishable from assignment of a claim. With some exceptions, subrogation between an insurer and an insured up to the amount the insurer actually paid is allowed if the insured has been fully compensated, including compensation for costs and attorney fees. One exception is a motor vehicle insurance medical payments subrogation clause, which violates public policy because the insured paid a premium for medical coverage, the insured is the one likely to suffer most if medical payments received must be repaid out of a third-party recovery, and the tortfeasor's insurer may believe that the injured insured has already been paid medical expenses and that the insurer can thus make a smaller offer on the basis that medical payments have already been made. Youngblood v. Am. St. Ins. Co., 262 M 391, 866 P2d 203, 50 St. Rep. 1601 (1993).

Effect of "As Is" Clause in Used Car Sales Agreement: When defendant failed to inspect a car for defects before sale to plaintiff and the defect that was the proximate cause of plaintiff's accident and subsequent injuries would have been discovered in a reasonable safety inspection, defendant should not be allowed to hide behind the cloak of a simple "as is" disclaimer. Public policy requires a used car dealer to inspect the cars he sells and to make sure they are in safe, working condition. Kopischke v. First Cont. Corp., 187 M 471, 610 P2d 668 (1980).

Release From Liability Void as Contrary to Public Policy: This section, together with 1-3-204 and 27-1-701, was broad enough to render illegal any exculpatory clause or release relieving a potential tortfeasor from all liability for future negligent conduct where such clause or release was contrary to public policy or against the public interest. Release relieving county fair board from any liability to livestock while on fairgrounds was illegal and unenforceable as contrary to public policy and against public interest and precluded the county from disclaiming liability in a negligence action for exhibitor's horses killed in a barn fire on county fairgrounds. The suppression of the release in exhibitor's negligence action was not error or ground for new trial. Haynes v. County of Missoula, 163 M 270, 517 P2d 370 (1973).

Public Officer — Interest in Contract: Contracts entered by a city in which a city officer was interested may be avoided at the instance of any party except the public officer. These contracts were merely voidable and were not legally void until declared so. Grady v. Livingston, 115 M 47, 141 P2d 346 (1943).

Circumvention of "Scale-Down" Agreement by Farmer's Creditor: Where a farmer's creditor, after signing a so-called "scale-down" agreement required under the Emergency Farm Mortgage Act as a prerequisite to a loan to the farmer, whereby he agreed to accept partial payment of his claim in full settlement of the farmer's obligation, thereafter required the farmer's son-in-law to execute a note as accommodation maker for the difference between the settlement and the amount of the claim, the note amounted to a fraud upon the bank, the debtor, and his creditors and was void as against public policy, and the creditor was not a holder in due course. May v. Whitbeck, 111 M 568, 113 P2d 332 (1941).

Public Policy Not to Prohibit Lawful Contracts: A state may not, under the guise of protecting the public by the exercise of its police power, arbitrarily interfere with private business or prohibit lawful occupations or impose unreasonable or unnecessary restrictions upon them. The fact that unscrupulous men may enter into fraudulent contracts respecting a lawful business, in this case burial contracts not made in contemplation of imminent death, is not alone a sufficient ground for the Legislature to prohibit lawful contracts respecting that business, under the police power, by declaring such contracts void as against public policy. St. v. Gateway Mortuaries, Inc., 87 M 225, 287 P 156, 68 ALR 1512 (1930).

Contract Increasing Taxable Property Not Illegal: A contract between a Board of County Commissioners and an individual under which the latter agreed to furnish the Board information which would enable the placing of a large amount of property on the assessment roll which had escaped taxation is one which affects the public welfare beneficially, not adversely, and is therefore not void as against public policy. Simpson v. Silver Bow County, 87 M 83, 285 P 195 (1930).

Determination of Fees by Probate Judge Not Contrary to Public Policy: A contract between an attorney and the administratrix, under which the amount of the fees to which the former should be entitled for services rendered to the latter in her representative capacity, was to be determined by the judge of the probate court, was not void as against public policy on the ground that it contemplated the doing of an extrajudicial or unlawful act by the judge. Fitzgerald v. Eisenhauer, 62 M 582, 206 P 685 (1922).

Contract to Influence Legal Process: A contract between an attorney and one convicted of the crime of introducing intoxicating liquors on an Indian reservation, under which the former should use his personal influence and friendship with a U.S. District Attorney to secure from the latter a recommendation for the convict's pardon, was void as against public policy, the facts that unlawful means in carrying out the contract were not resorted to or contemplated and that no injustice resulted to anyone from the execution of the contract being immaterial. Spaulding v. Maillet, 57 M 318, 188 P 377 (1920).

Exemption From Liability: A provision in a contract to exempt another from liability for violation of law is void as contrary to public policy. Since the provision was not severable, the entire contract was void. Cooper v. N. Pac. Ry., 212 F 533 (D.C. Mont. 1914).

Future Possible Violation of Public Policy Disregarded: A court of equity will not lend its aid to carrying the object of an illegal contract into effect; neither will it declare an agreement which is fair and just as between the parties and under a specific enforcement of which each party will receive what he agreed he should receive void as against public policy because at the time of its execution one of the parties claimed that by virtue of its terms he would be enabled to defraud a third party. Murray v. White, 42 M 423, 113 P 754 (1910).

VIOLATION OF MORALS

When Equity Will Uphold Separation Agreement Made Prior to Divorce: The husband, prior to divorce, had entered into a separation agreement under which he agreed to pay his wife a monthly sum, and thereafter she brought suit to enforce payment thereof. He alleged in his answer that the agreement was executed collusively in aid of the subsequent divorce and was therefore void as against public policy. Because the answer did not state a defense under prior holdings of the court, the court granted the wife judgment on the pleadings under the rule of equity that he could not accept the benefits and shirk the burdens, particularly where she relinquished her property rights. Ryan v. Ryan, 111 M 104, 106 P2d 337 (1940).

Contract Suppressing Investigation of Criminal Offense Illegal: A contract which tends to suppress the investigation of a criminal offense is illegal, even though it does not amount to compounding of a felony, for the reason that it is contrary to good morals and public policy. Portland Cattle Loan Co. v. Featherly, 74 M 531, 241 P 322 (1925).

MISCELLANEOUS

Arbitration Requirement Not Void or Unconscionable Under Circumstances: A former financial advisor sought to have an arbitration agreement set aside under theories of lack of mutuality, lack of explicit waiver of Montana constitutional rights, and unconscionability. Upon review of the case and after extensive discussion of its circumstances, the Supreme Court disagreed with all such contentions. Bucy v. Edward Jones & Co., 2019 MT 173, 396 Mont. 408, 445 P.3d 812.

Insurance Company Indemnification Agreement Valid — Partial Summary Judgment on Pleadings Proper: The District Court did not err in granting partial summary judgment on the pleadings to a plaintiff insurance company. The District Court properly limited its decision on partial summary judgment to the issue of whether the indemnity agreements allowed the plaintiff to seek indemnity for appropriate expenses while reserving the issue of damages and the amount of damages for the trier of fact. Moreover, the indemnity agreements did not violate 28-2-701 and 28-2-702 because they did not provide the plaintiff with carte blanche indemnification and the defendant insured was not required to indemnify the plaintiff for any illegal actions. Ohio Farmers Ins. Co. v. Jem Contracting, Inc., 2016 MT 343, 386 Mont. 49, 386 P.3d 613.

Severance Agreement Legal — Violation of Employer's Policy Not Violation of Law: The plaintiff and her former employer, the Department of Military Affairs, entered into a severance agreement in which the Department agreed to lay off the plaintiff instead of terminating her in exchange for her releasing any claims she had against the Department. Months later, the plaintiff sued to have the agreement rescinded, claiming that the agreement violated the Department's reduction in force policy and was therefore unlawful. The District Court granted summary judgment to the Department. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that even if the agreement violated the Department's reduction in force policy, the policy was not law. Fenwick v. St., 2016 MT 80, 383 Mont. 151, 369 P.3d 1011.

Defective Trust Indenture: The trust indenture in this case is a defective trust indenture which will be enforced between the parties as an equitable lien, but the lien of such defective trust indenture is subordinate to the claims of subsequent encumbrancers and of judgment creditors who extended credit subsequent to the date of the instrument without actual knowledge of the existence of the indenture. Amsterdam Lumber, Inc. v. Dyksterhouse, 179 M 133, 586 P2d 705 (1978).

Failure of Corporation to Possess Articles of Incorporation: Failure of a corporation to possess articles of incorporation until 21 days after the execution of the contract with the state does not constitute an illegal purpose which would void the agreement from its inception. On the contrary, this defect rendered the contract voidable at the state's option. Mont. Ass'n of Underwriters v. Dept. of Admin., 172 M 211, 563 P2d 577 (1977).

Exception to Illegal Contracts — Enforceability: While generally a party to an illegal contract will not be permitted to enforce it, an exception uniformly accepted by the courts is that where refusal to enforce would produce a harmful effect on parties for whose protection the law making the transaction illegal was enacted, enforcement is allowed. Fergus County v. Osweiler, 107 M 466, 86 P2d 410, 120 ALR 1457 (1938).

One Unlawful Act — Entire Contract Void Where Single Consideration: Where there is but a single consideration passing for the performance of several separate and distinct acts, one of which is unlawful, the entire contract, it not being severable, is void, particularly where it is wholly executory. In re Cummings' Estate, 89 M 405, 298 P 350 (1931).

Failure to Perform Legal Duty: A failure to perform an act imposed by law as an absolute duty is an unlawful omission. Conway v. Monidah Trust, 47 M 269, 132 P 26 (1913).

County Printing Contract: A contract for county printing for the 2 succeeding years made by a Board of County Commissioners a few weeks before the expiration of its term of office and upon the expiration of a prior contract is valid in the absence of fraud or bad faith in the making. Picket Pub. Co. v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 36 M 188, 92 P 524 (1907).

Contract Limiting Liability for Loss of Baggage Valid: A contract by a railway company with a passenger, limiting the liability of the carrier to $100 for loss of baggage, is valid. Rose v. N. Pac. Ry. Co., 35 M 70, 88 P 767 (1907).

28-2-702. Contracts that violate policy of law — exemption from responsibility — exception.

2015 Amendment: Chapter 410 at beginning inserted exception clause; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective May 5, 2015.

Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 410, L. 2015, provided: "WHEREAS, the citizens of Montana and visitors to this state should enjoy the maximum ability to participate in sports or recreational opportunities; and

WHEREAS, public, private, and nonprofit entities that provide sports or recreational opportunities to citizens and visitors to this state need and deserve a measure of protection against lawsuits; and

WHEREAS, citizens and visitors to this state have a fundamental right and responsibility to make decisions concerning the activities in which they participate and the contracts and agreements in which they desire to enter; and

WHEREAS, individuals are accustomed to making conscious choices on their own behalf regarding the benefits and risks of various activities that are available; and

WHEREAS, such choices, when voluntarily made upon consideration of appropriate information, should not be ignored, but should be afforded the same value and legal effect as other choices and contractual obligations; and

WHEREAS, prospective liability waivers and releases encourage the availability and affordability of sports and recreational opportunities to citizens and visitors; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature intends to encourage the continued availability of sports or recreational opportunities in this state by shielding providers of such activities from claims resulting from conduct that constitutes ordinary negligence or for risks that are inherent in the sport or recreational opportunity; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature does not intend for liability waivers and releases to be used in a manner that would allow a person to waive or release claims for willful, wanton, reckless, or grossly negligent acts or omissions."

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Contract Limiting Liability Between Businesses — Enforceable: A contract containing a clause that limits liability, rather than eliminates liability, between two business entities that have equal bargaining power does not violate this section. Zirkelbach Constr., Inc. v. Dowl, LLC, 2017 MT 238, 389 Mont. 8, 402 P.3d 1244.

Insurance Company Indemnification Agreement Valid — Partial Summary Judgment on Pleadings Proper: The District Court did not err in granting partial summary judgment on the pleadings to a plaintiff insurance company. The District Court properly limited its decision on partial summary judgment to the issue of whether the indemnity agreements allowed the plaintiff to seek indemnity for appropriate expenses while reserving the issue of damages and the amount of damages for the trier of fact. Moreover, the indemnity agreements did not violate 28-2-701 and 28-2-702 because they did not provide the plaintiff with carte blanche indemnification and the defendant insured was not required to indemnify the plaintiff for any illegal actions. Ohio Farmers Ins. Co. v. Jem Contracting, Inc., 2016 MT 343, 386 Mont. 49, 386 P.3d 613.

Indemnity Agreement Redundant of Protection Afforded by Contributory Negligence: Langemo had an agreement with Montana Rail Link and Burlington Northern Santa Fe Railroad to establish access via a private railroad crossing to Langemo's property. After Langemo was injured at the crossing, the railroads counterclaimed against Langemo for indemnification pursuant to the private crossing agreement. The District Court held that although this section precluded the railroads from being indemnified for their own negligence, the indemnity agreement was enforceable as applied to Langemo's negligent acts or omissions and allowed the railroads to enforce their indemnity claim at the same time that they claimed the right to a reduction in Langemo's damage award based on contributory negligence. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the indemnity agreement was redundant of the protection afforded by the contributory negligence statute. Langemo's recovery would already be reduced by any negligence attributable to Langemo, so the railroads could not rely on additional protection from the indemnity agreement. Langemo v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2001 MT 273, 307 M 293, 38 P3d 782 (2001).

Liability Exemption Distinguished From Contractual Indemnification: Liss had a homeowner's policy with Safeco Insurance Co. (Safeco) that covered personal liability and medical payments to others. Liss shot Bruthers and claimed that it was an accident and that she was involuntarily intoxicated, but she was nevertheless convicted of aggravated assault after pleading nolo contendere. Bruthers was a nonresident and filed a federal action for compensation for physical injuries, emotional distress, and punitive damages, but eventually dropped the intentional tort claim. Liss gave Safeco a copy of the complaint, and Safeco provided Liss a defense under the personal liability provisions of the homeowner's policy. Safeco then filed a declaratory action, claiming that it had no duty to defend Liss in federal court or to indemnify Liss, based on its theory that: (1) Montana policy and this section forbid the contractual indemnification of an individual for intentional and illegal acts; (2) the shooting did not constitute an occurrence as defined in the policy; (3) the intentional act and illegal act exclusions barred coverage; and (4) Liss was collaterally estopped to contest the issue based on the guilty plea. Safeco's motion was granted by summary judgment based on policy provisions excluding intentional and illegal acts from personal liability coverage and the undisputed fact that Liss pleaded guilty to aggravated assault. Both Liss and Bruthers appealed. The Supreme Court noted that a contract whose object is to exempt a person from future potential liability is clearly distinguishable from an insurance contract that indemnifies a person for another party's damages once liability is imposed. Therefore, Safeco's duty to defend and indemnify Liss could not be excused by a declaratory judgment based on public policy in this section. The question of whether the shooting incident constituted an insurable occurrence or accident remained shrouded in material facts and was inappropriate grounds for summary judgment. The shooting did not fall within the nexus of the per se intentional act case law, absent an admission or substantial evidence establishing the intent of the insured. Lastly, Safeco presented no evidence other than Liss's guilty plea to satisfy its burden of proof that Liss either intentionally shot Bruthers or that the shooting was an illegal act, so the Supreme Court addressed whether a nolo contendere guilty plea in a criminal matter is conclusive proof of intent or illegality and precludes relitigation of the issues in a subsequent civil proceeding. The court applied the three-part collateral estoppel rule in Teitelbaum Furs, Inc. v. Dominion Ins. Co., 375 P2d 439 (Calif. 1962), and Aetna Life & Cas. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 207 M 409, 673 P2d 1277 (1984), the second prong of which requires a final judgment on the merits. A guilty plea as a matter of law fails the test because a guilty plea does not constitute a final judgment, so in this case, the plea to aggravated assault carried no collateral estoppel effect in the subsequent civil proceedings. Summary judgment was improper, and the case was remanded. Safeco Ins. Co. of America v. Liss, 2000 MT 380, 303 M 519, 16 P3d 399, 57 St. Rep. 1621 (2000).

Certified Questions — Settlement or Judgment Not Required as Precondition to Action Against Insurer — Unfair Claims Settlement Practices Action Not Barred by Terms of Policy: In an original proceeding pursuant to former Rule 44, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), the Supreme Court responded to two certified questions from the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals and held that an insured need not pursue the underlying claim to the point of settlement or judgment before bringing an action against the insurer under the unfair claims settlement practices statutes codified in Title 33, ch. 18. This was true, notwithstanding a "no action" clause in the insurance policy, because the clause was contrary to public policy. The Supreme Court also held that the insured was not barred by the "no action" clause of the policy from bringing an action under the unfair claims settlement practices statutes when the company did not object to direct settlement between the plaintiff and insured in the underlying action and when the insurer contributed the policy limits to that settlement. Peris v. Safeco Ins. Co., 276 M 486, 916 P2d 780, 53 St. Rep. 481 (1996).

Pre-Injury Release Form: The trial court committed reversible error by granting summary judgment to defendant employer on the basis of a pre-injury release form signed by the plaintiff. The fact the waiver is a private contract is not determinative in this case. Such waiver is invalid and violates public policy if it seeks to exempt one from liability for those actions specified in 28-2-702. Miller v. Fallon County, 222 M 214, 721 P2d 342, 43 St. Rep. 1185 (1986).

Release and Subrogation as Single, Nonseverable Contract: Plaintiff was severely burned after a truck driven by an employee of H. Pierce Manufacturing Co. ran into the rear of her 1970 Ford Mustang, which caught fire. Plaintiff retained James Reno to represent her. Reno began negotiations with Pierce's insurer, St. Paul Fire and Marine Co. At the time Pierce was insured with St. Paul for up to $100,000 and with an excess carrier, Atlantic Co., for up to $2 million. Reno did not inquire as to what the excess carrier's coverage limits were. Reno and the adjuster agreed to a settlement entered by plaintiff for $300,000. Two separate documents consisting of the combined release and indemnification agreements and a subrogation agreement were executed. Reno agreed with the insurers to also pursue their interests against Ford. The insurers later retained independent counsel, and Reno filed an action against Ford. Ford sought to have the subrogation provision declared invalid. The release and subrogation agreements were so indivisible as to prevent enforcing one without the other, since both were offered in consideration of the settlement, and there was no way to allocate the settlement among the release, indemnification, and subrogation portions of the contract. Voiding the subrogation agreement requires voiding the entire release agreement. Abell v. Ford Motor Co., 39 St. Rep. 1347 (D.C. Mont. 1982) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Subrogation Agreement Void: Plaintiff was severely burned after a truck driven by an employee of H. Pierce Manufacturing Co. ran into the rear of her 1970 Ford Mustang, which caught fire. Plaintiff retained James Reno to represent her. Reno began negotiations with Pierce's insurer, St. Paul Fire and Marine Co. At the time Pierce was insured with St. Paul for up to $100,000 and with an excess carrier, Atlantic Co., for up to $2 million. Reno did not inquire as to what the excess carrier's coverage limits were. Reno and the adjuster agreed to a settlement entered by plaintiff for $300,000. Two separate documents consisting of the combined release and indemnification agreements and a subrogation agreement were executed. Reno agreed with the insurers to also pursue their interests against Ford. The insurers later retained independent counsel, and Reno filed an action against Ford. Ford contended the release agreement was champertous. Champerty occurs when a person who is without interest in a suit intrudes into litigation by agreeing to defray the expenses of the suit in consideration of a share of the recovery. Memos and letters of the adjusters and the insurance personnel reveal clearly that both the insurers and Reno contemplated using the settlement to launch a lawsuit against Ford. The subrogation agreement was an attempt by the insurers to avoid their own liability. It is champertous, against public policy, and void. Abell v. Ford Motor Co., 39 St. Rep. 1347 (D.C. Mont. 1982) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Workers' Compensation: The exclusionary clause in 39-71-411 of the Workers' Compensation Act, as part of virtually all employment contracts in the state, is not a contract prohibited by this section. Great W. Sugar Co. v. District Court, 188 M 1, 610 P2d 717 (1980).

Specific Indemnity Clause in Lease: A specific indemnity clause in a lease agreement between a railroad and a lessee, which clause provided that the lessee would indemnify the railroad for claims "whether due or not due to the negligence" of the railroad, was not invalid as applied to the allegations in a complaint by a person seeking recovery from the railroad for injuries allegedly received because of a violation by the railroad of 69-14-562 (now repealed), making it a misdemeanor for a railroad to permit a locomotive to approach a crossing without giving a proper warning. Ryan Mercantile Co. v. Great N. Ry., 186 F. Supp. 660 (D.C. Mont. 1960), affirmed in Ryan Mercantile Co. v. Great N. Ry., 294 F2d 629 (9th Cir. 1961).

Exception — Where Illegal Contract Enforceable: Where refusal to enforce an illegal contract would have harmed the parties for whose protection the law was enacted, in this case the taxpayers, enforcement was allowed where the County Commissioners allowed a bondsman to execute a note to postpone his payment under a depository bond securing county funds in an insolvent bank, in violation of Art. V, sec. 39, 1889 Mont. Const. (similar to Art. II, sec. 31, 1972 Mont. Const.), and the county could enforce payment of the note. Fergus County v. Osweiler, 107 M 466, 86 P2d 410 (1938), distinguished in McFarland v. Stillwater County, 109 M 544, 98 P2d 321 (1940).

Strict Construction of Terms: The parties to a bailment may diminish the liability of the bailee by special contract, the principle being that the bailee may impose whatever terms he chooses if he gives the bailor notice that there are special terms and the means of knowing what they are; and if the bailor chooses to make the bailment, he is bound by them, provided the contract is not in violation of law or public policy, and that it stops short of protection in cases of fraud or negligence of the bailee, and provided further that the terms of the contract are clear, such stipulations being strictly construed. Jones v. Great N. Ry., 67 M 231, 217 P 673, 37 ALR 754 (1923).

Limitation of Actions: A stipulation by a telegraph company, on one of its blanks, that it will not be answerable for damages or statutory penalties if a claim is not made within a specified time, is void under this section as against public policy, if it was ever intended as a cloak for fraud or crime. Lahood v. Cont. Tel. Co., 52 M 313, 157 P 639 (1916).

Exemption From Liability: A provision in a contract to exempt another from liability for violation of law is void as contrary to public policy. Since the provision was not severable, the entire contract was void. Cooper v. N. Pac. Ry., 212 F 533 (D.C. Mont. 1914).

Assumption of Risk: The defense of assumption of risk, which has for its basis the common-law principle expressed by the maxim "Volenti non fit injuria" and does not rest in contract between the master and servant, is not abrogated by this section and 39-2-705. Osterholm v. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 40 M 508, 107 P 499 (1910). See also Garrison v. Averill, 282 M 508, 938 P2d 702, 54 St. Rep. 454 (1997).

Attorney General's Opinions

Termination of Payments in Lieu of Participation in Group Health Plan for Nonunion County Employee: The Board of County Commissioners may terminate payments in lieu of participation in a group health plan for a nonunion county employee only if termination is consistent with the county's employment agreement with the employee. 51 A.G. Op. 11 (2005).

28-2-703. Contracts in restraint of trade generally void.

Case Notes

Covenant Not to Compete Enforceable — Remand for Dobbins Analysis: The plaintiff, an accounting firm, sued the defendants, former shareholders of a satellite office, after they established a new accounting firm and took most of the plaintiff's clients. The plaintiff sought to enforce a covenant not to compete found in an employment agreement each of the defendants had signed. The District Court granted the defendants summary judgment, concluding that the agreement was not enforceable because it did not provide a method for compensation and that it was a contract of adhesion. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the contract was enforceable because it provided sufficient consideration and that the defendants, who were shareholders of the accounting firm at the time the parties entered into the agreement, had a bargaining position such that the agreement did not constitute a contract of adhesion. The Supreme Court remanded the matter for the District Court to apply the Dobbins analysis to determine whether the covenant not to compete was reasonable. Junkermier v. Alborn, 2016 MT 218, 384 Mont. 464, 380 P.3d 747.

Covenant Not to Compete — Unenforceable When Employer Terminates Employment Relationship Absent Legitimate Business Interest: An accounting firm chose not to renew a contract with the plaintiff, a long-term employee, and later attempted to enforce a covenant not to compete against her. The District Court concluded that the covenant not to compete was reasonable and enforceable, and the plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court reversed the District Court and adopted the requirement that an employer must establish a legitimate business interest in order to enforce a covenant not to compete. A legitimate business interest, the Supreme Court expounded, is one necessary to protect an employer's good will, customer relationships, or trade information. Because the firm chose to terminate the relationship and the covenant did not protect a legitimate business interest, the covenant was not enforceable. Wrigg v. Junkermier, Clark, Campanella, Stevens, P.C., 2011 MT 290, 362 Mont. 496, 265 P.3d 646.

Reasonableness of Noncompetition Covenant Subject to Determination at Trial: A noncompetition covenant contained in a partnership agreement did not constitute an absolute prohibition on the right of dissociating partners to engage in their professions, but rather provided for a reduced payment to separating partners who practice in the area where the partnership practiced. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of dissociating partners on grounds that the covenant was void as a matter of law, but on appeal the Supreme Court reversed. Because the prohibition was not absolute, the court held that the reasonableness of the noncompetition covenant should be tested at trial under the criteria in Dobbins, Deguire & Tucker, P.C. v. Rutherford, 218 M 392, 708 P2d 577 (1985), and summary judgment was therefore inappropriate. Mungas v. Great Falls Clinic, LLP, 2009 MT 426, 354 M 50, 221 P3d 1230 (2009).

Signing of Separation Agreements and Acceptance of Payments Precluding Obligation for Further Payments: Several physicians signed separation agreements when terminating employment with a medical clinic. The agreements provided that the physicians expressly accepted payments representing a reduced amount of profits, stock, and partnership interest and that the payments called for by the agreements constituted the full amount payable by the clinic. The physicians later asserted that the provision in the agreement reducing payments was void or unreasonable. The Supreme Court disagreed. Pursuant to 28-1-1403, any obligation of the clinic to pay more was extinguished when the physicians accepted the terms of the separation agreement. Mungas v. Great Falls Clinic, LLP, 2009 MT 426, 354 M 50, 221 P3d 1230 (2009).

Noncompetition Agreement Unenforceable for Lack of Consideration: Four months after beginning employment with plaintiff produce company, Hernandez signed a noncompetition agreement and a nondisclosure agreement providing that Hernandez would not directly or indirectly compete with plaintiff company during employment and for a 2-year period following termination of employment. When the company began experiencing financial difficulties, Hernandez was laid off. Hernandez then began another produce business in the area, and plaintiff filed for a restraining order seeking to enforce the noncompetition agreement and to prevent Hernandez from operating a competing business. The District Court held that the agreement was enforceable and issued a preliminary injunction restraining Hernandez from competing with plaintiff and contacting any of plaintiff's customers and from disclosing any of plaintiff's trade secrets. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the noncompetition agreement was unenforceable as a matter of law. The Supreme Court held that, in the context of noncompetition agreements, clear evidence is required that the employee received good consideration in exchange for bargaining away some postemployment freedom to practice the profession or trade of choice. Here, the District Court found that continuation of Hernandez's employment and income with plaintiff was sufficient consideration, but the Supreme Court strictly construed the agreement and disagreed. Consideration exists if an employee enters a noncompetition agreement as a condition of employment or if an existing employee receives additional independent consideration for entering a noncompetition agreement, but Hernandez signed the agreement 4 months after being hired and received no additional independent consideration for signing, and past consideration cannot serve as good consideration for a present agreement. Therefore, the covenant not to compete was unenforceable as a matter of law for lack of consideration, and it was also error for the District Court to enter the preliminary injunction. The District Court was reversed. Access Organics, Inc., v. Hernandez, 2008 MT 4, 341 M 73, 175 P3d 899 (2008), distinguishing In re Wage Claim of Langager v. Crazy Creek Products, Inc., 1998 MT 44, 287 M 445, 954 P2d 1169 (1998).

Covenant Not to Compete Unlawful Restraint on Trade — No Claim for Interference With Contractual or Business Relations: Curl worked for a company that finished products for Montana Silversmiths. The company was purchased by plaintiff company, and plaintiff hired Curl to do the same work but required Curl to sign an employment contract that included a noncompetition covenant. After Curl's employment ended, a new business hired Curl to do the same work for Montana Silversmiths. Plaintiff sued the new business and Curl, claiming breach of contract and intentional interference with business relations based on the noncompetition covenant. The District Court granted summary judgment for Curl, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court applied the reasonableness test outlined in O'Neil v. Ferraro, 182 M 214, 596 P2d 197 (1979), and concluded that because Curl's only option was to work in the vicinity of her residence as a subcontractor for Montana Silversmiths, the covenant prohibited Curl from engaging in her profession and was thus unreasonable and an unlawful restraint on trade. Plaintiff's claims were based on the presumption that the covenant was valid, but because the covenant was void, summary judgment for Curl was affirmed. Mont. Mtn. Prod. v. Curl, 2005 MT 102, 327 M 7, 112 P3d 979 (2005).

Good Will Exception Applicable to Stock Sale as Well as Asset Sale: Roessmans purchased 100% of the stock in a construction company, which constituted a complete transfer and conveyance of all of Laabses' right, title, and interest in the company. The sale agreement contained a covenant not to compete, restricting Laabses from performing any construction in the area for 7 years, including construction for any prior, existing, or referred clients of the company. About 4 years later, Roessmans filed a complaint alleging that Laabses had repeatedly breached the covenant not to compete by continuing construction in the area and performing projects for prior clients. Laabses moved for summary judgment on grounds that the covenant was void because it violated public policy against restraint of trade, contending that the exception in 28-2-704 did not apply because the sale in question was a sale of stock rather than a sale of assets. Laabses asserted that shareholders do not own the good will of a business, which belongs to the corporation, and that when shares of stock are bought and sold by individuals, the good will itself is not transferred. The Supreme Court found that such an interpretation would exalt form over substance. In this context, the stock purchase agreement specifically contemplated the transfer of good will and there was no substantive difference between sale of the company stock and sale of the company's assets, so the good will exception applied to the stock sale as well as the asset sale. Snow Country Constr., Inc. v. Laabs, 1999 MT 279, 296 M 520, 989 P2d 847, 56 St. Rep. 1125 (1999). See also Earthworks, Inc. v. Sehn, 553 NW 2d 490 (N. Dak. 1996).

Reasonableness and Enforceability of Employment Contract Noncompetition Covenant: Allen sold her accounting practice to Joseph Eve & Co. (Eve). The purchase and sale agreement contained a provision pursuant to which Allen agreed not to compete with Eve for a 3-year period from the date of closing. A separate professional employment contract entered at the same time provided that Allen could work for Eve as an employee. After 3 years, Allen had the option to reacquire her client base from Eve. If she chose not to exercise the option but to still represent those clients, she agreed to reimburse Eve on a percentage basis for work performed for Eve clients for up to 3 years. After 3 years, Allen notified Eve of her intent to leave the employment and exercise the purchase option but the parties could not agree on terms. A few days later, Allen's attorney notified Eve that she had decided not to exercise the purchase option but to instead take client accounts with her and make payments pursuant to the reimbursement provision of the contract. Although Allen performed services for Eve's clients, Allen refused to make payments, so Eve sued to recover amounts allegedly due. Allen contended that Eve had breached the contract by refusing to provide her with the necessary client files. As outlined in Dobbins, Deguire & Tucker, P.C. v. Rutherford, 218 M 392, 708 P2d 577 (1985), for a covenant in restraint of trade to be reasonable, it: (1) must be limited in operation as to either time or place; (2) must be based on some good consideration; (3) should afford only a fair protection to the interests of the party in whose favor it is made; and (4) must not be so large in its operation as to interfere with the interests of the public. The trial court explicitly discussed each of the factors, held that the noncompetition clause in the contract was enforceable, and ordered partial summary judgment in favor of Eve, and the case proceeded to trial. At close of trial, the court instructed the jury that a covenant in restraint of trade may be enforced if reasonable. While it was error for the court to submit to the jury an issue already decided by the court on summary judgment, the error was harmless because the summary judgment did not address the ultimate questions of either party's liability or the enforceability against either party, which were left to the jury. Joseph Eve & Co. v. Allen, 1998 MT 189, 290 M 175, 964 P2d 11, 55 St. Rep. 767 (1998). However, see Wrigg v. Junkermier, Clark, Campanella, Stevens, P.C., 2011 MT 290, 362 Mont. 496, 265 P.3d 646, requiring an employer to establish a legitimate business interest in order to enforce a covenant not to compete.

Covenant Not Limited as to Time and Geographical Area as Unreasonable Restraint of Trade: The covenant in a contract forbade employees from disclosing customer lists and trade secrets for an unlimited period of time and covered an unrestricted geographical area. The Supreme Court ruled that the covenant was an unreasonable restraint of trade and unenforceable as a matter of law. St. Medical Oxygen & Supply, Inc. v. Am. Medical Oxygen Co., 240 M 70, 782 P2d 1272, 46 St. Rep. 1951 (1989).

Prohibition Against Restraint of Trade — Applies to All Contracts: The employer argued that the statute prohibiting restraint of trade did not apply to restrictive covenants in the contract before the District Court because the contract was not an employment contract. The Supreme Court, in affirming the lower court, ruled that the statute applied to all contracts regardless of subject matter. St. Medical Oxygen & Supply, Inc. v. Am. Medical Oxygen Co., 240 M 70, 782 P2d 1272, 46 St. Rep. 1951 (1989).

Covenant Against Competition Valid: A covenant restricting the seller of a radio station from any involvement with a radio or television station within 50 miles of Bozeman for a period of 10 years was not found to be void as an unlawful restraint of trade. W. Media, Inc. v. Merrick, 224 M 28, 727 P2d 547, 43 St. Rep. 1991 (1986).

Limited Commercial Use Restriction on Parking Lot: The Supreme Court determined that there was a commercial use restriction on a Bridger Bowl ski area parking lot. Appellants argued that the restriction acted to prohibit use of the parking lot by customers who bought beer and wine on other Bridger Bowl lands. The court noted that the primary purpose of the parking lot was to provide parking for skiers using the ski hill, that the land was conveyed to respondents for that purpose, and that the parking lot was not being used primarily by commercial business patrons. The court refused to construe the fact that skiers using the lot might incidentally buy beer or wine in ski area chalets as violative of the commercial use restriction on the parking lot. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Properly Created Negative Easements Not Automatically Void: Appellants contended the District Court erred in concluding that the commercial use limitation on Bridger Bowl land was void as an unlawful restraint of trade. The Supreme Court agreed and reversed the District Court, finding that the conditions of the test outlined in O'Neil v. Ferraro, 182 M 214, 596 P2d 197 (1979), had been met. Additionally, the Supreme Court noted the statutory authority in 70-17-101 for allowing creation of covenants and easements governing the right to transact business on land and held that properly created negative easements are not automatically void under 28-2-703. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Public Accountants — Employment Contract With Reasonable Restrictive Covenants Relating to Postemployment Relationship: An employment contract for accountants contained a restriction that upon termination of employment the defendants must pay a fee if they obtained any of plaintiff's clients within 12 months. The fee was to be 100% of gross fees payable in installments over a 3-year period at 8% interest. The trial court erred in dismissing plaintiff's complaint for an accounting and payment based on the restriction as an unlawful restraint of trade. The Supreme Court held that the restrictions did not on their face either prohibit or directly restrain the business of public accounting. The court provided the following guidelines for determining whether a covenant is a reasonable restraint on the profession of public accounting: (1) the covenant should be limited either as to time or place; (2) the covenant should be based upon some good consideration; and (3) the covenant should afford a reasonable protection for and not impose an unreasonable burden on the employer, the employee, or the public. Dobbins, DeGuire & Tucker, P.C. v. Rutherford, MacDonald & Olson, 218 M 392, 708 P2d 577, 42 St. Rep. 1680 (1985). These guidelines were applied in Daniels v. Thomas, Dean & Hoskins, Inc., 246 M 125, 804 P2d 359, 47 St. Rep. 2293 (1990), and Joseph Eve & Co. v. Allen, 1998 MT 189, 290 M 175, 964 P2d 11, 55 St. Rep. 767 (1998). However, see Wrigg v. Junkermier, Clark, Campanella, Stevens, P.C., 2011 MT 290, 362 Mont. 496, 265 P.3d 646, requiring an employer to establish a legitimate business interest in order to enforce a covenant not to compete.

Violation of Employer's Confidence: Defendant, a clerical worker for plaintiff, became licensed as an insurance agent at plaintiff's urging in 1979. She was assigned a book of business customers to service in exchange for a guaranteed salary. She signed an employment contract which contained a covenant not to compete and a covenant not to disclose. Defendant terminated her employment and opened her own insurance business. Plaintiff filed a complaint seeking injunctive relief, alleging defendant had violated both covenants and had in her possession a confidential customer list. The covenant not to compete was void as a violation of 28-2-703. Plaintiff had the burden of proving that the covenant not to disclose did not also violate 28-2-703. No evidence was presented showing that defendant had retained any records or lists. The general rule is that an employee, having left his employment, is free to make use of his experience, as long as he does not violate his employer's confidence. First Am. Ins. Agency v. Gould, 203 M 217, 661 P2d 451, 40 St. Rep. 402 (1983).

Negative Easement Not a Restraint of Trade: A written agreement in the form of a settlement agreement that creates a negative easement prohibiting the use of property as a restaurant and bar does not constitute a contract in restraint of trade. The agreement is not merely a personal contract between the parties that would fall within the scope of this section, prohibiting restraint of trade, but rather creates a property interest that runs with the land. Reichert v. Weeden, 190 M 95, 618 P2d 1216, 37 St. Rep. 1788 (1980), followed in Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Alleged Oral Covenant Not to Compete: The sellers and buyers of a grocery business discussed a noncompetition agreement, but excluded such a provision from the written contract. The trial court found that this omission was not induced by sellers' fraud. Even if the alleged noncompetition agreement had been entered in the contract, it could not be enforced because although the two businesses are only 7 miles apart, they are in different counties (prior to 1983 amendment of 28-2-704) and therefore not within the permissible exceptions for contracts in restraint of competition. Lar-Con Corp. v. Murman Properties, Ltd., 188 M 183, 612 P2d 676 (1980).

Covenant Not to Compete: A covenant not to compete contained in a dissolution of partnership agreement stated that defendant, Sullivan, would refrain from competing with plaintiff in any area where the partnership had done business. The covenant was to be effective for 3 years. Plaintiff sued to enforce this covenant for an area encompassing 32 counties, but it was in contravention of the applicable statutes which limit such covenants to a single city or town (prior to 1983 amendment of 28-2-704). Therefore, the covenant was enforceable only as to business transacted within the city of Billings. Treasure Chem., Inc. v. Team Laboratory Chem. Corp., 187 M 200, 609 P2d 285 (1980).

Restrictive Covenant — Test of Validity: Plaintiff operates a restaurant in part of a building owned by the defendant. The lease between plaintiff and defendant contains a covenant which provides that the defendant will not permit a competing restaurant to operate in the building. Such a covenant is valid only if it is a reasonable and limited restraint of trade. This covenant meets the test and is therefore valid. O'Neill v. Ferraro, 182 M 214, 596 P2d 197 (1979).

Employment Agreement — Restrictive Covenant: A restrictive covenant contained in an employment agreement between plaintiffs and defendants was not enforceable under Montana law as long as the defendant did not violate his employer's confidence. J.T. Miller Co. v. Madel, 176 M 49, 575 P2d 1321 (1978), limited and explained in Dobbins, DeGuire & Tucker, P.C. v. Rutherford, MacDonald & Olson, 218 M 392, 708 P2d 577, 42 St. Rep. 1680 (1985). However, see Wrigg v. Junkermier, Clark, Campanella, Stevens, P.C., 2011 MT 290, 362 Mont. 496, 265 P.3d 646, requiring an employer to establish a legitimate business interest in order to enforce a covenant not to compete.

Covenant Not to Compete — Restraint of Trade: A covenant not to compete is a restrictive covenant in restraint of trade and is valid only if it constitutes a reasonable restriction on the freedom to do business within the provisions of 28-2-704 and 28-2-705. Jenson v. Olson, 144 M 224, 395 P2d 465 (1964).

Marketing Contract: Plaintiffs in an action seeking the forfeiture of an oil and gas lease, on the ground, among others, that the lessee failed to fulfill the provision of the lease making it its duty to market the gas found, could properly urge that a contract entered into by the lessee with a natural gas company under which the former bound itself not to sell gas to others within a certain market was invalid as creating a monopoly contrary to the provisions of Art. XV, sec. 20, 1889 Mont. Const. (similar to Art. II, sec. 31, 1972 Mont. Const.), and this section. Stranahan v. Independent Natural Gas Co., 98 M 597, 41 P2d 39 (1935).

Common-Law Statute:

This section is not a novel statute; it is but declaratory of the common law. Schwanekamp v. Modern Woodmen of Am., 44 M 526, 120 P 806 (1912).

A statute of this character refers only to a contract which, by its terms, restrains a party to it from exercising a lawful business, and the breach of which subjects the delinquent to liability. Schwanekamp v. Modern Woodmen of Am., 44 M 526, 120 P 806 (1912).

Fraternal Benefit Insurance: A clause in the contract of insurance entered into between a member of a fraternal society and the association, that the certificate of insurance should be void if the insured engaged in the sale of intoxicating liquor in any capacity, is not in violation of the provisions of this section. Schwanekamp v. Modern Woodmen of Am., 44 M 526, 120 P 806 (1912).

28-2-704. Exception — sale of goodwill of business.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1983 Amendment: In (1), after "business within" substituted "the areas provided in subsection (2)" for "a specified county, city, or part thereof"; and inserted (2) stating geographical limitations on agreement.

Case Notes

Noncompete Clause of 5 Years and 100 Miles Upheld: When the sale of a business includes sale of goodwill, the seller may agree to refrain from carrying on a similar business. In this case, because the noncompete clause was upheld by the District Court, it is likely that the plaintiffs will ultimately prevail and that the contract and the noncompete clause will be determined to be valid and enforceable. The likelihood of success is sufficient to warrant the preliminary injunction. Friedman v. Lasco, 2016 MT 115, 383 Mont. 381, 372 P.3d 451.

Goodwill Exception Not Applicable When No Sale Occurs Under Partnership Agreement: Several physicians signed separation agreements when terminating employment with a medical clinic. The agreements provided that the physicians expressly accepted payments representing a reduced amount of profits, stock, and partnership interest and that the payments called for by the agreements constituted the full amount payable by the clinic. The clinic argued that the forfeiture provision in the agreements constituted the sale of goodwill of a business and therefore fell within the provisions of 28-2-704 and could not be considered a restraint of trade. The District Court held that the goodwill exception did not apply, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. In this case there was no payment or agreement to pay a pecuniary consideration in exchange for the transfer of an interest in property, so no sale occurred, and absent a sale the exception to the prohibition on contracts in restraint of trade did not apply to the partnership agreement at issue. Mungas v. Great Falls Clinic, LLP, 2009 MT 426, 354 M 50, 221 P3d 1230 (2009).

Reasonableness of Noncompetition Covenant Subject to Determination at Trial: A noncompetition covenant contained in a partnership agreement did not constitute an absolute prohibition on the right of dissociating partners to engage in their professions, but rather provided for a reduced payment to separating partners who practice in the area where the partnership practiced. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of dissociating partners on grounds that the covenant was void as a matter of law, but on appeal the Supreme Court reversed. Because the prohibition was not absolute, the court held that the reasonableness of the noncompetition covenant should be tested at trial under the criteria in Dobbins, Deguire & Tucker, P.C. v. Rutherford, 218 M 392, 708 P2d 577 (1985), and summary judgment was therefore inappropriate. Mungas v. Great Falls Clinic, LLP, 2009 MT 426, 354 M 50, 221 P3d 1230 (2009).

Covenant Not to Compete Unlawful Restraint on Trade — No Claim for Interference With Contractual or Business Relations: Curl worked for a company that finished products for Montana Silversmiths. The company was purchased by plaintiff company, and plaintiff hired Curl to do the same work but required Curl to sign an employment contract that included a noncompetition covenant. After Curl's employment ended, a new business hired Curl to do the same work for Montana Silversmiths. Plaintiff sued the new business and Curl, claiming breach of contract and intentional interference with business relations based on the noncompetition covenant. The District Court granted summary judgment for Curl, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court applied the reasonableness test outlined in O'Neil v. Ferraro, 182 M 214, 596 P2d 197 (1979), and concluded that because Curl's only option was to work in the vicinity of her residence as a subcontractor for Montana Silversmiths, the covenant prohibited Curl from engaging in her profession and was thus unreasonable and an unlawful restraint on trade. Plaintiff's claims were based on the presumption that the covenant was valid, but because the covenant was void, summary judgment for Curl was affirmed. Mont. Mtn. Prod. v. Curl, 2005 MT 102, 327 M 7, 112 P3d 979 (2005).

Good Will Exception Applicable to Stock Sale as Well as Asset Sale: Roessmans purchased 100% of the stock in a construction company, which constituted a complete transfer and conveyance of all of Laabses' right, title, and interest in the company. The sale agreement contained a covenant not to compete, restricting Laabses from performing any construction in the area for 7 years, including construction for any prior, existing, or referred clients of the company. About 4 years later, Roessmans filed a complaint alleging that Laabses had repeatedly breached the covenant not to compete by continuing construction in the area and performing projects for prior clients. Laabses moved for summary judgment on grounds that the covenant was void because it violated public policy against restraint of trade, contending that the exception in this section did not apply because the sale in question was a sale of stock rather than a sale of assets. Laabses asserted that shareholders do not own the good will of a business, which belongs to the corporation, and that when shares of stock are bought and sold by individuals, the good will itself is not transferred. The Supreme Court found that such an interpretation would exalt form over substance. In this context, the stock purchase agreement specifically contemplated the transfer of good will and there was no substantive difference between sale of the company stock and sale of the company's assets, so the good will exception applied to the stock sale as well as the asset sale. Snow Country Constr., Inc. v. Laabs, 1999 MT 279, 296 M 520, 989 P2d 847, 56 St. Rep. 1125 (1999). See also Earthworks, Inc. v. Sehn, 553 NW 2d 490 (N. Dak. 1996).

Distance in Noncompetition Covenant Determined by Most Usual Mode of Travel: The parties in a suit over a noncompetition covenant disagreed on whether the 100-mile limit included or excluded Billings. The Supreme Court held that the distance was to be determined by highway mileage, not air mileage, because automobile travel is the most usual mode of travel between Lewistown and Billings. Dumont v. Tucker, 250 M 417, 822 P2d 96, 48 St. Rep. 996 (1991).

Unenforceability of Part of Noncompetition Covenant: The District Court found that part of a noncompetition covenant was void. Tucker argued that the District Court erred in not ruling that an entire noncompetition covenant was void and that he was entitled to a refund for the full amount paid for the covenant. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had properly applied the "blue pencil approach" in limiting the covenant to the contiguous counties and, in so doing, did not void the covenant in its entirety. Dumont v. Tucker, 250 M 417, 822 P2d 96, 48 St. Rep. 996 (1991).

Covenant Against Competition Valid: A covenant restricting the seller of a radio station from any involvement with a radio or television station within 50 miles of Bozeman for a period of 10 years was not found to be void as an unlawful restraint of trade. W. Media, Inc. v. Merrick, 224 M 28, 727 P2d 547, 43 St. Rep. 1991 (1986).

Alleged Oral Covenant Not to Compete: The sellers and buyers of a grocery business discussed a noncompetition agreement, but excluded such a provision from the written contract. The trial court found that this omission was not induced by sellers' fraud. Even if the alleged noncompetition agreement had been entered in the contract, it could not be enforced because although the two businesses are only 7 miles apart, they are in different counties (prior to 1983 amendment) and therefore not within the permissible exceptions for contracts in restraint of competition. Lar-Con Corp. v. Murman Properties, Ltd., 188 M 183, 612 P2d 676 (1980).

Breach of Contract — Value of Goodwill Determined: In an action for breach of a contract to sell and purchase a barbershop business, the sole issue on appeal was the proper determination of the value of goodwill attributable to the shop's location. The court found that the District Court improperly restricted the reasonable value of goodwill associated with the shop's location to a 1-month period, in light of the facts that the purchaser had obtained a long-term lease and that there was no indication that the lessor would have been unwilling to have leased to the seller on a long-term rather than a month-to-month basis. While there is no rigid rule for determining the value of goodwill, the best indicator is the purchase price agreed upon in a voluntary arm's-length transaction. The three elements comprising the purchase price in this contract were the goodwill associated with the shop's location, the seller's furniture and fixtures, and the shop's telephone connection. The seller removed the fixtures and furniture and disconnected the telephone upon learning of the purchaser's new lease arrangements. These things were valued at $3,000. The seller's recovery was therefore based on the purchase price less the $3,000. An estimate of business lost due to changing locations was then used to determine the percentage of the base price representing the shop's goodwill attached to the shop's location. Baldwin v. Stuber, 187 M 430, 610 P2d 160 (1980).

Covenant Not to Compete: A covenant not to compete contained in a dissolution of partnership agreement stated that defendant, Sullivan, would refrain from competing with plaintiff in any area where the partnership had done business. The covenant was to be effective for 3 years. Plaintiff sued to enforce this covenant for an area encompassing 32 counties, but it was in contravention of the applicable statutes which limit such covenants to a single city or town (prior to 1983 amendment). Therefore, the covenant was enforceable only as to business transacted within the city of Billings. Treasure Chem., Inc. v. Team Laboratory Chem. Corp., 187 M 200, 609 P2d 285 (1980).

Commercial Speech: Plaintiffs were guaranteed the right to advertise the availability, nature, and prices of their products and services as constitutionally protected commercial speech when the record indicated they made no agreement prohibiting advertising. Bauer v. Chaussee, 173 M 270, 567 P2d 448 (1977).

Requirement of Sale: Where articles of an unincorporated association require withdrawing members to sell whatever interest they have, including goodwill, without cost, a restrictive covenant not to compete does not fall within the sale of goodwill exception, because in order to have a sale pecuniary consideration must be given in exchange. The withdrawing members cannot sell the goodwill as it belongs to the association. W. Mont. Clinic v. Jacobson, 169 M 44, 544 P2d 807 (1976).

Restrictive Covenant Not to Compete: Covenant between partners dissolving dairy products partnership, one taking retail business, the other the wholesale business, which was to last for 9 years and was to be confined to city where partnership had been conducted, was valid as a restrictive covenant not to compete. Jenson v. Olson, 144 M 224, 395 P2d 465 (1964).

Breach by Seller: Where buyer broke contract by failing to make agreed payments for exclusive business rights in a territory and seller entered the territory after buyer's breach but in violation of the agreement, buyer was then entitled to a setoff of the amount of profit which seller took from the restricted territory when seller brought action on the full amount of the contract. Leiman-Scott, Inc. v. Holmes, 142 M 58, 381 P2d 489 (1963).

Corporate Goodwill:

It would seem that a stockholder has no interest in the goodwill of his corporation which he can sell. Wylie v. Wylie Permanent Camping Co., 57 M 115, 187 P 279 (1920).

Goodwill is an incident to and inherent in the business to which it attaches. Wylie v. Wylie Permanent Camping Co., 57 M 115, 187 P 279 (1920).

The goodwill of a corporation is an intangible asset dependent on the corporate existence; it constitutes an element of value in connection with, but not apart from, the corporation and its business. Wylie v. Wylie Permanent Camping Co., 57 M 115, 187 P 279 (1920).

Case Notes

What Constitutes Impossibility: Appealing in a breach of contract case, the seller asserted a defense of impossibility attributable to harsh weather conditions at the time set for delivery. The trial court apparently found the seller did not intend to deliver until after January 1 in any case. Such a finding was supported by the following facts: the seller had been telling the buyer for some time that no delivery could be made until after January 1; the seller had been intimating an unwillingness or inability to comply with the contract for months; and the seller, in order to wean the calves for the agreed 45-day period before delivery, would have had to start weaning by October 31 in order to deliver by December 15, the extended delivery date. (The contract had called for a mid-November delivery.) October 31 was 9 days before the snow that allegedly created impossibility of performance because of an inability to round up the calves. The Supreme Court found there was adequate evidence to support the trial court's rejection of this defense. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

Impossibility of Performance of Contract: A joint venture was formed, the contract contemplating the feeding of cattle by one party until 80% graded "choice", followed by sale and splitting of the proceeds with the supplier of the cattle, who was the second party. A drop in cattle prices which caused the feeder to lose his financing was not a case of commercial impossibility for two reasons. First, in order for commercial impossibility to excuse performance of a contract, the parties thereto must have had no reason to foresee the impossibility at the time they contracted. Fluctuation in cattle prices is foreseeable prior to the breach. On the contrary, a contract against the feeder for damages was upheld. Second, in order for commercial impossibility to excuse performance, the contractual duties must be impossible for anyone to perform. Subjective (personal) impossibility does not inhere to the nature of the act to be performed and does not excuse nonperformance. A loss of financing is personal impossibility. Roundup Cattle Feeders v. Horpestad, 184 M 480, 603 P2d 1044 (1979), distinguishing Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

Pro Rata Clause Discriminatory: Where insured was charged the same premium as another insured who carried no other crop insurance, but the benefits payable to him would be only a part of those payable to another insured without other crop insurance under policy's pro rata clause, it was proper for the District Court to find the pro rata clause a violation of the unfair discrimination statute and unlawful because a "full risk" premium was paid and only a partial recovery was possible due to the pro rata clause. McCarter v. Glacier Gen. Assurance Co., 169 M 269, 546 P2d 249 (1976). See also Musselman v. Mtn. W. Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Co., 251 M 262, 824 P2d 271, 49 St. Rep. 50 (1992), in which it was held that the District Court did not err in failing to enforce a pro rata clause in a fire insurance policy when two separate individuals were insuring two entirely different interests in the same property.

One Unlawful Act — Entire Contract Void Where Single Consideration: Where there is but a single consideration passing for the performance of several separate and distinct acts, one of which is unlawful, the entire contract, it not being severable, is void, particularly so where it is wholly executory. Case Notes clause that included Spokane, Washington, the Supreme Court determined that the choice of law clause was valid under the factors set out in Modroo v. Nationwide Mutual Fire Insurance Company, 2008 MT 275, 345 M 262, 191 P3d 389 (2008), and since Washington law recognizes forum selection clauses and Appleway chose Spokane as the venue, Montana venue is improper. Polzin v. Appleway Equipment Leasing Inc., 2008 MT 300, 345 M 508, 191 P3d 476 (2008), followed in San Diego Gas & Electric Co. v. Ninth Judicial District Court, 2014 MT 191, 375 Mont. 517, 329 P.3d 1264.

Forum Selection Clause Valid by Operation of Choice of Law Clause: In a contract containing a paragraph that contained both a choice of law clause for Washington state and a forum selection

Choice of California Forum for Arbitration Held Void: Keystone, an auto parts business located in Montana, purchased a computer system from Triad for the management of Keystone's auto parts business. The contract was to be performed in Montana. The system failed to work properly, and Keystone sued Triad in Montana for breach of warranty, breach of contract, negligence, and negligent misrepresentation. The contract provided that disputes between the parties were to be settled before the American Arbitration Association in California, and the District Court held that the proper forum for arbitration was California. Citing Casarotto v. Lombardi, 268 M 369, 886 P2d 931 (1994), reversed on other grounds in Doctor's Associates, Inc. v. Casarotto, 517 US 681 (1996), the Supreme Court held that a contractual choice of law is governed in Montana by sections 187 and 188 of Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws. These sections provide that: (1) the state chosen by the parties will be the forum unless the application of the law of the chosen state would be contrary to the fundamental policies of another state that has a materially greater interest than the chosen state; (2) the other state would be the forum in the absence of an effective choice of law by the parties; and (3) one of the factors to be considered in making the determination of whether another state has a material interest in the enforcement of the contract is the place where the contract is to be performed. The Supreme Court noted that the contract was to be performed exclusively in Montana and therefore held that Montana had a materially greater interest in the contract issue than did California and that Montana law would therefore apply in the absence of the choice of a forum provision in the contract. The Supreme Court then held, citing State ex rel. Polaris Indus., Inc. v. District Court, 215 M 110, 695 P2d 471 (1985), and Rindal v. Seckler, 786 F. Supp. 890 (D.C. Mont. 1992), that the application of California law would be contrary to a fundamental policy of Montana as expressed in this section because this section has historically been applied: (1) to protect Montana residents from having to litigate outside of Montana; and (2) to invalidate predispute arbitration agreements. The Supreme Court noted that whether or not this section applies to arbitration contracts, 27-5-323 provides the same protection as this section does, but explicitly in the context of arbitration agreements. Because 27-5-323 allows the waiver of a party's right to arbitration in Montana only upon advice of counsel and because there was no evidence that the right was waived based on the advice of counsel, the Supreme Court held that the provision in the contract making California the forum for arbitration was void. Keystone, Inc. v. Triad Sys. Corp., 1998 MT 326, 292 M 229, 971 P2d 1240, 55 St. Rep. 1321 (1998), followed in Wolf's Interstate Leasing & Sales, LLC v. Banks, 2009 MT 354, 353 M 189, 219 P3d 1260 (2009).

Montana Law Not Preempted by Federal Arbitration Act: Keystone, an auto parts business located in Montana, purchased a computer system from Triad for the management of Keystone's auto parts business. The contract was to be performed in Montana. The system failed to work properly, and Keystone sued Triad in Montana for breach of warranty, breach of contract, negligence, and negligent misrepresentation. The contract provided that disputes between the parties were to be settled before the American Arbitration Association in California, and the District Court held that the proper forum for arbitration was California because, among other reasons, Montana law was preempted by the Federal Arbitration Act (FAA)(9 U.S.C. 2). The Supreme Court reviewed the opinion of the U.S. Supreme Court in the case of Doctor's Associates, Inc. v. Casarotto, 517 US 681 (1996), and interpreted that opinion to mean that a state may not place arbitration clauses on an unequal footing from general contract provisions. The Supreme Court pointed out that although 27-5-323 does apply only to arbitration provisions, this section applies to contracts generally and that therefore it cannot be said that arbitration provisions are treated differently from contracts generally. The Supreme Court also pointed out that the Montana statutes preserve and do not nullify the parties' duty to arbitrate and for that reason, the case should be distinguished from those cases cited by Triad, holding that the FAA preempted state statute. For these reasons, the Supreme Court held that under the rationale of Casarotto, 27-5-323 and this section are not preempted by the FAA. Keystone, Inc. v. Triad Sys. Corp., 1998 MT 326, 292 M 229, 971 P2d 1240, 55 St. Rep. 1321 (1998).

Suit in State Court for Breach of Provisions of Federal Act Incorporated by Reference Into Contract — Not Preempted by Procedural Limitations in Federal Act: The Graveleys and the Farm Credit Bank entered into a loan agreement that incorporated by reference the provisions of the Agricultural Credit Act of 1987. When the bank attempted to foreclose on the loan, the Graveleys argued that the bank was in breach of the provisions of the Act. The bank responded that the terms of the Act precluded suit in state court to enforce the terms of the Act. The Supreme Court held that the incorporation of the Act's provisions into the contract made the enforcement of those provisions as enforceable in state court as any other contract term and that the mere provision in the Act for review of a restructuring denial by a credit review committee did not express an intent by Congress to limit the other methods of enforcing the Act's provisions. State ex rel. Farm Credit Bank of Spokane v. District Court, 267 M 1, 881 P2d 594, 51 St. Rep. 709 (1994), distinguished in AgAmerica, FCB v. Robson, 272 M 413, 901 P2d 100, 52 St. Rep. 800 (1995).

When Arbitration Not Applicable — Insurance Contracts: Plaintiffs challenged a provision of their insurance contract that required arbitration of the value of loss in case of dispute between them and the insurer. The court held that arbitration of such disputes is not provided for under the Uniform Arbitration Act (specifically 27-5-114(2)(b)) and is therefore not exempt from the prohibition of this section. However, citing Randall v. Am. Fire Ins. Co., 10 M 340, 25 P 953 (1891), the court held that this section did not prevent agreements to arbitrate factual questions relating to value or quantity and upheld the arbitration provision in plaintiffs' contract. Garretson v. Mtn. W. Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Co., 234 M 103, 761 P2d 1288, 45 St. Rep. 1764 (1988).

Contract Forum Selection Clauses Void: A Montana distributor sued an out-of-state manufacturer in Montana court for tort and contract claims arising from their agreement which provided that Minnesota would be the sole forum for such disputes. The District Court denied defendant's motion to dismiss. The Supreme Court affirmed and held that the forum selection clause was void under 28-2-708 because it restricted the parties from enforcing their contract rights. State ex rel. Polaris Indus., Inc. v. District Court, 215 M 110, 695 P2d 471, 42 St. Rep. 220 (1985), followed in Keystone, Inc. v. Triad Sys. Corp., 1998 MT 326, 292 M 229, 971 P2d 1240, 55 St. Rep. 1321 (1998).

Arbitration Clause Unenforceable: An architect's service contract contained a standardized arbitration clause. At issue were questions of law and mixed questions of law and fact. Neither party consented to arbitrate the dispute. Without the consent of the parties, the clause was unenforceable under this section. Ace Plumbing & Heating, Inc. v. School District, 204 M 81, 662 P2d 1327, 40 St. Rep. 678 (1983). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

Invalidity of Agreement to Arbitrate All Disputes Under a Contract — Injunctive Relief: A contract may require future disputes as to value or quantity to be submitted to arbitration, but contract provisions which require parties to submit future disputes as to questions of law are void. Claims of breach of contract, negligence, and breach of warranty are issues of law or mixed issues of law and fact. In a case involving these claims, an agreement to arbitrate all future disputes is unenforceable and a nullity. An injunction to stay all arbitration proceedings is a proper remedy to avoid a real threat of irreparable injury when the rules of the arbitration body provide that the parties are presumed to have consented to the entry of a judgment upon the arbitrators' award. Palmer Steel Structures v. Westech, Inc., 178 M 347, 584 P2d 152 (1978). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

Void Arbitration Clause: Any contract provision which states that all future contract disputes shall be submitted to arbitration is void because it restricts access to the courts. Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

Architect's Insurance Policy: Insurance policy requirement that insured would have to file complaint on or before certain date in order to receive coverage would be void as against public policy under this section. J. G. Link & Co. v. Cont. Cas. Co., 470 F2d 1133 (9th Cir. 1972).

Arbitration Provision:

On application for Writ of Supervisory Control, District Court would be required to take jurisdiction of claim by contractor for additional work performed on contract with drainage district, notwithstanding decision for drainage district under arbitration clause, since arbitration cannot be final as to questions of law. State ex rel. Cave Constr. Co. v. District Court, 150 M 18, 430 P2d 624 (1967). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

A provision in a contract requiring all "differences or controversies" arising between the parties to be submitted to arbitration will not bar the litigation of such controversies when brought into court. School District v. Globe & Republic Ins. Co., 146 M 208, 404 P2d 889 (1965); Green v. Wolff, 140 M 413, 372 P2d 427 (1962). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

Arbitration Clause in Insurance Policy:

Where clause in insurance contract provided that school district was to submit to arbitration with insurance company controversies over the "value" of destroyed property, such clause was not void as against public policy, and disagreement on value of damaged school building should first have been arbitrated with the company. School District v. Globe & Republic Ins. Co., 146 M 208, 404 P2d 889 (1965), followed in Garretson v. Mtn. W. Farm Bureau Mut. Ins. Co., 234 M 103, 761 P2d 1288, 45 St. Rep. 1764 (1988). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

When an arbitration clause in an insurance policy expressly or impliedly limits the time within which an appraisal must be made, such demand must be made within a reasonable time after disagreement as to the amount has arisen. School District v. Globe & Republic Ins. Co., 146 M 208, 404 P2d 889 (1965). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

Whether a demand for appraisal has been made within a reasonable time depends upon the circumstances of each case, although two factors have been decisive: prejudice resulting from the delay, and the breakdown of good-faith negotiations. School District v. Globe & Republic Ins. Co., 146 M 208, 404 P2d 889 (1965). (Decided prior to 1985 amendment.)

"No Judgment" Clause: A "no judgment" clause, making uninsured motorist coverage inapplicable if the insured prosecutes his claim against an uninsured third party without the consent of the insurer, is void and unenforceable. Dominici v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 143 M 406, 390 P2d 806 (1964). See also St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 223 M 215, 725 P2d 821, 43 St. Rep. 1667 (1986).

Agreement as to Venue: This statute is not violated by a stipulation regarding venue of an action brought against one in a county where he agreed it might be brought. Elec. Prod. Consol. v. Bodell, 132 M 243, 316 P2d 788 (1957).

Fraternal Benefit Insurance:

The constitution of an Ohio fraternal benefit society which limited the time for bringing actions against the society would not govern the Statute of Limitations in view of this section. Trammel v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen & Enginemen, 126 M 400, 253 P2d 329 (1953).

A provision in the bylaws of a fraternal benefit society, requiring a member claiming to be entitled to benefits, as a condition precedent to his maintaining an action in the courts, to follow an elaborate procedure before various committees of the branch and supreme bodies of the society in an effort to exhaust all his remedies therein prescribed, was invalid. Cacic v. Slovenska Narodna Podporna Jednota, 102 M 438, 59 P2d 910 (1936).

Sale of Timber: A provision in timber sale regulations, made a part of contract for sale of timber on Indian reservation, that depreciation in value and quantity caused by purchaser's breach should be estimated under direction of officer approving the contract was valid under this section. Polley's Lumber Co. v. U.S., 115 F2d 751 (9th Cir. 1950).

Fire Insurance Policy: A provision in a fire insurance policy that no action shall be sustainable in any court of law or equity "unless commenced within twelve months after the fire" was void as against public policy under this section, declaring that every stipulation or condition in a contract which limits the time within which a party may enforce his rights is void. Thielbar Realties, Inc. v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co., 91 M 525, 9 P2d 469 (1932).

Common Law:

This section is the statement in the form of a statutory enactment of the common law as it existed in this state prior to the adoption of the codes in 1895. According thereto, a provision of a contract by which the construction to be placed on it by the agent of one of the parties should be final and without the right of appeal to the courts is void. Wortman v. Mont. Cent. Ry., 22 M 266, 56 P 316 (1899), explained in Polley's Lumber Co. v. U.S., 115 F2d 751 (9th Cir. 1950).

This section does not apply to contracts made before its adoption. Cotter v. Grand Lodge A. O. U. W., 23 M 82, 57 P 650 (1899).

Case Notes

Conscionability Analysis of Contractual Liquidated Damages Clause — Liquidated Damages Clause Presumed Enforceable: To provide direction to contracting parties and resolve the disparities in case law regarding liquidated damages, the Supreme Court adopted a rule to analyze liquidated damages clauses from the perspective of whether or not the clause is unconscionable as indicated by the nature of the bargaining process between the parties. Unconscionability involves a two-pronged determination regarding whether: (1) the clause fits the doctrine of contract of adhesion such that the weaker party had no meaningful choice regarding acceptance of the contract provisions; and (2) the contractual terms are unreasonably favorable to the drafter, which is usually the party with superior bargaining power. Whether the clause is unreasonably favorable to the drafter in turn involves an inquiry into whether the clause is within the reasonable expectations of or unduly oppressive to the weaker party. Liquidated damages clauses are presumed enforceable, and the party seeking to avoid the clause has the burden of proving unconscionability. Unless there are underlying disputed issues of fact, the question of unconscionability is purely a matter of law for the court to decide. Arrowhead School District No. 75 v. Klyap, 2003 MT 294, 318 M 103, 79 P3d 250 (2003), overruling Daugherty Cattle Co. v. Gen. Constr. Co., 254 M 479, 839 P2d 562 (1992), to the extent that it prevented one party from introducing relevant evidence by granting summary judgment based on contract language alone, overruling Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202 (1993), to the extent that it placed the burden on the nonbreaching party to prove the enforceability of a liquidated damages clause, and followed in Am. Music Co. v. Higbee, 2004 MT 349, 324 M 348, 103 P3d 518 (2004), and in Highway Specialties, Inc. v. Mont. Dept. of Transportation, 2009 MT 253, 351 M 527, 215 P3d 667 (2009).

Liquidated Damages Clause in Personal Services Contract — Conscionability of Liquidated Damages Clause in Teacher's Form Contract: In determining the enforceability of a 20% liquidated damages clause in defendant's teaching contract, the Supreme Court examined the conscionability of the clause. The court first held that the clause constituted a contract of adhesion because defendant, as the weaker bargaining party, had no meaningful choice regarding acceptance of the contract provisions. The court also noted that the contract was a form contract that provided no negotiation between the parties. However, the court held that unconscionability does not render all form contracts unacceptable and that form contracts are only unconscionable if the terms are not within the reasonable expectation of the party who had no opportunity to negotiate. Although the liquidated damages clause in defendant's contract was harsher than most, as a teacher, defendant knew that teachers are typically employed for an entire year and how difficult it is to replace equivalent services at small rural schools, so it was within defendant's reasonable expectations to agree to a contract with a 20% liquidated damages provision for departing so close to the start of the school year, even though defendant had no meaningful choice regarding the provision. The enforceability of the liquidated damages clause was affirmed. Arrowhead School District No. 75 v. Klyap, 2003 MT 294, 318 M 103, 79 P3d 250 (2003).

Standard of Review of Contractual Stipulated Damages Provision — Enforceable Liquidated Damages Versus Unenforceable Penalty: Whether a stipulated damages provision in a contract constitutes enforceable liquidated damages or an unenforceable penalty is a question of law, and if the underlying facts are not in dispute, the Supreme Court will review a determination of this conclusion of law for correctness. Arrowhead School District No. 75 v. Klyap, 2003 MT 294, 318 M 103, 79 P3d 250 (2003), followed in Highway Specialties, Inc. v. Mont. Dept. of Transportation, 2009 MT 253, 351 M 527, 215 P3d 667 (2009). See also Lake River Corp. v. Carborundum Co., 769 F2d 1284 (7th Cir. 1985).

Contract Remedy Providing Transfer of Twenty-Acre Parcel of Land as Security for Contractual Obligations Not Considered Unenforceable Liquidated Damages Provision — Award of Actual Damages Not Including Expectancy Damages and Lost Profits: As part of a sale of real property, Canton pledged a 20-acre parcel to Riverview Homes II, Ltd. (Riverview), as security in the event that Canton breached his contractual obligation to complete a proposed subdivision and construct an artificial lake. Canton breached the contract, and Riverview sought to quiet title to the 20-acre parcel. The District Court agreed that Canton breached the contract, but held that the contract remedy was an unenforceable liquidated damages provision because the amount of damages to be paid for breach of Canton's obligations was determined in anticipation of Canton's possible breach. The court then examined the contract for another possible method to determine the appropriate amount of damages, and ultimately awarded Riverview $92,046 as the amount that Riverview would have received for the sale of the property as bare lots without homes. Riverview appealed, contending that the contractual language was not a liquidated damages provision because the parties did not agree on the amount of compensation or damages to be paid by Canton in case of a breach of contract, and arguing that the District Court erred in setting the damage amount by failing to account for the profit that Riverview would have received from the sale of the lots with homes. The Supreme Court agreed that the contract language was not an unenforceable liquidated damages provision, but found that the discussion regarding liquidated damages was not essential to the resolution of the parties claims, and moved on to the actual award of damages. The Supreme Court declined to allow Riverview an award of speculative profits in the absence of lost profits attributable to Riverview's inability to sell developed lots. The District Court's determination of damages was affirmed. If the contract had been performed, Riverview would have had six bare lots approved as a subdivision, and an artificial lake. Because of Canton's breach, Riverview had neither. The District Court's award accounted for the expectations of the parties at the signing of the contract, and Riverview was not allowed to recover a greater amount of damages than would have been gained by full performance of the contract. Riverview Homes II, Ltd. v. Canton, 2001 MT 309, 307 M 517, 38 P3d 848 (2001).

Contract Provision Setting Damages Generally Void — Exception Distinguished: The real estate contract between Webers and Riveras contained a clause stating that if either party failed to perform, the amount of liquidated damages was to be 10% of the agreed sale price, an amount ordered to be paid to Webers when Riveras defaulted. The Supreme Court recognized the exception provided in Morgen v. Big Sky of Mont., 171 M 268, 557 P2d 1017 (1976), for situations when parties agree in advance on an amount of damages because it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damages. However, in this case, the contract provided for a set amount of damages without any regard for or attempt to determine what actual damages might be. Considering the subject matter, the surrounding circumstances, and the intent of the parties, the provision was held to be a void penalty clause. The fact that the liquidated damages provision might approximate the amount of actual damages was insufficient to create a valid liquidated damages provision. The matter was remanded for a determination of actual damages. Weber v. Rivera, 255 M 195, 841 P2d 534, 49 St. Rep. 969 (1992).

Holdover Rent Provisions Not Excessive, Unreasonable, or Illegal: The parties signed a contract at the conclusion of an earlier foreclosure action whereby the foreclosed purchasers were allowed to lease the property for an additional period. When the lessees remained on the property beyond the agreed lease period, the lessors commenced the present foreclosure action. The lessees have not shown that the contract holdover rent provision of $75 a day constituted illegal liquidated damages and penalty. The provision is not excessive, unreasonable, or illegal. The holdover amount is substantially less than the worth of the property on a yearly basis. Ruegsegger v. Welborn, 237 M 317, 773 P2d 305, 46 St. Rep. 833 (1989).

Agreement Containing Remedy for Breach — Remedy Not Expressly Made Exclusive — Injunction to Enforce Agreement Improper: A tender of stock containing an agreement not to compete contained a clear provision setting forth an appropriate remedy upon breach, which was a reduction of one-third in the stock price. Injunction was not a proper remedy to enforce the agreement because the agreement provided an adequate remedy in law. Although the agreement didn't expressly limit available remedies to those in the agreement, the court held that such limitation was not necessary because allowing injunctive relief would have nullified the remedy agreement agreed to by the parties, contrary to the intentions of the parties. Foster v. Realty Title Co., Inc., 209 M 183, 680 P2d 323, 41 St. Rep. 630 (1984).

Method of Determination — Not Liquidated Damages: The parties entered into an agreement for the lease of a truck. The lease agreement contained a noncancellation provision and provided alternative remedies to the lessor in the event of a default. Lessee returned the truck with current payments to lessor prior to the termination date of the lease. Lessor had to make repairs to the truck. Lessor held a public sale pursuant to the lease and repurchased the truck. He then leased it to another party. Lessee contended the remedy of sale in the lease was void as a liquidated damage. "Liquidated damages" refers to an amount of damage. The sale provision was merely an optional procedure to determine the amount. There was no stipulated amount of damages in the lease. The law of liquidated damages was inapplicable. Diede v. Davis, 203 M 205, 661 P2d 838, 40 St. Rep. 394 (1983).

Penalty or Liquidated Damages — Determination by Court: Whether a forfeiture provision imposes a penalty or provides for liquidated damages is to be determined by the court from the language and subject matter of the contract, the intent of the parties, and all facts and circumstances under which the contract was made. The most important facts to be considered are whether the damages were difficult to ascertain and whether the stipulated amount is a reasonable estimate of probable damages or is reasonably proportionate to the actual damage sustained at the time of the breach. Morgen & Oswood Constr. Co. v. Big Sky of Mont., 171 M 268, 557 P2d 1017 (1976), followed in Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993).

Liquidated Damages — Time — Delay Due to Contractee: Where the contractee caused a substantial part of the delay in the building and progress of the work, without any agreement for an extension of time to offset the delay, the time fixed in the contract and any provisions for liquidated damages based thereon are abrogated, leaving the contractor responsible only to complete the work within a reasonable time. Haggerty v. Selsco, 166 M 492, 534 P2d 874 (1975).

Provision for Maximum Recovery:

Limitation of telephone company's liability for errors in contract for "yellow pages" advertising and providing for maximum recovery was valid under this section. State ex rel. Mtn. St. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. District Court, 160 M 443, 503 P2d 526 (1972).

Without a demonstration of bad faith, fraud, or willful or wanton conduct by telephone company, a limitation of liability for errors and omissions in its advertising expressed in a written and signed contract is reasonable, and it was within the power of the company and subscribers to include such a clause in a valid and binding contract. State ex rel. Mtn. St. Tel. & Tel. Co. v. District Court, 160 M 443, 503 P2d 526 (1972).

Pleading and Proof:

Where the substance of the provisions of Montana statutes indicating facts which a party seeking to recover liquidated damages under a construction contract must allege and prove were embodied by agreement in a construction contract which the United States was seeking to enforce, further allegations and proof of such facts were unnecessary. U.S. v. Grogan, 39 F. Supp. 819 (D.C. Mont. 1941).

Since the language of this section is general, every contract containing a stipulation such as is denounced in subsection (1) is prima facie void as to the stipulation. Therefore, when recovery is sought upon it, the plaintiff's allegations and proof must bring it within the exception provided in subsection (2). Clifton v. Willson, 47 M 305, 132 P 424 (1913).

Waiver of Deficiencies: The provision in a contract of sale of certain machinery to the effect that 20 days' use should constitute an acceptance and waiver of deficiencies is neither void as a stipulation for liquidated damages, as provided in this section, nor obnoxious as a restriction upon the right to have one's claims adjudicated in a court of law, as provided by 28-2-708. Best Mfg. Co. v. Hutton, 49 M 78, 141 P 653 (1914).

Forfeiture Clause: Where a contract of purchase provides that a failure to make any deferred payment shall work an immediate forfeiture of the contract, the contract, insofar as it provides for liquidated damages, may be void and of no effect under this section. Still, in any event, the defaulting purchaser, in the absence of a showing on his part, such as would appeal to the conscience of a court of equity, is not entitled to a return of any part of the purchase price made by him, though he asks for it. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913); Cook-Reynolds Co. v. Chipman, 47 M 289, 133 P 694 (1913), followed in Daugherty Cattle Co. v. Gen. Constr. Co., 254 M 479, 839 P2d 562, 49 St. Rep. 820 (1992).

Purchase of Real Estate: Even if a provision in a contract for the sale of real estate that the purchaser, in case of his default, shall forfeit all advance payments is a stipulation for liquidated damages within the inhibition of this section, this fact would not of itself require that the defaulting purchaser should have return of the money paid by him. On the contrary, its effect is to leave the parties where they would be if no such stipulation had been made. Without such a stipulation the defaulting purchaser is not, in the absence of an equitable showing, entitled to a return of any part of the money paid. Cook-Reynolds Co. v. Chipman, 47 M 289, 133 P 694 (1913), followed in Daugherty Cattle Co. v. Gen. Constr. Co., 254 M 479, 839 P2d 562, 49 St. Rep. 820 (1992).

Water Contract: A contract which bound the defendant irrigation company to furnish to plaintiff a certain amount of water during a certain season and which provided that if the company should for any reason fail to deliver the water, it would return to plaintiff the money paid by him (and plaintiff agreed to accept the same and to release the company from any damage arising from such failure) fell clearly within the provisions of this section and was void on its face to the extent of the liquidated damages agreed on in case of a breach. Deuninck v. W. Gallatin Irr. Co., 28 M 255, 72 P 618 (1903).

Stipulated Versus Actual Damages — Burden on Defendant: Where a suit is brought on a contract for the actual and not the liquidated damages, it is for the defendant to show by proper answer and competent proof that the contract for stipulated damages is valid under this section, and such question cannot be presented to the court by demurrer to the complaint. Deuninck v. W. Gallatin Irr. Co., 28 M 255, 72 P 618 (1903).

Consideration

Part Case Notes

Receipt Precluding Failure of Consideration: In an action for specific performance of a buy-sell agreement, there was no failure of consideration because the buyers received that for which they bargained. Halcro v. Moon, 226 M 121, 733 P2d 1305, 44 St. Rep. 504 (1987).

Real Estate Listing Agreement — Expenditure of Time and Money as Adequate Consideration: Buechler entered into a contract with Payne, granting him the right to sell Buechler's property. Payne attempted to sell the property and expended $1,120 to attract purchasers. Buechler canceled the contract before its term expired and sold the property herself. Buechler argued that the contract lacked consideration and therefore she was entitled to cancel the contract. The court found that Payne was employed on a commission basis and that his expenditure of time and money to attract a purchaser constituted consideration for Buechler's agreement to pay a commission. Payne v. Buechler, 192 M 311, 628 P2d 646, 38 St. Rep. 799 (1981).

Parties to Determine Consideration: Consideration, as essential evidence of the parties' intent to create a legal obligation, must be that which the parties adopt and regard as such. Kintner v. Harr, 146 M 461, 408 P2d 487 (1965).

LEGAL OBLIGATION

Materiality of Claim of Failure of Consideration to Contract Required Before Rescission Available as Remedy — Partial Failure of Consideration — Meltdown of Ice Cream Distributorship Agreement: Under Johnson v. Meiers, 118 M 258, 164 P2d 1012 (1946), a breach that goes to only part of the consideration, that is incidental and subordinate to the main purpose of the contract, and that may be compensated in damages does not warrant rescission. The injured party is still bound to perform that party's part of the contract, and the only remedy for the breach consists of the damages suffered from the breach. By contrast, under Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990), a party may rescind if, through the fault of the other party, consideration fails in whole or in part. In clarifying the disparate holdings, the Supreme Court noted that the term "failure of consideration", as either a claim or an affirmative defense, does not relate to the absence of consideration or whether there is good consideration for the formation of a valid, enforceable contract, but rather the term pertains to the failure of one party's performance, which then suspends or excuses the performance of the other party pursuant to the terms of a valid contract. Failure of consideration is generally synonymous with a material breach of performance of a contract, rather than whether a contract was enforceable because of the absence of the essential element of consideration. Thus, a claim or affirmative defense of failure of consideration that gives rise to the equitable remedy of rescission requires a showing by the claiming party that the other party's failure to perform was, in fact, material to the contract, and whether consideration was sufficient or good is immaterial. To reconcile this holding with 28-2-1711, the court went on to hold that failure of part of a promised performance may warrant rescission, but only if the claiming party proves that the deficient part of the other party's performance was material to the contract. If the failure to perform was not material, rescission is not an available remedy, performance cannot be excused, and the claiming party "may only be entitled to money damages for breach". Here, the District Court erred when it did not determine whether Norwood's failure to assign an ice cream distributor agreement to Service Distributing, Inc. (SDI), was material to the transaction as a whole. Absent that finding, SDI could not as a matter of law rescind the contract and be excused from further performance of its obligation to Norwood, so the case was remanded to determine whether a material breach occurred. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000). See also Flaig v. Gramm, 1999 MT 181, 295 M 297, 983 P2d 396, 56 St. Rep. 710 (1999).

Consideration Under Contract Creating Relationship of Lender and Approved Dealer for Making Housing Loans: A contract between the parties created a relationship of Green Tree Financial Corporation (Green Tree) as "lender" and Larson, doing business as Majestic Homes, Inc. (Majestic), as "approved dealer", for purposes of making federal housing loans pursuant to federal Housing and Urban Development (HUD) regulations. Majestic submitted an application to become an approved dealer, and Green Tree then approved Majestic as a dealer and required Majestic to enter into a dealer agreement that included terms expressly provided for by HUD regulations. In order to become and remain an approved dealer, Majestic promised to operate pursuant to HUD regulations—something that it was not otherwise obligated to do in the course of its business. Complying with HUD regulations and meeting other requirements of Green Tree constituted good consideration on the part of Majestic. In return for Majestic's conformance to federal regulations and a security interest in Majestic's assets, Green Tree agreed to perform a service for Majestic by reviewing and approving or rejecting credit applications that Majestic submitted on behalf of its customers. Majestic was allowed to hold itself out as an approved dealer, which provided a competitive advantage in the manufactured home business. The arrangement constituted a contractual relationship whereby the parties exchanged valuable consideration and was enforceable. This relationship is distinguishable from an indefinite requirements or output contract in which there is no exchange of obligations and no establishment of a lender-dealer relationship. Larson v. Green Tree Financial Corp., 1999 MT 157, 295 M 110, 983 P2d 357, 56 St. Rep. 618 (1999). See also Linn v. City County Health Dept., 1999 MT 235, 296 M 145, 988 P2d 302, 56 St. Rep. 922 (1999).

Mining Agreement Supported by Adequate Consideration: Nordwick and Berg agreed in writing to purchase unimproved mining property. The agreement provided that Nordwick would enter into an earnest money and buy-sell agreement with the property owner and that Berg would pay the earnest money and balance of the purchase price. Under the agreement, Berg received surface title and the timber rights, with each party receiving a one-half interest in the mineral rights. After Nordwick secured the buy-sell agreement, Berg paid the owner the earnest money and a warranty deed was recorded. Berg subsequently refused to convey to Nordwick the one-half interest in mineral rights, entering instead into a contract with a third party without revealing Nordwick's one-half interest. The District Court ruled that Nordwick was entitled to one-half interest. The Supreme Court denied Berg's assertion on appeal that the written agreement lacked adequate consideration. Nordwick v. Berg, 223 M 337, 725 P2d 1195, 43 St. Rep. 1768 (1986). See also Larson v. Green Tree Financial Corp., 1999 MT 157, 295 M 110, 983 P2d 357, 56 St. Rep. 618 (1999).

Contract for Sale — Change to Option Contract: Plaintiff and realtor authorized to sell lots for corporation executed a 1975 contract under which plaintiff deposited $500, would pay $5,000 upon payment to plaintiff at a future uncertain time of a bonus in that amount, and would pay the balance of the purchase price within 90 days of the $5,000 payment and be given title. The contract was later modified to provide that if the bonus was not paid by January 1, 1980, plaintiff could either purchase the lot by paying the balance of the purchase price beyond the deposit within 90 days or choose not to purchase and to receive back his deposit. The modification changed both parties' rights and obligations, and such changes constituted consideration for the modification. The benefits and obligations of the parties under the modification were sufficient to constitute a mutually binding contract. Naylor v. Hall, 201 M 59, 651 P2d 1010, 39 St. Rep. 1953 (1982).

Counterclaim on Contract — Fulfillment of Preexisting Duties Not Consideration — Effect of Lack of Consideration: Plaintiffs contracted with defendant to build their log home. Before and after occupancy of the home, structural problems requiring repair occurred. At trial, defendant counterclaimed against the plaintiffs for his expenses in installing tie rods in the walls of the home. The plaintiffs had authorized the installation of the tie rods after a windstorm had shown the home to be unstable. Although noting the ratification of the agreement after the rods were installed, the Supreme Court also noted that the home remained unstable and that the rods may have been improperly installed. It said that defendant had a common-law duty to construct the home in a workmanlike manner, in a manner as to assure stability. The duty was not fulfilled even after the installation of the tie rods. Because a promise to perform a preexisting legal or contractual obligation is insufficient consideration for a promise made in return, consideration was lacking in the supplemental (tie rod installation) agreement. Under former Rule 41, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), a counterclaim may be dismissed where, upon the facts and the law, the claimant has shown no right to relief. With consideration lacking, the contract was unenforceable, and the defendant had no right to relief on his counterclaim. Estoppel will not support the defendant's claim without a showing of detrimental reliance, and it has no application when the omissions of the party claiming estoppel brought about the problem. Carroccia v. Todd, 189 M 172, 615 P2d 225, 37 St. Rep. 1437 (1980), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

No Valid Prior Oral Contract — Consideration for Written Contract: A legal duty to provide a pump under an oral contract would not be sufficient consideration for a later written contract covering the same transaction. When, however, the trial court found that no prior oral contract existed, agreement to provide the pump did constitute valid consideration for the written contract and hence it is not void for lack of consideration. Keil v. Glacier Park, Inc., 188 M 455, 614 P2d 502, 37 St. Rep. 1151 (1980), followed in Keesun Partners v. Ferdig Oil Co., Inc., 249 M 331, 816 P2d 417, 48 St. Rep. 710 (1991).

Relinquishment of Legal Right Sufficient Consideration: A contract entered into in 1974 under which the parties agreed to release and discharge each other from liability and damages related to a previous contract entered into by the parties was supported by consideration. Each relinquished legal rights in executing the 1974 contract. The relinquishment of a legal or contract right is sufficient consideration to support a contract. Rickett v. Doze, 184 M 456, 603 P2d 679 (1979), followed in Johnson v. Estate of Shelton, 232 M 85, 754 P2d 828, 45 St. Rep. 887 (1988). See also Sunburst Oil & Gas Co. v. Neville, 79 M 550, 257 P 1016 (1927); Naylor v. Hall, 201 M 59, 651 P2d 1010, 39 St. Rep. 1953 (1982).

Oral Promise to Pay as Insufficient Consideration: A mere oral promise to pay, as in this case, is not sufficient consideration to support a contractual obligation. Such a promise must be binding and impose some legal obligation on the one making it. A contract is not made so long as, in the contemplation of both parties thereto, something remains to be done in order to establish contract relations. Schwedes v. Romain, 179 M 466, 587 P2d 388 (1978).

Promise to Fulfill Existing Obligation as Insufficient Consideration: A promise to do what a person is already obligated by law or contract to do is not sufficient consideration for a promise made in return, and an agreement to surrender possession of property which promisor is already under legal obligation to surrender is not sufficient consideration to support a promise. Hewitt v. Novak, 117 M 365, 158 P2d 627 (1945).

Family Debt: Where defendant was conversant with the fact the money procured on a mortgage on her land was to be, and was, used to pay off an indebtedness of her father for supplies used by the family and she made no complaint until action to foreclose was commenced, her defense of lack of consideration (since she received only $50 in cash of the $4,000 loaned) was unavailing. Morigeau v. Lozar, 81 M 434, 263 P 985 (1928).

Preexisting Debt Constitutes Value: A preexisting debt constitutes value, and therefore the surrender of an old promissory note upon execution of one to take its place is a sufficient consideration for the latter, and the fact that the obligation surrendered is that of another person is immaterial. First St. Bank v. Mussigbrod, 83 M 68, 271 P 695 (1928).

PROMISSORY NOTE

Loan Consolidation — Valid Consideration: A note consolidating and representing an accumulation of previous loans involving the same bank is a prior debt sufficient to constitute consideration. Farmers St. Bank v. Johnson, 188 M 55, 610 P2d 1172 (1980).

Promissory Note Constitutes Valuable Consideration: A promissory note given in consideration of an oil and gas lease was a valuable consideration, and the fact that the lessor, more than a year after its delivery, returned it to the lessee was immaterial; it having been the property of the lessor, he could do with it as he saw fit. Nadeau v. Texas Co., 104 M 558, 69 P2d 586 (1937).

Partial Consideration — Sufficiency: The fact that the maker of a promissory note did not receive all he desired by way of consideration did not vitiate his promise; having received a substantial part of it, it was sufficient to sustain the contract. Farmers & Miners' St. Bank v. Probst, 81 M 248, 263 P 693 (1928).

Note for Conditional Sale Contract: Where defendants, who had bought various pieces of farm machinery under a conditional sale contract, giving their promissory note therefor, thereafter disposed of part of them, and upon failure to pay the note plaintiff, in an action in claim and delivery, recovered a portion of the property crediting the value thereof on the note, there was a sufficient consideration in support of plaintiff's action to recover the balance due on the note. Lindsay Bros. Co. v. Montgomery, 68 M 294, 216 P 795 (1923).

Possession of Land: In an action on a promissory note for $650 in which defense of want of consideration was raised, where plaintiff, in possession of public land under a claim of right to desert entry and upon which he had made improvements consisting of about 3 miles of fencing, located defendants thereon, delivering possession and surrendering the improvements to them, defendants giving the note in payment, there was sufficient consideration for the instrument. McConnell v. Blackley, 66 M 510, 214 P 64 (1923).

New Agreement Good Consideration: Plaintiff had drilled a well for defendants, accepting their promissory notes in payment. The notes were not paid. The well proved unsatisfactory, and the parties entered into another agreement whereby plaintiff undertook to put the well in working condition and the defendants were to execute new notes and a first mortgage upon their lands to secure the amount then due. The agreement to put the well in condition was a good consideration for the mortgage contract. White v. Hulls, 59 M 98, 195 P 850 (1921).

BENEFIT OR DETRIMENT

Change of Plea Agreement Properly Denied — Application of Contract Law Standards — Agreement Not to Prosecute Father — Benefit Derived by Defendant: Keys agreed to accept a motorcycle as collateral for a loan, but the motorcycle, which Keys subsequently sold, turned out to belong to the father of the individual to whom Keys made the loan. Both Keys and his father were charged with theft, but through his attorney, Keys negotiated an Alford plea with the prosecutor whereby the charges against Keys' father would be dropped and the prosecutor would recommend to the court that Keys' sentence be deferred for 4 years. At the hearing on the plea agreement, Keys, who could not read, had difficulty understanding that the District Court was not bound by and did not have to accept the agreement. However, after a lengthy colloquy with the District Court Judge, Keys eventually did state that he understood the agreement. The District Court then ordered that Keys' sentence be deferred for 6 years, and Keys requested that his plea be withdrawn, based upon his lack of understanding and a lack of consideration for his guilty plea. The District Court refused to allow the withdrawal, and the Supreme Court affirmed that refusal. The Supreme Court held that Keys did benefit from the agreement, that the benefits included the dismissal of charges against his father, and that in dismissing those charges, the state suffered the deprivation of a right (to pursue the conviction of Keys' father) that the law did not require. The Supreme Court also held that even though there was some confusion in Keys' mind over the role of the District Court in the agreement, the record showed by Keys' responses to questions by the District Court that Keys understood, at least at one point in time, that the court was not bound by the agreement. St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999), followed in St. v. D'Amico, 2000 MT 63, 299 M 57, 997 P2d 773, 57 St. Rep. 297 (2000), St. v. White, 2004 MT 103, 321 M 45, 88 P3d 1258 (2004), and Lout v. St., 2005 MT 93, 326 M 485, 111 P3d 199 (2005).

Licensing Requirement as Partial Failure of Consideration in Sale of Business — Rescission Proper: When the seller warranted in a special provision of a contract for deed that no license was required to operate a business and that no restrictions or license would be required as a result of change of ownership and seller later defaulted under these terms when it was discovered that a license was required but denied, it constituted a partial failure of consideration under 28-2-801 because seller did not transfer a going business and buyer was unable to operate the kind of business intended at the time of purchase. Rescission was therefore proper under 28-2-1711. Carey v. Wallner, 223 M 260, 725 P2d 557, 43 St. Rep. 1706 (1986), affirmed, 229 M 57, 744 P2d 881, 44 St. Rep. 1778 (1987).

Obligation to Refund Payment for Gas Field Option: Plaintiff corporation rescinded a gas field option upon which it had paid $50,000 to defendant. After defendant failed to refund money due, plaintiff filed suit and was granted summary judgment for $71,320.55. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, based upon the exhibits, affidavits, and briefs before the lower court, there was no evidence of a genuine issue of material fact. The escrow agreement and release based upon plaintiff's rescission were supported by adequate consideration since release from contract obligations and forbearance to sue are both adequate consideration. Ayers Oil and Gas, Inc., was a party to both the option and the release agreements as evidenced by Ayers' signature as president. Devon Oil & Gas Co., Inc. v. Ayers, 218 M 223, 707 P2d 523, 42 St. Rep. 1536 (1985).

Resolution of Dispute — Adequate Consideration: Defendant represented plaintiff in a civil action in federal court. The parties agreed that the case was originally handled on a 50% contingency fee basis. The case lasted almost 10 years. Plaintiff signed a formal authorization for defendant to settle. At the time of settlement, plaintiff contended the parties agreed to replace their 50% of net fee agreement with a percentage distribution of the gross settlement amount. At some point in time, the parties signed an agreement in defendant's handwriting providing for a 75%-25% split of the settlement. Defendant contended the second fee agreement failed for lack of consideration. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that there was evidence that both parties agreed to rescind the original agreement and enter the second because of a dispute over costs. The change from a net to a gross computation to eliminate the accounting problem was valid consideration for the second contract. Accounts that were in dispute were settled by the revised handwritten contract. Resolution of issues in dispute constituted consideration in support of the second fee agreement. The second fee agreement was a valid, enforceable contract supported by consideration. Eaton v. Morse, 212 M 233, 687 P2d 1004, 41 St. Rep. 1708 (1984).

Refraining From Forming Bank — Good Consideration for Contract to Provide Financing: The bank had an ongoing relationship with Stensvad in which the bank would provide financing for Stensvad's cattle feeding operation. At one point a major stockholder of the bank indicated the bank's intention to withdraw its financial support unless Stensvad withdrew his efforts in the creation of a new bank in Roundup. Stensvad agreed to discontinue his efforts to form a new bank, and the bank agreed to continue to finance the operation. The bank later refused to continue to finance the operation, and Stensvad sued for breach of the agreement. The court found that the interest passing to the bank on the loans and the agreement of Stensvad not to engage in the formation of another bank were good consideration. Stensvad v. Miners & Merchants Bank of Roundup, 196 M 193, 640 P2d 1303, 39 St. Rep. 27 (1982).

What Constitutes Consideration and Mutuality: On appeal from a verdict for the buyer in a breach of contract action, the seller argued that valid consideration and mutuality of obligation were essential to a contract, that the District Court's findings and conclusions failed to set forth those elements, and that the buyer had suffered no legal detriment in the nature of consideration for the reason that his later contract for resale of the calves had not been enforced by that purchaser. However, the mutual promises were valid consideration. The buyer promised to pay the seller a certain amount in return for the seller's promise to deliver the calves on a certain date in a certain condition. The buyer delivered a $2,000 check as downpayment on his promise. Under 28-2-801, mutual promises alone were enough to constitute valid consideration. Miller v. Titeca, 192 M 357, 628 P2d 670, 38 St. Rep. 853 (1981).

Lack of Consideration: The court found that a "letter of instruction and joint assignment of funds" was unenforceable because it was not supported by consideration. The issuers, a bank and the purchaser of a modular home, were not bound because no benefit was conferred on them by the plaintiff manufacturer of the home and the plaintiff did not incur any detriment. The consideration recited in the letter was "inducement . . . to begin production" of the home. At the time of the execution of the letter, the home had already been manufactured and delivered to the plaintiff's authorized dealer. No dealings occurred between the plaintiff and the bank; the lending arrangement was rather between the bank and the dealer. Boise Cascade Corp. v. First Sec. Bank of Anaconda, 183 M 378, 600 P2d 173 (1979).

Prejudice Suffered by Payee: Where the purchaser of real property, desiring to assume the liability of the vendor upon a promissory note held by a bank, executed a new note to take the place of the former, and the bank, instead of applying a part of the cash payment made by the vendee and deposited by the vendor to the payment of the latter's note as it properly could have done, accepted the new note in lieu thereof, it thereby suffered such a prejudice which it was not lawfully bound to suffer as an inducement for the maker of the second note to sign it, as constituted a good consideration for the note. Farmers & Miners' St. Bank v. Probst, 81 M 248, 263 P 693 (1928).

Benefit Conferred or Prejudice Suffered: Any benefit conferred upon a promisor or a prejudice suffered or agreed to be suffered by the promisee, as an inducement to the promisor, is a good consideration. Farmers & Miners' St. Bank v. Probst, 81 M 248, 263 P 693 (1928).

Release of Debtor: The loss sustained by a debtor in agreeing to make an assignment for the benefit of his creditors was a sufficient consideration for his release from liabilities owing by him to them under this section in that he suffered a prejudice which he was not lawfully bound to suffer. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co. v. Anderson, 66 M 64, 212 P 853 (1923).

EFFECT ON PENDING LITIGATION

Contractual Obligation for Support Incorporated in Decree — Not Subject to Modification: Husband, to avoid having his divorce contested and thereby besmirching his girlfriend's name, agreed, in a property settlement agreement incorporated into the divorce decree, to pay $500 per month for 10 years for support of his children and maintenance of their home. In husband's petition for modification of this amount, the District Court was correct in identifying the property settlement agreement as a contract supported by valid consideration that, in the absence of any showing that the welfare of the children was affected, could not be modified. Winters v. Winters, 188 M 43, 610 P2d 1165 (1980).

Contract to Cut Stumpage on Mining Property: There was sufficient consideration to create a binding contract when the contract was executed to resolve a disagreement and a pending injunction and suit. Rogers v. Relyea, 184 M 1, 601 P2d 37 (1979).

Property Agreement Made Before Divorce: An agreement, the purpose of which is to facilitate the granting of a divorce without proper grounds existing, is void. Where proper grounds do exist, an agreement with respect to a property settlement cannot be said to perpetrate a fraud upon the court and will not be held void. Schulz v. Fox, 136 M 152, 345 P2d 1045 (1959).

Extension of Time for Payment of Debt: An agreement by a debtor to pay interest during the period for which maturity of the debt is extended by the creditor is based on a sufficient consideration, in that the creditor promises to forbear bringing suit during the time of the extension, and the debtor forgoes his right to pay the debt before the end of that time. Shipman v. Terrill, 84 M 322, 276 P 21 (1929).

Forbearance to Sue: Forbearance to sue is a sufficient consideration to support a contract, provided there be an agreement, express or implied, to that effect, mere nonaction being of no avail. Doorly v. Goodman, 71 M 529, 230 P 779 (1924). See also Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co. v. Anderson, 58 M 617, 194 P 160 (1920).

Relinquishment of Claim: Where both plaintiff and defendant in a suit looking to the specific performance of a contract to convey lands had a claim to three 40-acre tracts, the relinquishment by plaintiff of his claim to one of them in favor of defendant, for the purpose of effecting a compromise and facilitating the issuance of a patent, was sufficient consideration for the contract sued upon. Murray v. White, 42 M 423, 113 P 754 (1910).

MISCELLANEOUS

Noncompetition Agreement Unenforceable for Lack of Consideration: Four months after beginning employment with plaintiff produce company, Hernandez signed a noncompetition agreement and a nondisclosure agreement providing that Hernandez would not directly or indirectly compete with plaintiff company during employment and for a 2-year period following termination of employment. When the company began experiencing financial difficulties, Hernandez was laid off. Hernandez then began another produce business in the area, and plaintiff filed for a restraining order seeking to enforce the noncompetition agreement and to prevent Hernandez from operating a competing business. The District Court held that the agreement was enforceable and issued a preliminary injunction restraining Hernandez from competing with plaintiff and contacting any of plaintiff's customers and from disclosing any of plaintiff's trade secrets. Hernandez appealed on grounds that the noncompetition agreement was unenforceable as a matter of law. The Supreme Court held that, in the context of noncompetition agreements, clear evidence is required that the employee received good consideration in exchange for bargaining away some postemployment freedom to practice the profession or trade of choice. Here, the District Court found that continuation of Hernandez's employment and income with plaintiff was sufficient consideration, but the Supreme Court strictly construed the agreement and disagreed. Consideration exists if an employee enters a noncompetition agreement as a condition of employment or if an existing employee receives additional independent consideration for entering a noncompetition agreement, but Hernandez signed the agreement 4 months after being hired and received no additional independent consideration for signing, and past consideration cannot serve as good consideration for a present agreement. Therefore, the covenant not to compete was unenforceable as a matter of law for lack of consideration, and it was also error for the District Court to enter the preliminary injunction. The District Court was reversed. Access Organics, Inc., v. Hernandez, 2008 MT 4, 341 M 73, 175 P3d 899 (2008), distinguishing In re Wage Claim of Langager v. Crazy Creek Products, Inc., 1998 MT 44, 287 M 445, 954 P2d 1169 (1998).

Reciprocal Rights and Obligations Considered Sufficient Consideration to Sustain Shareholders' Agreement: Following his termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay on grounds of insufficient consideration, contending that the essential consideration for the shareholders' agreement was the exchange of stocks of equal value—an argument based on the premise that the stock exchange and the shareholders' agreement were one agreement. However, the shareholders' agreement was enforceable independent of the stock exchange between the parties, and the creation of reciprocal rights and obligations among the shareholders was sufficient consideration to sustain the shareholders' agreement; thus, the District Court did not err in concluding that the consideration was sufficient. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Agreement to Convey Partnership Property Void for Lack of Consideration — Agreement to Fund and Forbearance in Dissolving Partnership Held Insufficient: Marsha and Mac formed M&M Walkers, a partnership for the breeding, raising, training, and marketing of Tennessee Walker horses. Their partnership agreement was oral and was sealed with a handshake. When Marsha became concerned about the amount of time and money that she was putting into the partnership, Mac executed a written conveyance of his share of partnership property, which said that if anything happened to him, Marsha was to get all the partnership property. After Mac died, Marsha tried to enforce Mac's written statement against his estate, but the District Court held the statement to be invalid for lack of consideration. The Supreme Court held that while the written instrument is presumptive evidence of consideration, that presumption could be rebutted by Mac's estate, which sought to invalidate the statement. Marsha contended that her agreement to continue funding the partnership was sufficient consideration, but the Supreme Court held that because she had a legal duty to contribute to the partnership in accordance with her share of the profits, her "agreement" was not sufficient consideration. Marsha also argued that her forbearance from dissolving the partnership was also sufficient consideration. Citing Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163 (1982), the Supreme Court noted that it had held that forbearance is sufficient consideration only if there is an agreement to forbear, and in this case, there was no evidence in the record that Marsha had made such an agreement with Mac. The Supreme Court therefore affirmed the District Court's finding that there was insufficient consideration to support Mac's written conveyance of the partnership's property to Marsha. Nitzel v. Wickman, 283 M 304, 940 P2d 451, 54 St. Rep. 684 (1997). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999).

Alleged Lack of Permit for Business — Legal Consideration: Lutes contended that the contract that he entered with Houdashelts for sale of an engine rebuilding business was void for failure of consideration because the sump system in the business did not have the proper permits and was therefore illegal. The District Court rejected the contention that the system was illegal. The Supreme Court held that the parties had each received good consideration in the simple sale of the business and that rescission was thus improper. Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997).

Personal Check Valid Consideration: When the contract stated that $1,000 earnest money was due to be applied at closing, the plaintiff's check, rendered after the contract was signed, constituted valid consideration. Whether the defendants actually cashed the check is irrelevant to the question of its adequacy. Hofmann v. George, 267 M 292, 883 P2d 826, 51 St. Rep. 1007 (1994).

No Accord When Payment Stopped on Check — Evidence of Agreement Properly Excluded: In a dispute over the charges for the care and training of horses, the parties agreed that Watkins would accept $5,000 for his services. The Williamses gave Watkins two checks for $2,500, but they stopped payment on the second check and refused to tender the rest of the money on the basis that one of the horses had been mistreated. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Watkins for $20,191 for services. The Williamses argued that the lower court erred in initially excluding the accord and satisfaction affirmative defense. The Supreme Court ruled that there was no accord because of the Williamses' failure to pay the agreed-upon sum and that the District Court had been correct in excluding testimony concerning the agreement. Watkins v. Williams, 265 M 306, 877 P2d 19, 51 St. Rep. 489 (1994).

Repurchase Agreement Supported by Adequate Consideration: When a contract was construed as a whole, it was apparent that an option to repurchase real property was supported by adequate consideration as part of the original purchase contract. The sellers agreed to provide the buyers with water and access to the sellers' sewer facility. In return, the buyers paid a nominal consideration, agreed to maintain the sewer, and granted the sellers a repurchase option. Even nominal consideration will support an option contract. Edgar v. Hunt, 218 M 30, 706 P2d 120, 42 St. Rep. 1372 (1985).

Novation of Lease — New Lessee's Obligation Not Affected by His Ownership Rights: Franchisor took possession of franchise after franchisee indicated a desire to sell the franchise. To make the franchise more attractive to prospective purchasers, franchisor agreed with Godwin, who had leased equipment to the franchise, to make the rental payments on the equipment if Godwin would forgo repossession of the equipment. In a proceeding involving right to possession of the equipment and recovery of rental payments, although franchisor claimed a right under the Uniform Commercial Code to possession of the equipment under its security agreement with franchisee, the lower court correctly found franchisor liable for rent. That franchisor may have been entitled to possession did not preclude it from making a binding agreement with Godwin to take over franchisee's rental payments. Taylor Rental Corp. v. Ted Godwin Leasing, Inc., 209 M 124, 681 P2d 691, 41 St. Rep. 594 (1984).

Promise to Hold Hearing — Requirement of Independent Consideration: Plaintiff, a custodian at the Yellowstone County Courthouse for 18 years, was discharged. His employment was "at will". After discharge, he was told by the County Commissioners that he would be given a grievance hearing. A letter was later sent to plaintiff, informing him that no hearing would be held. The promise to hold a hearing was not supported by independent consideration. Therefore, it was not an enforceable promise under contract law. Section 39-2-503 (now repealed) was, in effect, a part of the employment contract between plaintiff and the county. A promise to hold a hearing, given at a later date, could not modify that part of the contract without independent consideration unless consented to by both parties in writing. Reiter v. Yellowstone County, 192 M 194, 627 P2d 845, 38 St. Rep. 686 (1981), distinguished in Boreen v. Christensen, 267 M 405, 884 P2d 761, 51 St. Rep. 1014 (1994).

Option Agreement — Sufficiency of Consent and Consideration: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court rejected the defendant's contention that the writing involved was not an option agreement because it failed to meet the essential requirements for the validity of a contract. In particular, he contended that there was a lack of consent and that the consideration was legally insufficient. The Supreme Court found the actual payment of $1 and actual participation in a family corporate dissolution sufficient consideration for the agreement. A memorandum here acted as an offer, and a binding agreement resulted from action on that offer by the offeree. The trial court was affirmed. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981).

Lease Modification to Be Supported by Adequate Consideration: When lessee was entitled to two-thirds of all grain crops harvested, lessor-purchaser's claim that crop belonged to his seller was without merit because the lease was plain and unambiguous and needed no construction. Under the terms of the lease, proof of adequate consideration was required to force the lessee to remake that portion of the lease requiring him to give up his two-thirds share. Edwards v. Peavey Co., 170 M 45, 549 P2d 1082 (1976).

Lack of Consideration as a Defense: There was no basis for the contention that there was no consideration for the execution of a lease of a liquor establishment when in the lease there was a promise to pay a monthly rent, and also the lessee had released a mortgage on the liquor and beer licenses. Sears v. Barker, 126 M 101, 244 P2d 516 (1952).

Waiver of Seller's Right to Cancel Contract — Effect on Buyer's Use of Equity: Although the vendor under a contract to sell realty had given notice of cancellation of the contract pursuant to the forfeiture clause, vendor could thereafter waive the right to stand upon the forfeiture clause, in which case purchaser would have the right to retain possession and use his equity in the realty to form consideration for an agreement with third parties to purchase the equity. Hewitt v. Novak, 117 M 365, 158 P2d 627 (1945).

Past Consideration:

A promise founded partly on a past consideration and partly on an executory one is enforceable. W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Miller, 105 M 456, 73 P2d 552 (1937).

Where a surgeon, after agreeing to perform an operation for a stated amount, was sought to be held under an alleged special contract subsequently made to the effect that he would guarantee that as a result of the operation plaintiff's hand would be rendered 100% efficient, the alleged special contract was void for want of consideration, the past consideration of the operation not covering the subsequent contract of warranty. Wilson v. Blair, 65 M 155, 211 P 289 (1922), overruled on another point in Klemens & Son v. Reber Plumbing & Heating Co., 139 M 115, 360 P2d 1005 (1961).

Want of Consideration — Burden of Proof: The burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support an instrument lies with the party seeking to avoid it. Farmers & Miners' St. Bank v. Probst, 81 M 248, 263 P 693 (1928); Morigeau v. Lozar, 81 M 434, 263 P 985 (1928); W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Washburn, 80 M 308, 260 P 1039 (1927).

Continuation of Contract: Before plaintiff manufacturing company would enter into a renewal contract with a distributor of its goods, it required him to furnish a written contract of guaranty signed by responsible parties agreeing to pay the company on termination of the renewal contract the amount due it from the distributor at the time of the execution of the guaranty or what might become due thereafter. In consideration it promised to furnish the distributor with more goods. The guaranty was furnished, no further goods, however, being thereafter ordered. In an action to recover on the guaranty, trial court did not err in holding that there was a sufficient consideration to support the contract of guaranty of the distributor's indebtedness existing at the time of the execution of the contract, to wit, extension of time of payment, and that, in addition, the agreement as to payment of existing and future indebtedness, being indivisible, was based upon the further consideration that the company would sell more goods to the distributor, the fact that he thereafter did not order more goods did not affect its sufficiency. W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Washburn, 80 M 308, 260 P 1039 (1927).

Consideration for an Enforcement of Implied Indemnity: Defendant, special administratrix of an estate, had a deposit as such in bank, and Weisner, claiming to have been appointed special administrator, made a claim for payment to him of the sum deposited. The bank notified defendant of this demand, and she requested it to refuse the demand and retain the deposit in her name until it could be ascertained who was entitled to it. The bank relied upon her implied promise to indemnify and save it harmless from all damage by reason of its compliance with her request and refused to comply with Weisner's demand. This constituted a good consideration for the implied promise, that is, a benefit conferred on Mrs. Nett and a prejudice suffered by the bank. Mrs. Nett was subsequently removed from her office, and, after her removal, Weisner recovered judgment against the bank for the amount of the deposit with interest from the date of his deposit. Mrs. Nett was not liable to reimburse the bank for the amount paid as interest, it having been the bank's duty without request to retain the deposit to meet its obligation to her. Murphy v. Nett, 51 M 82, 149 P 713 (1915).

Promise to Pay: Where the defendants were assignees of money to be made out of certain wood contracts and plaintiff, an employee of the assignor, procured from the latter an order on defendants for wages due him, whereupon the defendants on presentation of the order for payment took an assignment from plaintiff of all money due him for wages, paying part of the order in cash and giving him a due bill for the balance, the promise to pay the due bill was a sufficient consideration. Parnell v. Davenport, 36 M 571, 93 P 939 (1908).

Case Notes

Obligation to Refund Payment for Gas Field Option: Plaintiff corporation rescinded a gas field option upon which it had paid $50,000 to defendant. After defendant failed to refund money due, plaintiff filed suit and was granted summary judgment for $71,320.55. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that, based upon the exhibits, affidavits, and briefs before the lower court, there was no evidence of a genuine issue of material fact. The escrow agreement and release based upon plaintiff's rescission were supported by adequate consideration since release from contract obligations and forbearance to sue are both adequate consideration. Ayers Oil and Gas, Inc., was a party to both the option and the release agreements as evidenced by Ayers' signature as president. Devon Oil & Gas Co., Inc. v. Ayers, 218 M 223, 707 P2d 523, 42 St. Rep. 1536 (1985).

Warranty Deed — Donative Intent — No Fraud or Lack of Consideration: Plaintiff filed an action to set aside a warranty deed to defendant transferring land that plaintiff had received originally as a tenant in common with defendant's father under the condition that they deed the land to defendant "when they were done with it". The District Court found that defendant was not guilty of deceit or false representation and that there was fair and adequate consideration for the transfer and refused to void the deed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that there was sufficient evidence to support the District Court's findings. Although the land was valued at $300,000 to $600,000 and the consideration for the transfer was $1, plaintiff's performance of the condition requiring transfer of the land to defendant, coupled with the payment of $1, constituted fair and adequate consideration in this case. Wright v. Blevins, 217 M 439, 705 P2d 113, 42 St. Rep. 1311 (1985).

Corporation Owners' Personal Guarantee of Corporation's Contract Obligation: Defendant corporation purchased plaintiff's business under a contract which provided that the inventory of the business would not be reduced in value below the amount still owed plaintiff under the contract. When plaintiff became worried about corporation's plan to carry out such a reduction, the owners of the corporation personally guaranteed payment of that part of the sale price still due plaintiff. There was consideration for the guarantee, in that plaintiff, in return for the guarantee, relinquished various legal rights of action which he would otherwise have had upon reduction of the value of the inventory. Therefore, the guarantee was not void for lack of consideration. Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163, 39 St. Rep. 1923 (1982), followed, with regard to sufficiency of mutual promises as valid consideration, in Kephart v. Portmann, 259 M 232, 855 P2d 120, 50 St. Rep. 771 (1993).

Counterclaim on Contract — Fulfillment of Preexisting Duties Not Consideration — Effect of Lack of Consideration: Plaintiffs contracted with defendant to build their log home. Before and after occupancy of the home, structural problems requiring repair occurred. At trial, defendant counterclaimed against the plaintiffs for his expenses in installing tie rods in the walls of the home. The plaintiffs had authorized the installation of the tie rods after a windstorm had shown the home to be unstable. Although noting the ratification of the agreement after the rods were installed, the Supreme Court also noted that the home remained unstable and that the rods may have been improperly installed. It said that defendant had a common-law duty to construct the home in a workmanlike manner, in a manner as to assure stability. The duty was not fulfilled even after the installation of the tie rods. Because a promise to perform a preexisting legal or contractual obligation is insufficient consideration for a promise made in return, consideration was lacking in the supplemental (tie rod installation) agreement. Under former Rule 41, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), a counterclaim may be dismissed where, upon the facts and the law, the claimant has shown no right to relief. With consideration lacking, the contract was unenforceable, and the defendant had no right to relief on his counterclaim. Estoppel will not support the defendant's claim without a showing of detrimental reliance, and it has no application when the omissions of the party claiming estoppel brought about the problem. Carroccia v. Todd, 189 M 172, 615 P2d 225, 37 St. Rep. 1437 (1980), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Loan Consolidation — Valid Consideration: A note consolidating and representing an accumulation of previous loans involving the same bank is a prior debt sufficient to constitute consideration. Farmers St. Bank v. Johnson, 188 M 55, 610 P2d 1172 (1980).

Performance of Legal Obligation Not to Make One a Purchaser for Value: Performance by a child of the legal obligation to support an indigent parent may be sufficient consideration to support a conveyance to the child, but not such a consideration as to make the child a purchaser in good faith, and for a valuable consideration so as to entitle her to precedence over another purchaser. Kelly v. Grainey, 113 M 520, 129 P2d 619 (1942).

28-2-803. Consideration to be lawful — effect of illegality.

Case Notes

Alleged Lack of Permit for Business — Legal Consideration: Lutes contended that the contract that he entered with Houdashelts for sale of an engine rebuilding business was void for failure of consideration because the sump system in the business did not have the proper permits and was therefore illegal. The District Court rejected the contention that the system was illegal. The Supreme Court held that the parties had each received good consideration in the simple sale of the business and that rescission was thus improper. Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997).

Charging More Than Contract Price Not Unlawful Consideration: Greenwood's claim that a trucker charged more to haul cattle than was agreed upon did not make the contract void for unlawful consideration. Greenwood v. Steve Nelson Trucking, Inc., 270 M 216, 890 P2d 765, 52 St. Rep. 151 (1995).

Contract to Perform County Officials' Duties: County Commissioners cannot contract away duties which under the law are required to be performed by county officials. Thus, where the County Commissioners contracted with an individual for the individual to abstract, make applications for tax deeds, give, post, and publish proper notice of applications, and issue tax deeds, the entire contract is void although in some instances the County Commissioners may properly contract for abstracting. Here, it was unlawful for the County Commissioners to contract away the duties of the County Clerk and County Treasurer relating to the making of applications for tax deeds, giving and posting of notice, and the issuing of tax deeds; therefore the entire contract is void. Kelly v. Silver Bow County, 125 M 272, 233 P2d 1035 (1951).

Wagering or Gambling Transactions — Grain Market: In order to invalidate a contract as a wagering or gambling transaction (instant case grain market transaction) both parties must have intended that, instead of delivery of the article, there should be a mere payment of the difference between the contract price and the market price, i.e., a settlement of the difference, burden of proof on the party assailing the transaction. H. Earl Clack Co. v. Oltesvig, 104 M 255, 68 P2d 586 (1937).

Nonseverable Contracts:

Where there is but a single consideration passing for the performance of several separate and distinct acts, one of which is unlawful, the entire contract, it not being severable, is void, particularly so where it is wholly executory. In re Cummings' Estate, 89 M 405, 298 P 350 (1931).

A contract by the terms of which plaintiff in effect agreed, for a consideration of $50,000, to furnish evidence which would enable defendant to either win two certain suits, or one of them, upon trial, or which would put the latter in such a position that he could force a favorable settlement of one or both of them, was an entire contract, and void as against the policy of the law. Hughes v. Mullins, 36 M 267, 92 P 758 (1907), distinguished in Haley v. Hollenback, 53 M 494, 156 P 459 (1917).

By Whom Illegality May Be Raised: Whenever the illegality of a contract sued upon appears, whether the showing be made by one side or the other, the disclosure is fatal to the case. McManus v. Fulton, 85 M 170, 278 P 126 (1929).

Effect on Parties to Contract: Where a party comes into court seeking to enforce a contract which is against public policy or is prohibited by law, the court will refuse to aid either party and will leave them where they have placed themselves, irrespective of the moral side of the controversy or the claim that justice demands that the one who has received money which belongs to the other should account for it. McManus v. Fulton, 85 M 170, 278 P 126 (1929).

Illegality Under Laws of Another State: A contract void in another state where made will not be enforced in Montana. McManus v. Fulton, 85 M 170, 278 P 126 (1929).

Suppression of Criminal Investigation: A contract which tends to suppress the investigation of a criminal offense is illegal, even though it does not amount to compounding of a felony, for the reason that it is contrary to good morals and public policy. Portland Cattle Loan Co. v. Featherly, 74 M 531, 241 P 322 (1925).

28-2-804. Written instrument presumptive evidence of consideration.

Case Notes

Unambiguous Release of Claims Against Attorney for Malpractice — Parties Bound by Terms of Release: Rich was injured in two automobile accidents and retained attorney Ellingson to represent her in claims against her insurer. The first claim was dismissed when Ellingson failed to serve a timely summons on the insurer after filing the claim. Rich sued Ellingson for malpractice and received a settlement of $175,000 from Ellingson's malpractice insurer. As part of the settlement, Rich signed a release providing that Ellingson was released from any future malpractice claims arising from representation of Rich. Rich's second accident claim was subsequently dismissed when the statute of limitations had run, and Rich again sued Ellingson for malpractice. Ellingson contended that the suit was barred by the release. The District Court agreed and dismissed the claim, and Rich appealed. Considering the document as a whole, the Supreme Court held that the release clearly and unambiguously barred future claims arising from Ellingson's representation of Rich in the multiple actions against Rich's insurer. Rich's latent discontent with the release, without more, was an insufficient basis upon which to premise an alteration of the express, unambiguous agreement. The District Court was affirmed. Rich v. Ellingson, 2007 MT 346, 340 M 285, 174 P3d 491 (2007). See also Hanson v. Oljar, 231 M 272, 752 P2d 187 (1988).

Landowner Subdivision Rights Precluded by Restrictive Covenants — No Oral Contract Without Consideration — Statute of Frauds Applied: Plaintiffs subdivided about 80 acres into a 40-acre water ski lake and five residential lots. Restrictive covenants provided that no more than six landowners would be allowed to use the lake, that five landowners would be owners of lots in the subdivision, and that one landowner would be the owner of a single family dwelling built on property immediately west of the lake. Plaintiffs initially intended to build on the west side of the lake and become the sixth landowner but changed their minds, sold the west side property, and decided to build on the south side instead. Four of the five landowners filed an affidavit that when they purchased their lots, they understood that plaintiffs would be the sixth landowner and that they had orally approved the relocation of plaintiffs' residence to the south shore. After plaintiffs' home was built on the south side, they sought a declaratory judgment that they were the sixth landowner under the restrictive covenants and thus had the right to use the lake. One dissenting landowner opposed the declaratory judgment and moved for summary judgment on grounds that the restrictive covenants prohibited plaintiffs from use of the lake. The District Court agreed and granted summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that there was no evidence of consideration given to the landowners for modification of the covenants and that as a result, the modification benefited plaintiffs only. The right to use the lake ran with the land and was therefore a real property interest, and under the statute of frauds, any transfer of the right from one parcel to another had to be in writing or altered by an executed oral agreement. However, without consideration, there could be no oral contract, and without an oral contract, there could be no executed oral contract. Plaintiffs' argument that because they relied on oral agreements, equitable estoppel should prohibit defendants from denying plaintiffs' use of the lake also failed because equitable estoppel does not apply under the statute of frauds except when the statute would operate to perpetuate a fraud. The District Court was affirmed. Hanson v. Water Ski Mania Estates, 2005 MT 47, 326 M 154, 108 P3d 481 (2005).

Consideration Under Contract Creating Relationship of Lender and Approved Dealer for Making Housing Loans: A contract between the parties created a relationship of Green Tree Financial Corporation (Green Tree) as "lender" and Larson, doing business as Majestic Homes, Inc. (Majestic), as "approved dealer", for purposes of making federal housing loans pursuant to federal Housing and Urban Development (HUD) regulations. Majestic submitted an application to become an approved dealer, and Green Tree then approved Majestic as a dealer and required Majestic to enter into a dealer agreement that included terms expressly provided for by HUD regulations. In order to become and remain an approved dealer, Majestic promised to operate pursuant to HUD regulations—something that it was not otherwise obligated to do in the course of its business. Complying with HUD regulations and meeting other requirements of Green Tree constituted good consideration on the part of Majestic. In return for Majestic's conformance to federal regulations and a security interest in Majestic's assets, Green Tree agreed to perform a service for Majestic by reviewing and approving or rejecting credit applications that Majestic submitted on behalf of its customers. Majestic was allowed to hold itself out as an approved dealer, which provided a competitive advantage in the manufactured home business. The arrangement constituted a contractual relationship whereby the parties exchanged valuable consideration and was enforceable. This relationship is distinguishable from an indefinite requirements or output contract in which there is no exchange of obligations and no establishment of a lender-dealer relationship. Larson v. Green Tree Financial Corp., 1999 MT 157, 295 M 110, 983 P2d 357, 56 St. Rep. 618 (1999). See also Linn v. City County Health Dept., 1999 MT 235, 296 M 145, 988 P2d 302, 56 St. Rep. 922 (1999).

Agreement to Convey Partnership Property Void for Lack of Consideration — Agreement to Fund and Forbearance in Dissolving Partnership Held Insufficient: Marsha and Mac formed M&M Walkers, a partnership for the breeding, raising, training, and marketing of Tennessee Walker horses. Their partnership agreement was oral and was sealed with a handshake. When Marsha became concerned about the amount of time and money that she was putting into the partnership, Mac executed a written conveyance of his share of partnership property, which said that if anything happened to him, Marsha was to get all the partnership property. After Mac died, Marsha tried to enforce Mac's written statement against his estate, but the District Court held the statement to be invalid for lack of consideration. The Supreme Court held that while the written instrument is presumptive evidence of consideration, that presumption could be rebutted by Mac's estate, which sought to invalidate the statement. Marsha contended that her agreement to continue funding the partnership was sufficient consideration, but the Supreme Court held that because she had a legal duty to contribute to the partnership in accordance with her share of the profits, her "agreement" was not sufficient consideration. Marsha also argued that her forbearance from dissolving the partnership was also sufficient consideration. Citing Rudio v. Yellowstone Merchandising Corp., 200 M 537, 652 P2d 1163 (1982), the Supreme Court noted that it had held that forbearance is sufficient consideration only if there is an agreement to forbear, and in this case, there was no evidence in the record that Marsha had made such an agreement with Mac. The Supreme Court therefore affirmed the District Court's finding that there was insufficient consideration to support Mac's written conveyance of the partnership's property to Marsha. Nitzel v. Wickman, 283 M 304, 940 P2d 451, 54 St. Rep. 684 (1997). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999).

Partial Enforcement of Promissory Note: Respondent signed a promissory note to her former husband in the amount of $2,000. She did not make any payments on the note. At trial, she testified that the only consideration she had received for the note was $1,000 and the use of a pickup. Thus, the lower court's decision to enforce the note only partially was not clearly erroneous. In re Marriage of Jones, 218 M 441, 709 P2d 158, 42 St. Rep. 1722 (1985).

Resolution of Dispute — Adequate Consideration: Defendant represented plaintiff in a civil action in federal court. The parties agreed that the case was originally handled on a 50% contingency fee basis. The case lasted almost 10 years. Plaintiff signed a formal authorization for defendant to settle. At the time of settlement, plaintiff contended the parties agreed to replace their 50% of net fee agreement with a percentage distribution of the gross settlement amount. At some point in time, the parties signed an agreement in defendant's handwriting providing for a 75%-25% split of the settlement. Defendant contended the second fee agreement failed for lack of consideration. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that there was evidence that both parties agreed to rescind the original agreement and enter the second because of a dispute over costs. The change from a net to a gross computation to eliminate the accounting problem was valid consideration for the second contract. Accounts that were in dispute were settled by the revised handwritten contract. Resolution of issues in dispute constituted consideration in support of the second fee agreement. The second fee agreement was a valid, enforceable contract supported by consideration. Eaton v. Morse, 212 M 233, 687 P2d 1004, 41 St. Rep. 1708 (1984).

Promissory Note — Lack of Consideration: Where respondent executed a mortgage and promissory note payable to appellant (the victim of alleged theft by the respondent's son) under belief that the note was to provide for her son's bail bond and the son was later released on his own recognizance, the court held that the promissory note was unenforceable for lack of consideration. Bartmess v. Bourassa, 196 M 231, 639 P2d 1147, 39 St. Rep. 56 (1982).

Lack of Consideration Not Proved: The court properly discounted an affirmative defense of lack of consideration when the record did not reflect even a scintilla of evidence tending to prove a lack of good and sufficient consideration. Archer v. LaMarch Creek Ranch, 174 M 429, 571 P2d 379 (1977).

Presumption Rebuttable — Waiver of Claim to Stock: This statutory presumption as applied to the contention of defendants in the instant case that the written waiver of plaintiff's claim to a block of stock in issue was evidence of consideration was sufficiently rebutted by the testimony of plaintiff and one of the defendants that nothing was paid for the waiver. "Waiver" requires two parties, and to be operative must be supported by an agreement founded on a valuable consideration, not necessarily monetary, a benefit to the waiving party or additional burden on the other being sufficient. Gerard v. Sanner, 110 M 71, 103 P2d 314 (1940).

Written Deed: A deed in writing is presumptive evidence of a consideration and therefore satisfactory. One who seeks to invalidate an instrument for want of consideration has the burden of proof. Hodgkiss v. Northland Petroleum Consol., 104 M 328, 67 P2d 811 (1937); Bielenberg v. Higgins, 85 M 69, 277 P 636 (1929); Morigeau v. Lozar, 81 M 434, 263 P 985 (1928); Guerin v. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co., 68 M 365, 218 P 949 (1923); Schauer v. Morgan, 67 M 455, 216 P 347 (1923); Hinerman v. Baldwin, 67 M 417, 215 P 1103 (1923); Dilts v. Brooks, 66 M 346, 213 P 600 (1923); Saint v. Beal, 66 M 292, 213 P 248 (1923).

Consideration When Pleaded to Be Proved Notwithstanding Presumption: While plaintiff in an action on the guaranty of a promissory note need not plead the consideration upon which it was based, where he does so and introduces proof in support of the allegation, the fact must be determined, not upon the presumption of consideration declared by this section, but upon the proofs offered. Doorly v. Goodman, 71 M 529, 230 P 779 (1924).

Burden of Proof: A deed to land furnishes presumptive evidence of a consideration and the burden of showing want of consideration sufficient to support it is upon him who seeks to invalidate it or avoid its effect. Lee v. Laughery, 55 M 238, 175 P 873 (1918).

Debt Instruments:

Under this section and 28-2-805 the plaintiff in an action on a promissory note is not required to show that the instrument had been given for a consideration or a consideration equal in point of value to its face, since the law presumes a sufficient consideration. Ford v. Drake, 46 M 314, 127 P 1019 (1912).

In an action on an instrument acknowledging an indebtedness and promising to pay it, a consideration need not be averred or proven independently of the proof of the contract itself. Noyes v. Young, 32 M 226, 79 P 1063 (1905).

Written Instrument Securing an Antecedent Debt: An instruction given in an action to recover damages for the conversion of certain personal property seized by defendant constable that a note secured by mortgage imported a valuable consideration and that the burden of showing the want of consideration rested upon the party seeking to invalidate it correctly stated the law, even though the mortgage was given to secure an antecedent debt. Borden v. Lynch, 34 M 503, 87 P 609 (1906).

28-2-805. Burden of proof of want of consideration.

Case Notes

Equipment Rental Agreement Creating Presumption of Consideration — Burden of Proof: Carl Weissman & Sons (CWS) agreed to rent a rock drill to D&L Thomas Equipment (D&L). A clause in the rental agreement required D&L to inspect the drill and notify CWS within 10 days specifying any defects and provided that if CWS was not notified, the drill would be conclusively presumed to have been accepted in its condition at the time of receipt. D&L contended that there were problems with the drill immediately after it was received, but did not notify CWS in writing within the 10-day period specified in the rental agreement. D&L asserted that because the drill malfunctioned and overheated, there was failure of consideration on CWS's part, rendering the agreement void. Under this section, the burden to prove failure of consideration was borne by D&L. Absent notification of defects, D&L accepted the drill in its condition upon receipt, so the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's decision that there was sufficient consideration in the contract between the parties. Carl Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. D&L Thomas Equip. Corp., 1998 MT 213, 290 M 433, 963 P2d 1263, 55 St. Rep. 896 (1998).

Agreement to Convey Partnership Property Void for Lack of Consideration — Agreement to Fund and Forbearance in Dissolving Partnership Held Insufficient: Marsha and Mac formed M&M Walkers, a partnership for the breeding, raising, training, and marketing of Tennessee Walker horses. The Supreme Court therefore affirmed the District Court's finding that there was insufficient consideration to support Mac's written conveyance of the partnership's property to Marsha. Nitzel v. Wickman, 283 M 304, 940 P2d 451, 54 St. Rep. 684 (1997). See also St. v. Keys, 1999 MT 10, 293 M 81, 973 P2d 812, 56 St. Rep. 44 (1999).

Cancellation of Oil and Gas Lease: In an action by lessor to cancel an oil and gas lease where the requirement of a geological survey was a part of the consideration, it was necessary for the lessor to plead and prove the requirement. Braun v. Mon-O-Co Oil Corp., 133 M 101, 320 P2d 366 (1958).

Party Seeking to Invalidate Instrument: A written instrument is presumptive evidence of a good and sufficient consideration, and the burden of showing a want of consideration sufficient to support it lies with the party seeking to invalidate it on that ground. Sommer v. Wigen, 103 M 327, 62 P2d 333 (1936); Bielenberg v. Higgins, 85 M 69, 277 P 636 (1929); Farmers & Miners' St. Bank v. Probst, 81 M 248, 263 P 693 (1928); Morigeau v. Lozar, 81 M 434, 263 P 985 (1928); W. T. Rawleigh Co. v. Release of Mortgage: On attacking the release of a mortgage, which was given to him and released by himself, in the manner prescribed in 71-1-211, prior to the 1981 amendment, defendant assumed the burden of showing the existence of facts sufficient to warrant a court of equity in setting it aside. Mueller v. Renkes, 31 M 100, 77 P 512 (1904).

28-2-811. Applicability of rules concerning object to executory consideration.

Case Notes

Lease — Lessor to Renovate — Bilateral Contract: Plaintiff and defendant signed a lease under which plaintiff was to renovate the leased office space and the two were to confer on the renovation and mutually agree on the final plans. Disagreements as to the plans arose. Plaintiff claimed he had increasing difficulties in contacting defendant. Defendant rescinded the lease on the ground that it had continually invested more time and money than plaintiff and thus from a business standpoint the lease was no longer feasible. Plaintiff's attempt to contact defendant's president failed, and plaintiff sent a notice of default and sued. The lease was not an executory unilateral contract; it was a bilateral obligation under which defendant was required to work with plaintiff in designing and approving plans and act reasonably if defendant disapproved the plans. The verdict for plaintiff and denial of defendant's motions for a directed verdict and judgment notwithstanding the verdict were affirmed. Nicholson v. United Pac. Ins. Co., 219 M 32, 710 P2d 1342, 42 St. Rep. 1822 (1985).

28-2-812. How amount of executory consideration may be determined.

Case Notes

Person Specified to Determine Consideration: Under this statute it was competent for the plaintiff and defendant to agree upon and specify any person whom they might desire to determine the amount of plaintiff's fee. They might have designated the Sheriff of the county, a bank cashier, or any other person. If the testimony of the plaintiff is to be believed, they did agree upon the judge of the probate court of Silver Bow County. Fitzgerald v. Eisenhauer, 62 M 582, 206 P 685 (1922).

28-2-813. Determination by interested party.

Case Notes

Reasonable Consideration: The burden was upon the plaintiff to justify the total number of hours required to repair a crane, and where it had taken an unreasonable time to complete the work, plaintiff was entitled to be compensated for only such time as would reasonably have been required to do the work. Holland Constr. Co. v. Lampson, 165 M 356, 528 P2d 1327 (1974).

Proof of Reasonable Worth: Submission of time cards of all employees for the period that repairs were being made did not constitute proof of reasonable worth of an oral contract to repair a crane. Holland Constr. Co. v. Lampson, 165 M 356, 528 P2d 1327 (1974).

28-2-814. Effect of impossibility of designated exclusive method of determination.

Case Notes

Actions on Contract After Provisions Became Impossible: The plaintiff sued when a contingent contract term became impossible and the defendant did not agree to act on alternative terms available within the contract. The District Court granted summary judgment for the plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the contract dispute de novo and affirmed, noting that when using the "blue pencil" approach, one void term does not void a whole contract, and finding that the defendant unreasonably withheld agreement to alternative terms for which the contract provided. Boulder Hydro LP v. NW. Corp., 2018 MT 248, 393 Mont. 85, 428 P.3d 250.

Escalator Clause: Clause in timber contract stating without explanation "Timber price will be esculated [sic] each year" had a positive and definite meaning in the vicinity where the contract was made, and was not so ambiguous as to prevent enforcement of the contract. Pegg v. Mid-State Dev. Corp., 164 M 525, 529 P2d 1399 (1974).

Part 9
Written Contracts

Part Case Notes

Statute of Frauds — No Bar to Fraud Claim: Because plaintiffs were not merely seeking to enforce an oral agreement, the Supreme Court overturned a District Court finding that the statute of frauds precluded a plaintiff's claim of actual fraud, constructive fraud, and violations of the Montana Consumer Protection Act. Rather, the plaintiffs were alleging that the defendants misrepresented an existing real estate loan and serviced the loan in an unfair and deceptive manner, a claim that relied on the oral contract as evidence of alleged fraud but that did not rely on the validity of the oral contract itself. Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167. However, see Bank of America, N.A. v. Alexander, 2017 MT 31, 386 Mont. 305, 389 P.3d 1020, in which a claim that the parties modified an oral agreement was dismissed because it was barred by the statute of frauds.

Case Notes

Limited Agreement Not to Prosecute for Deviate Sexual Conduct — Not Grant of Statutory Immunity — Independently Derived Evidence Applicable: The Jefferson County Attorney contractually agreed not to prosecute Myrhow for criminal acts related to an investigation of deviate sexual conduct by Marks, of which Myrhow had knowledge. However, until other incidents came to light as part of a separate investigation, Myrhow at no time related that he was involved in other unrelated incidents of deviate sexual conduct, including an incident committed prior to the contractual agreement. Myrhow contended that the immunity granted for his information regarding Marks's conduct also extended to his own conduct. The District Court properly found that Myrhow had been granted de facto immunity from prosecution for acts directly related to the Marks investigation, but that immunity was a limited, contractual, transactional immunity arising solely from the agreement not to prosecute, rather than from 46-15-331. The statutory immunity provided by 46-15-331 did not apply because that immunity is granted only when a witness is compelled to testify by court order, a circumstance inapplicable to this case. Because the evidence used to convict Myrhow was derived independently of the Marks investigation and independently of any immunized evidence Myrhow provided through his agreement with the County Attorney, the District Court correctly convicted Myrhow for deviate sexual conduct committed prior to the immunity agreement. St. v. Myrhow, 262 M 229, 865 P2d 231, 50 St. Rep. 1528 (1993).

Certainty as to Terms of Contract Required — Summary Judgment: In suit for breach of alleged oral contract between law partners to find "a place" in the law firm for any of their children who might wish to become lawyers, District Court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Supreme Court affirmed and held that the contract was unenforceable for lack of certainty as to its terms. Defendant's daughter's work for the firm as a law clerk did not perfect the alleged agreement. Plaintiff failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact to preclude entry of summary judgment. Bishop v. Hendrickson, 215 M 158, 695 P2d 1313, 42 St. Rep. 259 (1985). See also Janz v. Quenzer, 232 M 439, 756 P2d 1174, 45 St. Rep. 1178 (1988).

Employment Contract — Interpretation — Deduction of Payments Under Previous Contract: Appellant's contract of employment with Ollie May Vestal was terminated by her death. After her death, he entered into a new employment contract with the personal representative of her estate. Payments made under the original contract may not be deducted from payments due under the second contract of employment, even if payments made under the original contract were greater than the stated amount. Heintz v. Vestal, 185 M 233, 605 P2d 606 (1980).

Lease of State Lands: The Statute of Frauds barred testimony of an alleged oral agreement to sell or assign a state lease when written lease agreements provided specifically for a sublease. Montana law is clear that evidence of oral representations relating directly to the subject matter of a contract is not admissible to add to or alter the provisions of a written contract. Furthermore, the alleged oral agreement involved an agreement to transfer an interest in real property and thus is required to be in writing. Aye v. Fix, 176 M 474, 580 P2d 97 (1978).

GENERAL

Purchase of Property — Statute of Frauds — Claim Regarding Interest in Property Dismissed: Plaintiffs contended they had an oral agreement to lease and purchase real property from the defendants and demanded a portion of insurance proceeds paid to the defendants after a fire destroyed the real property at issue. The parties stipulated that there was no written contract between them to enter a lease for a period longer than 1 year or to purchase the property. Because the statute of frauds requires both leases for a period longer than 1 year and agreements to purchase the property to be in writing, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendants. Hinebauch v. McRae, 2011 MT 270, 362 Mont. 358, 264 P.3d 1098.

Agreement for Commission for Sale of Real Estate Not in Writing — Summary Judgment Denying Commission Affirmed: Andersen assisted in the sale of Schenk's ranch, and although Schenk allegedly told Andersen that Andersen would receive a commission on the sale, no listing agreement was ever reduced to writing. The District Court granted summary judgment for Schenk on the commission issue because 28-2-903 provides that a real estate agreement authorizing an agent to transact for a commission is invalid if it is not in writing. Even though Schenk allegedly told Andersen that a commission would be earned if the ranch sold for at least $10 million, the sale price was $6.5 million, so Andersen could not hold Schenk to an agreement that Schenk never made. Absent a genuine issue of material fact, summary judgment for Schenk was affirmed. Andersen v. Schenk, 2009 MT 399, 353 M 424, 220 P3d 675 (2009).

Refusal to Enforce Unsubstantiated Oral Agreement to Dismiss Claim for Prescriptive Easement — Parol Evidence Rule and Statute of Frauds Inapplicable: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to estop plaintiff from asserting claims for a prescriptive easement across defendant's property because an agent of plaintiff orally agreed to dismiss the claims and defendant relied on the promise to defendant's detriment. The District Court held that the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds prohibited admission of evidence of an oral agreement to dismiss the case because there were written temporary access agreements in place and that defendant did not offer sufficient evidence to meet either a fraud or estoppel exception to the parol evidence rule. The Supreme Court found that the trial court reached the correct result, albeit for the wrongs reasons, by automatically applying the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds without determining whether either rule applied. Actually neither rule barred admission of the evidence in this case, so the trial court was free to consider the merits of the existence of an oral contract without defendant having to prove the elements of fraud or detrimental reliance. Nevertheless, the trial court found defendant's story of an oral agreement to be unsubstantiated and correctly refused to enforce an oral agreement based on the facts before it. Brimstone Min., Inc. v. Glaus, 2003 MT 236, 317 M 236, 77 P3d 175 (2003).

Guidelines for Determining Whether Indian Tribe Has Waived Sovereign Immunity in Contract — Inapplicability of Statute of Frauds to Question of Subject Matter Jurisdiction: Plaintiff contended that he signed a 7-year contract with the Crow Tribe to provide consulting services and to act as a program manager for the planning and construction of a power plant on tribal property and that the tribe breached the contract and failed to pay him. The tribe moved to dismiss on grounds that the District Court lacked personal and subject matter jurisdiction because of the tribe's sovereign immunity. The District Court denied the motion but reserved the right to readdress the issue of subject matter jurisdiction. Following further discovery, neither party could produce a signed copy of the alleged contract. The District Court concluded that because the alleged contract was for employment for more than 1 year, the statute of frauds applied and noted that although plaintiff's performance would normally create an exception to the statute of frauds pursuant to the court's equitable powers, to exercise that power in this case would circumvent the tribe's sovereign immunity in contravention of federal law. The District Court further concluded that although there was an express agreement that was partially performed and that the agreement contained a waiver of tribal immunity from suit in state court, as indicated by affidavits submitted by plaintiff and the tribal presiding officer, because of the fact that a signed copy of the contract was not produced, there was insufficient evidence to overcome the presumption against waiver of tribal immunity, so the action was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction. Plaintiff appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. The Montana statute of frauds in this section limits the enforceability of certain contracts but does not affect a District Court's subject matter jurisdiction, so a District Court need not consider the statute of frauds when determining subject matter jurisdiction; furthermore, the court does not need to invoke its equitable powers to find jurisdiction. Rather, the question facing the District Court was whether the tribe clearly and unequivocally waived its sovereign immunity. The Supreme Court found that plaintiff's complaint alleged sufficient facts that, if true, would vest the District Court with subject matter jurisdiction. The tribe produced no evidence to refute the affidavits or to controvert the recollections of the affiants. Absent any factual issue to resolve, the Supreme Court concluded that plaintiff presented undisputed evidence proving the establishment of a contract that included an unequivocal waiver of sovereign immunity, so dismissal of the complaint by the District Court on jurisdictional grounds constituted reversible error. Bradley v. Crow Tribe of Indians, 2003 MT 82, 315 M 75, 67 P3d 306 (2003). On remand, the District Court again granted Bradley's motion for summary judgment after holding that the tribe's motion to alter or amend was denied because the court did not rule on the motion within 60 days. The Supreme Court held that because there is no provision in former Rule 56, M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), for entry of summary judgment by default, denial of the tribe's motion was erroneous, and because questions of fact existed regarding contract ambiguity and damages, the case was again reversed and remanded for further consideration. Bradley v. Crow Tribe of Indians, 2005 MT 309, 329 M 448, 124 P3d 1143 (2005).

Use of Shared Access Easement Following Amendment of Plat — Statute of Frauds Inapplicable: Two neighbors signed an agreement in the form of an amended plat to relocate a common boundary and share an access easement. Both parties used the access road after executing the agreement, so part performance occurred. A dispute arose, and the District Court concluded that the amended plat constituted an instrument in writing sufficient to satisfy the statute of frauds. On appeal, the parties questioned whether the memorialized amended plat was a sufficient instrument in writing to comply with the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court did not reach the question, concluding that because the parties performed their obligations under the agreement and because part performance occurred at least for a time, the statute of frauds could not defeat the parties' agreement to share the access easement. Although the District Court did not reach its conclusion on the same grounds, the conclusion was nevertheless correct, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Morton v. Lanier, 2002 MT 214, 311 M 301, 55 P3d 380 (2002).

Unsigned Contract for Five-Year Term as Resulting in "At Will" Employment — Basis for Termination: Plaintiff, general manager of a health club, sued the corporation owning the club and its principal shareholder for lost wages and profits when plaintiff was terminated from his position. The District Court held for defendants. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that because a written agreement drafted by the parties had never been signed, the agreement was invalid and not binding upon the parties. Therefore, plaintiff's employment was for an unspecified term, or employment "at will", and the plaintiff could be terminated at will, without the defendant employer following the termination provisions of the unsigned agreement. Scott v. Eagle Watch Inv., Inc., 251 M 191, 828 P2d 1346, 48 St. Rep. 1136 (1991).

Unjust Enrichment — Misconduct by Defendant Required — Denial of Restitution to Defaulting Purchaser: Upon default by purchasers, seller resold the property. Purchasers sought restitution, contending it was unfair to allow seller to be unjustly enriched by selling the property twice. However, restitution is normally denied to a defaulting purchaser. (See Contract Damages in Montana Part II: Reliance and Restitution, Burnham, 45 Mont. L. Rev. 1 (1984).) Further, in order for the equitable doctrine of unjust enrichment to apply, plaintiff must show some element of misconduct or fault on the part of defendant. Schweigert v. Fowler, 240 M 424, 784 P2d 405, 47 St. Rep. 1 (1990). See also Owen v. Skramovsky, 2013 MT 348, 372 Mont. 531, 313 P.3d 205.

Best Evidence of Contract Not in Evidence — Existence of Enforceable Contract Not Proved: A trial court did not err in denying recovery for money paid out on a performance bond when: (1) the bond surety failed to admit the original bond or the original rider into evidence and could offer no certainty as to where the originals were and no reason as to why they were not produced; and (2) all oral testimony offered to prove the contents of the contract was disputed. USF&G Co. v. Cromwell, 237 M 72, 771 P2d 970, 46 St. Rep. 631 (1989).

Certainty as to Terms of Contract Required — Summary Judgment: In suit for breach of alleged oral contract between law partners to find "a place" in the law firm for any of their children who might wish to become lawyers, District Court granted defendant's motion for summary judgment. Supreme Court affirmed and held that the contract was unenforceable for lack of certainty as to its terms. Defendant's daughter's work for the firm as a law clerk did not perfect the alleged agreement. Plaintiff failed to raise a genuine issue of material fact to preclude entry of summary judgment. Bishop v. Hendrickson, 215 M 158, 695 P2d 1313, 42 St. Rep. 259 (1985). See also Janz v. Quenzer, 232 M 439, 756 P2d 1174, 45 St. Rep. 1178 (1988).

Unjust Enrichment — Recovery for Repudiated Contract Not Barred by Statute of Frauds: Where the plaintiffs failed to make a final payment to the defendant under a lease of property upon which the plaintiffs had spent considerable time and effort to grow wheat and the defendant thereafter wrongfully terminated the lease and retained the proceeds from the sale of plaintiffs' crop, the District Court erred in holding the plaintiffs' claim of unjust enrichment barred by the Statute of Frauds. Where one party repudiates a contract or breaches it by nonperformance, the injured party may seek restitution of the unjust enrichment whether the Statute of Frauds applies or not. Here the defendant breached the lease, and the theory of unjust enrichment applies. Robertus v. Candee, 205 M 403, 670 P2d 540, 40 St. Rep. 1391 (1983).

Part Performance:

Over a period of years, grantor, a 95-year-old woman, had deeded various parcels of land near her home to several relatives. She filed a complaint against grantees, alleging that the land had been conveyed in return for their promise to support her and that they had failed to live up to their agreement. As relief, grantor sought either damages or, in the event that the agreement was determined to be unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds, return of the land. Grantees denied the existence of any agreement and pleaded the Statute of Limitations as a defense. The District Court granted grantees' motion for summary judgment and further ruled that grantor's claims were barred by the Statute of Limitations. The Supreme Court reversed in part, ruling that grantor was entitled to present evidence on two of her claims because Montana law provides for the enforcement of a grantor support agreement, that there was a genuine issue of fact as to whether or not such an agreement had been made, and that the trial court's ruling on the Statute of Limitations was premature. Additionally, the court ruled that grantor had no claim for return of the land since, if an agreement existed, grantor's partial performance of that agreement rendered the Statute of Frauds inapplicable, and if no agreement existed, grantor was not entitled to any relief. Sands v. Nestegard, 198 M 421, 646 P2d 1189, 39 St. Rep. 1101 (1982).

Part performance which will avoid the Statute of Frauds may consist of an act done in the performance of the contract which puts the party performing it in such a situation that the nonenforcement of the agreement would be a fraud upon him. Eccles v. Kendrick, 80 M 120, 259 P 609 (1927); McIntyre v. Dawes, 71 M 367, 229 P 846 (1924).

Memorandum — Defined: A memorandum may consist of several writings. Milkovich v. Orr, 529 P2d 1382 (1975) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports).

Party Charged: The "party to be charged" means the party to be charged in the particular suit. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

Form of Instrument: No particular form of language or instrument is necessary to constitute a memorandum or note in writing under Statute of Frauds, and a receipt may be sufficient, and two or more writings properly connected may be considered together. Johnson v. Ogle, 120 M 176, 181 P2d 789 (1947).

Memorandum Executed After Services Performed: Generally, memorandum executed after services have been performed is sufficient to satisfy requirement of Statute of Frauds. Johnson v. Ogle, 120 M 176, 181 P2d 789 (1947).

"Invalid" Defined: The word "invalid" as employed in this section means that the contract referred to, unless in writing, is of no force or effect and hence such contract cannot be relied upon or furnish evidence for any purpose. Mahoney v. Lester, 118 M 551, 168 P2d 339 (1946).

Life Insurance — Change of Beneficiary: This section applies to matters required by the Statute of Frauds, not to private contracts where parties have stipulated that certain things shall be in writing; hence an attorney's authority to request a change of beneficiary in a life insurance policy need not be in writing. Conlon v. N. Life Ins. Co., 108 M 473, 92 P2d 284 (1939).

Executory Contracts:

Complete performance of an oral contract by one of the parties to it takes the agreement out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds under which it otherwise would be invalid. Besse v. McHenry, 89 M 520, 300 P 199 (1931).

Where an oral agreement to adopt was fully performed by the mother upon surrender of the child, and thereafter by the child until the death of the adopting parties, it was taken out of the Statute of Frauds by full performance. Gravelin v. Porier, 77 M 260, 250 P 823 (1926).

AGREEMENTS NOT TO BE PERFORMED WITHIN A YEAR

Agency and Ratification to Be in Writing: The plaintiffs initiated a suit to have certain water rights distributed pursuant to the residuary clause of a will. The defendant argued that the rights had previously been assigned to him by a release that he signed as agent of the deceased and that the deceased had subsequently orally affirmed. The Supreme Court held that the original release had to be in writing because it called for payments for 32 years and therefore was subject to the statute of frauds. The court went on to hold that since the release had to be in writing, then the creation of an agency and the subsequent ratification also had to be in writing and that since they were not, the water rights passed under the will. Moore v. Adolph, 242 M 221, 789 P2d 1239, 47 St. Rep. 730 (1990).

Employment Contract — Interpretation — Deduction of Payments Under Previous Contract: Appellant's contract of employment with Ollie May Vestal was terminated by her death. After her death, he entered into a new employment contract with the personal representative of her estate. Payments made under the original contract may not be deducted from payments due under the second contract of employment, even if payments made under the original contract were greater than the stated amount. Heintz v. Vestal, 185 M 233, 605 P2d 606 (1980).

Full Performance by One Party: Oral contract extending for more than 1 year was taken out of the operation of this section by full performance by one party. Davis v. Davis, 159 M 355, 497 P2d 315 (1972).

Extension of Contract Period: Where employer had been awarded construction contract to be completed in 360 days and hired employee under oral agreement almost immediately thereafter, fact that contract was later amended resulting in an extension of time to correct construction error did not make it invalid under this section, and therefore did not affect employee's right to recover salary upon being fired, since extension of time was not contemplated in the original contract; fact that employee had worked 7 weeks also removed contract from bar of statute under doctrine of part performance. Fox v. Fifth W., Inc., 153 M 95, 454 P2d 612 (1969).

Estoppel: Promisor was estopped from raising Statute of Frauds as defense to action by promisee under oral agreement to divide equally income received from soil bank payments for 8-year period in view of evidence showing glaring inconsistencies in promisor's position. Daley v. Daley, 150 M 432, 436 P2d 88 (1968).

Optional Continuation of Business Relationship: Under the rule that where a contract is capable of performance within 1 year it is not invalid under the Statute of Frauds because not in writing, an oral agreement made between plaintiff and defendant in the late fall to run a band of lambs as partners until they became yearlings (in the spring following) and if they should then take a "notion" they would continue the arrangement, was wholly optional with the parties and might have been fully executed within 1 year and hence was not invalid under this section. Miles v. Miles, 76 M 375, 247 P 328 (1926).

Evidence of Oral Agreement: An oral agreement which by its terms is not to be performed within 1 year from its making is void for any purpose, and part performance does not take it out of the statute; hence it was error to permit evidence of the terms of such an agreement to be introduced in an action to recover the reasonable value of services rendered in pursuance of the agreement. Dreidlein v. Manger, 69 M 155, 220 P 1107 (1923), distinguished in Besse v. McHenry, 89 M 520, 300 P 199 (1931).

Agreement to Be Performed Within a Year: An agreement to be performed within 1 year need not be in writing. Awbery v. Schmidt, 65 M 265, 211 P 346 (1922).

Revenues to Pay Cost of Building: Where a contract between plaintiff and defendant as tenants in common provided for the erection of a house on the common property by defendant at his own expense, requiring him to make an equal division of the rents between them when the rents received equaled one-half the cost, and there was an immediate performance by plaintiff by his surrender to defendant of the entire control of the property, with all revenues to be derived from it, until the stipulated rent should pay for the erection of the building, the contract was enforceable irrespective of the provisions of subsection (1) of this section. Ayotte v. Nadeau, 32 M 498, 81 P 145 (1905).

AGREEMENTS TO ANSWER FOR ANOTHER'S DEBT

Statute of Frauds Inapplicable to Theories of Liabilities Based on Fraud or Negligent Misrepresentation: A feed company sought information from debtor's banker regarding debtor's ability to pay his extremely large feed bill. The banker made affirmative statements that debtor could pay and that even if payment was not made, the company would have an automatic feed lien that would be paid first. The company relied on the statement and extended credit, but when the banker was called later to confirm that a $40,000 check would be paid, he advised that the check would not be honored. The company filed a complaint against the bank, alleging fraud or negligent representation. The bank contended that the cause should be dismissed pursuant to this section because the company alleged in its complaint that the bank failed to honor the check. However, the statute of frauds applies to liabilities based on contract, and because the case in tort was not based on a written agreement, this section did not apply. Phil-Co Feeds, Inc. v. First Nat'l Bank in Havre, 238 M 414, 777 P2d 1306, 46 St. Rep. 1380 (1989).

Vendor's Agreement to Pay Vendee's Debt to Mortgagee as Part of the Consideration for Return of the Property: Where a vendor orally agreed with vendee to pay off vendee's mortgage for a loan with which vendee erected a filling station on the property, as part of the consideration for return of the property (including the newly erected improvement), vendor's oral agreement was not within the Statute of Frauds. Downing v. Crippen, 114 M 436, 138 P2d 575 (1943).

Oral Insurance Policy Neither "Special" Nor "General" Guaranty Within Statute of Frauds: The insolvency and direct suit clause under an oral insurance contract for public liability is not a special guaranty because no special promise is made by the insolvency or direct suit clause to the particular injured third party who sues upon a judgment against the insured, nor is it a general guaranty so worded that anyone to whom it is presented accepts a general promise to be answerable for a debt or duty in case of failure or default of another person who is liable in the first instance. Its primary intent is to protect the insured rather than the third person, and its purpose is indemnity rather than guaranty. Austin v. New Brunswick Fire Ins. Co., 111 M 192, 108 P2d 1036 (1940).

Guaranty Contract: "Guaranty" is a collateral agreement or undertaking on the part of one person called the guarantor to pay a debt or perform an obligation in the event of the failure of the principal, who is himself liable in the first instance for such payment or performance to a third person called the guarantee; it must be in writing and based upon a consideration. Doorly v. Goodman, 71 M 529, 230 P 779 (1924).

Interpretation of Language Used in Agreement: If the language employed in making a promise to pay the debt of another is such that by immemorial usage and common custom it has but one meaning, the character of the promise is to be determined as a question of law; where, however, it is such that reasonable minds might differ as to the meaning intended to be conveyed, its character is to be determined as a question of fact. Breidenbach v. Upper Valley Orchards Co., 57 M 247, 187 P 1008 (1920).

Parent Company as Guarantor of Independent Contractor: Where goods were ordered by and delivered to an independent contractor performing work for defendant company, and charged to him on plaintiff's books, and plaintiff in a former action to recover their price brought suit against the contractor alone, looking to him primarily and the company only as guarantor, the promise of the manager of the company to see that plaintiff "got his money" was a collateral one which, not being in writing, was void under the Statute of Frauds. Breidenbach v. Upper Valley Orchards Co., 57 M 247, 187 P 1008 (1920).

Main Purpose of Promise: Wherever the main purpose and object of the promise is not to answer for another, but to subserve some purpose of promisor's own, his promise is not within the statute, although it may be in form a promise to pay the debt of another, and although the performance of it may incidentally have the effect of extinguishing the liability of another. McGowan Commercial Co. v. Midland Coal & Lumber Co., 41 M 211, 108 P 655 (1910); Carothers v. Connolly, 1 M 433 (1871).

Contract to Pay Debt: A contract to pay another's debt must be in writing. McGowan Commercial Co. v. Midland Coal & Lumber Co., 41 M 211, 108 P 655 (1910).

Payment to Third Person: As the law stood in 1895, the oral acceptance of a written order, whereby a creditor requested his debtor to pay the amount of his debt to a third person, was not deemed to be within the Statute of Frauds as constituting a promise to pay the debt of another. An agreement by such third person not to file a lien upon the debtor's premises would be a good consideration for such acceptance. Lavell v. Frost, 16 M 93, 40 P 146 (1895).

What Constitutes Agreement: A letter containing the following: "You will please make out the record in the P. case, and we will guaranty the payment of your fees by him, P." expresses an agreement within the meaning of the statute. O'Bannon v. Chumasero, 3 M 419 (1879).

Oral Agreement to Pay Lien: The verbal promise of a party who has a claim against a ditch, to pay the lien of another against the ditch, is not within the Statute of Frauds. Carothers v. Connolly, 1 M 433 (1871).

AGREEMENTS TO LEASE FOR MORE THAN A YEAR

Presumption of Yearly Lease — Partial Performance: The parties entered into an oral agreement for lease of grazing land with monthly payments. When a dispute arose, the plaintiff claimed the lease was month-to-month, and the defendants claimed the lease was a 3-year lease. The jury was instructed, pursuant to 70-26-201, that when the terms of a lease are not specified, the lease is presumed to be for 1 year. The jury found in favor of a yearly lease and awarded damages to the defendants. The Supreme Court affirmed. The partial performance of an oral lease for a term beyond that allowed by the Statute of Frauds will take it out of the operation of the statute. Hill v. Turley, 218 M 511, 710 P2d 50, 42 St. Rep. 1783 (1985).

Evidence Not Admissible: An oral lease for more than a year is invalid and evidence of the agreement and secondary evidence of its contents cannot be introduced. Roseneau Foods, Inc. v. Coleman, 140 M 572, 374 P2d 87 (1962).

Lease for One Year: A 1-year oral lease under 70-26-201 is not within the Statute of Frauds, and a continuous renewal thereof under 70-26-204 would also not be within the Statute. Roseneau Foods, Inc. v. Coleman, 140 M 572, 374 P2d 87 (1962).

Term of Lease Where No Time Stated: Under 70-26-201 it is possible to have an oral lease for at least 1 year without an expression as to time therein. Roseneau Foods, Inc. v. Coleman, 140 M 572, 374 P2d 87 (1962).

Application to Executed Part: Statute of Frauds has no application to executed portion of oral lease. Roseneau Foods, Inc., v. Coleman, 140 M 572, 374 P2d 87 (1962).

When Statute May Not Be Invoked: Under an oral contract of lease of a tract of land for a term of 2 years, the lessee remained in possession for the entire term. In an action to recover a balance of $275 of the total rent of $300 stipulated for, the lessee's defense was that the contract was void under the Statute of Frauds because not in writing. Held, that the landlord having fully performed his part of the agreement and the tenant having occupied the premises for the full term, the contract was taken out of the Statute and the tenant was not in position to invoke its invalidity to shield him from payment of the rent. Besse v. McHenry, 89 M 520, 300 P 199 (1931).

Requirements: An agreement for the leasing of real property for a period longer than 1 year must be in writing under this section, and an agreement which must be in writing is not valid if executed by an agent unless the latter is authorized in writing to enter into it, in the absence of ratification by his principal. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co. v. Neville, 79 M 550, 257 P 1016 (1927).

Effect of Part Performance: Part performance of a parol lease of real property for a term beyond that allowed by the Statute of Frauds takes it out of the operation of the Statute, and taking possession, making alterations in the building, and paying the rent agreed upon for a considerable period of time constitute part performance. Kettlekamp v. Watkins, 70 M 391, 225 P 1003 (1924).

What Constitutes Part Performance: Plaintiff's acts in relinquishing his option on a new business location on the oral promise of the defendant, his landlord, that if he would do so he (defendant) would renew the lease plaintiff then held for an additional 3 years, a provision which rendered the promise void under the Statute of Frauds, was such a part performance as removed the agreement from the operation of the Statute. McIntyre v. Dawes, 71 M 367, 229 P 846 (1924).

What Constitutes Lease Agreement: A contract between tenants in common for the erection of a house on the common property by one of them at his own expense, and requiring him to make an equal division of the rents when the rents received equaled one-half the cost, is not a contract of leasing within the meaning of subsection (1)(d) of this section. Ayotte v. Nadeau, 32 M 498, 81 P 145 (1905).

Extension of Lease Agreement: Where one of several lessors of a building had no written authority to sign an extension agreement containing an agreement for a conveyance of the land, for one of the other lessors, as required by subsection (1)(d) of this section, such extension agreement, which was for more than a year, was invalid. Landt v. Schneider, 31 M 15, 77 P 307 (1904).

AGREEMENTS TO SELL INTEREST IN REAL PROPERTY

District Court Error in Finding Purchaser Did Not Act in Good Faith — Summary Judgment Awarded: The plaintiff company filed a quiet title action to mineral rights it had purchased from a personal representative. Heirs of the estate objected, claiming that 72-3-618 did not protect the plaintiff's purchase because the plaintiff failed to act in good faith when it did not locate the will disposing of the estate. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the heirs. The plaintiff appealed to the Supreme Court, which reversed, ruling that because the plaintiff had no actual knowledge of any restrictions on the personal representative's authority, the purchase had been made in good faith and was therefore protected under 72-3-618. The Supreme Court ordered the District Court to enter summary judgment on behalf of the plaintiff. Northland Royalty Corp. v. Engel, 2014 MT 295, 377 Mont. 11, 339 P.3d 599.

Letters of Offer and Acceptance on Real Property Sale Exchanged — Terms of Response Immaterial — Contract for Sale Enforced by Specific Performance: Two sisters owned 78 acres as tenants in common. The defendant sister, who held a majority interest, sent a letter to the plaintiff sister, offering to sell her the majority interest or to purchase the minority interest. The letter set a deadline for a response and requested it be sent to a specified third party. Before the deadline expired, the plaintiff sister wrote back directly to her sister and agreed to purchase the majority interest. However, the defendant sister claimed she had decided to sell the property to their brother. The plaintiff sister sued, seeking specific performance of the contract. The defendant sister argued that the plaintiff had not accepted the original offer because she had not responded to the third party as requested. The District Court concluded that, as phrased in the letter, the request to direct the response to the third party was not a condition precedent to acceptance. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the letters exchanged by the sisters formed a contract and that the mode of acceptance was not a condition precedent. The court affirmed the District Court's grant of specific performance ordering the defendant sister to sell her majority interest to the plaintiff. Olsen v. Johnston, 2013 MT 25, 368 Mont. 347, 301 P.3d 791.

Representation of Contract to Another Party — Use of Statute of Frauds to Later Deny Contract in Real Estate Transaction Precluded: The Kluvers and McRaes commenced a lawsuit alleging that several power companies had contaminated their ground water. A mediation session between the parties ended with an e-mail detailing a memorandum of understanding for a settlement agreement from the Kluvers' attorney to an attorney for the power companies, including the transfer of real estate between the parties. Although Karson Kluver expressed relief to the McRaes that the case was over, the Kluvers later claimed that the settlement agreement was tentative and invalid. Although there was no signed writing to show the Kluvers assented to the agreement prepared by their attorney at the mediation conference, because Karson Kluver later represented that a settlement had been reached to another party, he could not invoke the statute of frauds to deny the agreement. Kluver v. PPL Montana, LLC, 2012 MT 321, 368 Mont. 101, 293 P.3d 817.

Purchase of Property — Statute of Frauds — Claim Regarding Interest in Property Dismissed: Plaintiffs contended they had an oral agreement to lease and purchase real property from the defendants and demanded a portion of insurance proceeds paid to the defendants after a fire destroyed the real property at issue. The parties stipulated that there was no written contract between them to enter a lease for a period longer than 1 year or to purchase the property. Because the statute of frauds requires both leases for a period longer than 1 year and agreements to purchase the property to be in writing, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendants. Hinebauch v. McRae, 2011 MT 270, 362 Mont. 358, 264 P.3d 1098.

Agreement for Commission for Sale of Real Estate Not in Writing — Summary Judgment Denying Commission Affirmed: Andersen assisted in the sale of Schenk's ranch, and although Schenk allegedly told Andersen that Andersen would receive a commission on the sale, no listing agreement was ever reduced to writing. The District Court granted summary judgment for Schenk on the commission issue because 28-2-903 provides that a real estate agreement authorizing an agent to transact for a commission is invalid if it is not in writing. Even though Schenk allegedly told Andersen that a commission would be earned if the ranch sold for at least $10 million, the sale price was $6.5 million, so Andersen could not hold Schenk to an agreement that Schenk never made. Absent a genuine issue of material fact, summary judgment for Schenk was affirmed. Andersen v. Schenk, 2009 MT 399, 353 M 424, 220 P3d 675 (2009).

No Evidence of Contract to Sell Real Property — Specific Performance Precluded: Zier and Lewis entered negotiations for Zier to buy Lewis's Montana ranch. Negotiations broke down after Zier's counteroffer was rejected. Nevertheless, Zier contended that Lewis had agreed to sell the property through Lewis's business manager, and that Zier was entitled to specific performance. The District Court concluded that no contract existed and granted summary judgment for Lewis. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. A valid contract requires mutual consent of both parties, and the parties must agree on the same thing. Acceptance of an offer on terms varying from those offered is a rejection of the offer and puts an end to negotiations unless there is assent to the new terms. In this case there was no contract because there was no consent to the terms of a contract. Without a valid and binding contract, a party may not obtain specific performance. Therefore, the District Court did not err in granting summary judgment for Lewis. Zier v. Lewis, 2009 MT 266, 352 M 76, 218 P3d 465 (2009). See also Austin v. Cash, 274 M 54, 906 P2d 669 (1995).

Ratification of Void Deeds — Authority of Agent to Convey Property — Title Properly Quieted: Defendant third party raised three challenges to a District Court's conclusion that deeds voided by forgery during transfer were nevertheless ratified by subsequent actions of the parties and contended that the court erred by quieting title to plaintiff. The first argument dealt with the fact that one of the parties never received proper written authority to convey the property to plaintiff, so ratification was voided under the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court noted that an agreement to sell an interest in property must be in writing and that an agent's authority to sell property must also be in writing. However, the agency relationship may arise either by precedent authorization or by subsequent ratification. In this case, the warranty deeds constituted subsequent written authority for conveyance of the property, so the statute of frauds was not violated for want of written authorization. The second argument was that the criteria for ratification were not satisfied, but after examining the chain of title, the Supreme Court found that the personal actions of the principal ratified the deed and that the criteria for ratification were satisfied. The third argument was that defendant was prejudiced as a third party by ratification, but that argument did not prevail because defendant could not have been prejudiced since defendant's interest in the property was invalid both prior to and after ratification and defendant could have become aware of the void deeds by conducting a title check and avoiding the problem. Lastly, title was properly quieted in plaintiff because defendants with prior interests in the property stipulated that they no longer claimed any right, title, or interest in the property. Plaintiff's deed was superior because it was the first to be recorded and had been ratified, and plaintiff was therefore entitled to have quiet title to the property. The District Court was affirmed. Erler v. Creative Fin. & Inv., LLC, 2009 MT 36, 349 M 207, 203 P3d 744 (2009). See also U.S. v. Heinszen, 206 US 370 (1907), Audit Serv., Inc. v. Timely Exercise of Third-Party Option to Purchase Real Property — No Breach of Buy-Sell Agreement: A provision in a buy-sell agreement between Palmer and Bahm allowed a third party 72 hours after the Palmer-Bahm agreement was signed to decide whether to purchase a strip of land from Bahm that was contained in the parcel covered by the agreement. Although the third party did not complete the transaction or enter into a separate buy-sell agreement within 72 hours, the buy-sell agreement required only that a purchase decision be made within 72 hours. Uncontroverted evidence showed that the third party made a timely decision to purchase the strip and communicated that decision to Bahm, so Bahm did not violate the agreement with Palmer or break the covenant of good faith and fair dealing by selling the strip to the third party. Palmer v. Bahm, 2006 MT 29, 331 M 105, 128 P3d 1031 (2006).

Landowner Subdivision Rights Precluded by Restrictive Covenants — No Oral Contract Without Consideration — Statute of Frauds Applied: Plaintiffs subdivided about 80 acres into a 40-acre water ski lake and five residential lots. Restrictive covenants provided that no more than six landowners would be allowed to use the lake, that five landowners would be owners of lots in the subdivision, and that one landowner would be the owner of a single family dwelling built on property immediately west of the lake. Plaintiffs initially intended to build on the west side of the lake and become the sixth landowner but changed their minds, sold the west side property, and decided to build on the south side instead. Four of the five landowners filed an affidavit that when they purchased their lots, they understood that plaintiffs would be the sixth landowner and that they had orally approved the relocation of plaintiffs' residence to the south shore. After plaintiffs' home was built on the south side, they sought a declaratory judgment that they were the sixth landowner under the restrictive covenants and thus had the right to use the lake. One dissenting landowner opposed the declaratory judgment and moved for summary judgment on grounds that the restrictive covenants prohibited plaintiffs from use of the lake. The District Court agreed and granted summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that there was no evidence of consideration given to the landowners for modification of the covenants and that as a result, the modification benefited plaintiffs only. The right to use the lake ran with the land and was therefore a real property interest, and under the statute of frauds, any transfer of the right from one parcel to another had to be in writing or altered by an executed oral agreement. However, without consideration, there could be no oral contract, and without an oral contract, there could be no executed oral contract. Plaintiffs' argument that because they relied on oral agreements, equitable estoppel should prohibit defendants from denying plaintiffs' use of the lake also failed because equitable estoppel does not apply under the statute of frauds except when the statute would operate to perpetuate a fraud. The District Court was affirmed. Hanson v. Water Ski Mania Estates, 2005 MT 47, 326 M 154, 108 P3d 481 (2005).

Attempted Sale of Parcel in Violation of Contract — Plantiff Allowed to Block Sale: Defendants contracted to purchase several parcels of property from plaintiff. When defendants ended up in default, defendants decided to sell one of the parcels to pay off part of the contract balance. Plaintiff attempted to block the sale, and the District Court confirmed plaintiff's ability to do so under the terms of the contract. Defendants appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A provision of the contract allowed the subsequent sale of the parcels by defendants, but only after the principal balance was paid. Because defendants were in default when the attempted sale was made, sale of the tract was not permitted by the terms of the contract. The District Court did not err in holding that plaintiff had a contractual right to block the sale. Weter v. Archambault, 2002 MT 336, 313 M 284, 61 P3d 771 (2002).

Defaulting Buyer Under Unambiguous Written Contract Cannot Rely Upon Expectations Not Covered by Contract to Avoid Contract — Disposition of Downpayment Amounts Paid and Due — County Not Liable for Negligent Misrepresentation as to Recordability of Deeds and Seller's Title Insurer Not Liable for Loss in Marketability: Documents for the sale and purchase of two sections of land unambiguously showed, and it was undisputed, that the resale of 20-acre parcels by the buyer, the immediate acceptance by the county of 20-acre resale deeds of a type that would make subdivision review unnecessary, and the ability to resell without having to undergo subdivision review were not parts of the bargain. The parties knew that these things were contemplated, but the documents did not refer to them or make them a part of the contract. Before the contract was made, the county indicated that it would accept the 20-acre resale deeds. The deal fell through when the county changed its position after the contract was signed. The buyer failed to pay the whole downpayment, and the seller terminated the contract and kept the paid portion of the downpayment. Precontract discussions on the matter must be disregarded as parol evidence because the documents were unambiguous and did not refer to the matter. The buyer was not entitled to rescind the contract and have the paid portion of the downpayment returned based on mutual mistake or failure of consideration. There was no mutual mistake because the parties knew that it was not a certainty that the county would accept the deeds. There was no failure of consideration because the resale, county acceptance of the deeds, and avoidance of subdivision review were not part of the written contract. In addition, the need for a subdivision review would not make the land unmarketable; at most, its market value decreased and it would take longer to sell it. Furthermore, a party in default is not entitled to rescission. The seller was entitled to terminate the contract. The seller was also entitled to keep an amount of the paid portion of the downpayment equal to the amount by which the contract price for the land exceeded the market value of the land at the time of the breach. The seller was not entitled to keep the remainder of the paid portion of the downpayment or to a judgment for the unpaid portion of the downpayment because the contract did not provide for that remedy. The county was not liable in tort to the seller for negligent misrepresentation, and the buyer's title insurance company was not liable to the seller for the loss in the marketability of the land caused by the need for subdivision review. Yellowstone II Dev. Group, Inc. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 2001 MT 41, 304 M 223, 20 P3d 755 (2001), overruled in Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), to the extent that Yellowstone II held that the determination of whether a term in a contract is ambiguous is not a question involving parol evidence.

Possession of Real Property Insufficient to Grant Title Against Good Faith Purchasers — No Adverse Possession Shown: In 1989, the Luloffs bought part of a ranch from the Manweilers by a deed that excluded "Tract B". The Luloffs mistakenly assumed that Tract B was the part of the ranch that had been occupied by the Blackburns for approximately 4 years. When the Luloffs later discovered that Tract B was another part of the ranch, they brought an action to have the Blackburns evicted, and the District Court granted summary judgment. The Supreme Court held that summary judgment was correctly granted because there was no contract between the Manweilers and the Blackburns satisfying the statute of frauds for the sale of the property to the Blackburns. The Supreme Court held that the Blackburns' mere possession was insufficient against the Luloffs, who had purchased the ranch as bona fide purchasers in good faith, because they were without notice of any claim of title by the Blackburns. The Supreme Court noted that the Blackburns could not make a claim of title because they had mere possession, which did not satisfy the requirements for adverse possession because the Blackburns had not paid taxes upon the property. Luloff v. Blackburn, 274 M 64, 906 P2d 189, 52 St. Rep. 1124 (1995).

Failure of Counteroffer Under Statute of Frauds — Handwritten Additions by Sellers' Agent Not Subscribed by Sellers — Part Performance and Equitable Estoppel Inapplicable: After Austin rejected a counteroffer on property that he was interested in buying, the agent, Everett, went to the office of the listing agent, Young, who contacted one of the two owners of the property by telephone. That owner, Cash, said that she would consider sale of the property for an additional $5,000 but that she would first have to discuss it with her brother, the other owner. Everett then added a handwritten paragraph to the rejected counteroffer, noting the sale of all of the property for $115,000 and faxed it back to Austin. When Austin received the revised counteroffer, he believed that it had been signed by Cash and, believing that a binding contract had been made, lowered the sale price of other property that he owned in California. Cash and her brother subsequently received and accepted an offer for their property from a different buyer, whereupon the Austins filed a lis pendens against Cash's property, preventing its sale to the other buyer. The Supreme Court held that because neither the sellers nor their agents signed or initialed the handwritten addition to the counteroffer, the contract was not properly subscribed by the sellers or their agents and therefore did not satisfy the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court also held that the action of the Austins in reducing the sale price of their California properties was an act in contemplation of eventual performance of the contract and not an act of part performance itself. For this reason, part performance did not excuse the application of the statute of frauds. The Supreme Court also held that in order for a court to order specific performance of a contract, there had to be a binding contract in the first place and held that because the additional language to the sale contract had not been subscribed, no contract existed. Finally, the Supreme Court held that promissory estoppel is inapplicable when a contract is clearly within the statute of frauds. Austin v. Cash, 274 M 54, 906 P2d 669, 52 St. Rep. 1119 (1995).

Inducement to Purchase Property Based on Promise of Road Improvements — Directed Verdict Improper: Plaintiffs claimed they were fraudulently induced to enter contracts to purchase land when seller orally promised to improve access roads to county grade. The District Court granted defendants a directed verdict, relying on Kelly v. Ellis, 39 M 597, 104 P 873 (1909), in holding that when there was no allegation of failure to keep all promises made in the written agreement, the statute of frauds precluded admission of evidence of an oral promise directly related to the contents of the contract. However, plaintiffs relied on a certificate of survey that showed county grade easements, a letter from defendants' attorney agreeing to hold a title insurance company harmless from any claims arising from purchasers' access problems, and the representation by a realtor that roads would be upgraded to county road standards. These representations constituted a conflict in evidence precluding directed verdict, and the District Court erred in taking from the jury the issue of whether plaintiffs were fraudulently induced to enter the contracts. Dew v. Dower, 237 M 476, 774 P2d 989, 46 St. Rep. 981 (1989), following Majers v. Shining Mtn., 230 M 373, 750 P2d 449, 45 St. Rep. 283 (1988), Majers v. Shining Mtn., 219 M 366, 711 P2d 1375, 43 St. Rep. 16 (1986), Dodds v. Gibson Prod. Co., 181 M 373, 593 P2d 1022 (1979), and Goggans v. Winkley, 154 M 451, 465 P2d 326 (1970). Following a trial subsequent to Dew, infra., the District Court determined that defendant did fraudulently induce plaintiffs to purchase property by misrepresenting the quality of the road that she intended to build as access to the property and further awarded monetary damages to each plaintiff. On appeal, defendant contended, among other things, that the trial court erred in admitting, without first requiring plaintiffs to prove intent to defraud, parol evidence that defendant orally promised to improve the road and also erred in determining that defendant intended to defraud plaintiffs by inducing them to enter into contracts for deed. However, defendant waived the right to appeal the parol evidence question by failing to object at trial, and substantial evidence that defendant had no intention to perform the promises to improve the road was sufficient to prove defendant's intent to defraud. Dew v. Dower, 258 M 114, 852 P2d 549, 50 St. Rep. 454 (1993).

Oral Contract for Purchase of House — Part Performance — Statute of Frauds Inapplicable — No Refund to Purchasers on Default: Defendant agreed to sell home to friends upon a $10,000 downpayment and assumption of defendant's loan. Plaintiffs did not qualify for assumption, so defendant prepared lease for plaintiffs' signature. They refused to sign because it was not a contract for deed. Defendant allowed plaintiffs to take occupancy, and they made sporadic payments for 4 years. Defendant's patience waned when the bank exercised acceleration provision for delinquencies. Plaintiffs sued for refund of payments. The court found an oral contract for deed. The Statute of Frauds was inapplicable because defendant was, at all times, willing to effect sale and transfer of the home. He was not required to refund plaintiffs' payments. Since no lease was ever signed and no rental relationship created, landlord and tenant law was inapplicable. Hayes v. Hartelius, 215 M 391, 697 P2d 1349, 42 St. Rep. 457 (1985).

Attorney Fees — Not Costs — Timeliness: The defendants signed a contract to purchase a tract of land from plaintiffs. The contract provided for attorney fees to the prevailing party in an action commenced on the contract. Plaintiffs filed suit alleging that under the contract and various oral agreements, defendants had agreed to pay a real estate commission to plaintiffs. The trial court granted summary judgment to defendants, holding that written evidence of an agreement to pay a commission did not exist. No notice of entry of judgment was ever filed. Defendants later moved to set an attorney fee award. The trial court ruled that under Title 25, ch. 10, attorney fees were not recoverable costs and that the motion for costs was not timely, as it was not filed within 5 days of judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that attorney fees were awardable under the contract and that defendants' motion was essentially a motion to amend judgment under former Rule 59(g), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). The motion was timely made since no notice of entry of judgment was ever filed. Cook v. Harrington, 203 M 479, 661 P2d 1287, 40 St. Rep. 580 (1983), followed in In re Estate of Lande, 1999 MT 179, 295 M 277, 983 P2d 316, 56 St. Rep. 701 (1999).

Equitable Principles — Estopped From Invalidating Agreement Under Statute of Frauds: Agreement between plaintiff and defendant to sell property was valid under the Statute of Frauds even though the written instrument was signed only by the plaintiff and defendant's wife when plaintiff had made an irretrievable change in position and defendant had secured an unconscionable advantage or inflicted an unjust or unconscionable loss upon the plaintiff. Bolz v. Myers, 200 M 286, 651 P2d 606, 39 St. Rep. 1747 (1982).

Performance of Oral Agreement by Party as Precluding Statute of Frauds Defense: The parties were married in 1973. They entered a prenuptial agreement providing that the real and personal property of each would remain separate. In 1974, defendant brought a quiet title action against his sisters. He executed a handwritten agreement with plaintiff that if she would finance the legal expenses of the action he would give her 10% of the land or the value thereof. He was successful, and the parties entered into an oral agreement containing the same provisions for appellate costs. The trial court found that defendant owed plaintiff 20% of the value of the land and that value be determined at the time he elected to pay and be based on 20% of the value of all the land. The defendant contended there was insufficient evidence to support the finding of the oral agreement for the additional 10% of the land. The weight of evidence and credibility of witnesses were for the District Court to determine. There is no preponderance of evidence contrary to the District Court's finding. Defendant contends the oral agreement is barred by the Statute of Frauds because it is an agreement for the sale of real property and could not be performed in a year. The District Court held and the Supreme Court affirmed that the Statute of Frauds does not bar the oral agreement because plaintiff fully performed her part of the bargain. Kartes v. Kartes, 195 M 383, 636 P2d 272, 38 St. Rep. 1941 (1981).

Independent Investigation Clause Not to Preclude Justifiable Reliance on Representations: Defendants owned property in Flathead County. Water for the property came from a neighbor's well for which they paid him $8 per month. No written agreement existed concerning the water supply. Defendants listed the property for sale with Tri-City Real Estate. Inserted in the listing contract in the printed space following "water" were the words "community $8/mo." Plaintiffs were interested in the land and looked at it. They asked both defendants and the realtor about the water supply and were told it came from a community well. Plaintiffs wanted written verification of the interest in the water system. The realtor told them he would obtain a copy of the register of the well for them. Plaintiffs continued asking for the register but never received it. Plaintiffs signed a contract for deed to buy the property which had been prepared by the realtor's attorney. The contract contained an "independent investigation" clause, which stated that plaintiffs had investigated the property and entered the contract based upon that investigation and that there were no other agreements or representations concerning the property. The neighbor stopped supplying water, and plaintiffs were forced to dig their own well. They sought recovery from defendants. It was held that defendants were responsible for the negligence of their agents in the sale as related to the community water interest. The Supreme Court held that the "independent investigation" clause did not preclude a holding that the plaintiffs justifiably relied on the representations of the realtor. Parkhill v. Fuselier, 194 M 415, 632 P2d 1132, 38 St. Rep. 1424 (1981), distinguished in Garrison v. Averill, 282 M 508, 938 P2d 702, 54 St. Rep. 454 (1997).

Change in Roadway — Oral Agreement Barred: An oral agreement to change the pathway of a road established by a written instrument is barred by this section since it involves an agreement to transfer an interest in real property. Silva v. McGuinness, 189 M 252, 615 P2d 879, 37 St. Rep. 1401 (1980).

Validity of Typewritten Signature — Real Estate Contract: The seller of a tract of land negotiated with and made offers to one party, then withdrew the offers and negotiated with a second party. The second party made the seller an offer which the seller accepted by telegram. The first party sued the seller who then made an agreement with the first party and sent a notice of rescission to the second party. The second party then sued both the first party and the seller. On appeal, the narrow issue was whether the typewritten name at the bottom of the telegram of acceptance of a buyer's offer was a sufficient subscription to satisfy the Statute of Frauds. Because the seller must have intended to authenticate her written name on the telegram to satisfy the Statute of Frauds, the court looked to the wording of the acceptance. It found the words "Please consider this my written acceptance. . ." on the telegram, words suggested by the buyer, indicative of a mutual intent to be bound. Hillstrom v. Gosnay, 188 M 388, 614 P2d 466, 37 St. Rep. 1087 (1980).

Adverse Possession — Parol Grant: A parol grant of real property can serve as a foundation for a claim of title by adverse possession, notwithstanding the Statute of Frauds. Swecker v. Dorn, 181 M 436, 593 P2d 1055 (1979).

Part Performance Exception Limited: A contract for the sale of real estate is invalid unless it or some note or memorandum thereof is in writing subscribed by the parties to be charged. Claimed acts of partial performance sufficient to take an otherwise unenforceable contract out of the Statute of Frauds must be unequivocally referable to that contract. Such acts as obtaining financing and making studies of the real property have been held insufficient part performance to preclude the defense of the Statute of Frauds. Schwedes v. Romain, 179 M 466, 587 P2d 388 (1978).

Lease of State Lands: The Statute of Frauds barred testimony of an alleged oral agreement to sell or assign a state lease when written lease agreements provided specifically for a sublease. Montana law is clear that evidence of oral representations, relating directly to the subject matter of a contract, are not admissible to add to or alter the provisions of a written contract. Furthermore, the alleged oral agreement involved an agreement to transfer an interest in real property and thus is required to be in writing. Aye v. Fix, 176 M 474, 580 P2d 97 (1978).

Specific Performance of Agreement to Sell Land: The Statute of Frauds does not abridge the power of any court to compel the specific performance of any agreement for the sale of real property in case of part performance thereof. Dyksterhouse v. Doornbos, 172 M 461, 564 P2d 1293 (1977).

Option Agreement — Full Performance: Evidence of payment of money pursuant to the purchase of real estate for the purpose of persuading seller to hold the deal open for a certain period of time, and the subsequent actions of the seller in holding the property off the market, were sufficient to establish a valid option agreement, as well as to show that the agreement had been fully performed. Lynch v. Shields, 165 M 396, 529 P2d 348 (1974).

Performance or Memorandum Required: Buyer's tender of payment and a conveyance to be executed by seller did not constitute such performance or memorandum as to take an oral agreement to sell land out of the operation of this section, where seller did not accept the tender or execute the conveyance. Myers v. Bendewald, 160 M 338, 502 P2d 412 (1972).

Sale of Stock: In action for breach of contract trial court improperly refused to direct verdict for defendant seller since oral contract for sale of stock in ranch corporation was invalid under this section and equitable estoppel was not applicable since there was no language amounting to representation or concealment of material facts by seller. Mueller v. Svejkovsky, 153 M 416, 458 P2d 265 (1969).

Specific Performance Not Obtainable: Where defendants had never agreed in writing to take less than $1,000 as a down payment on the sale of their ranch, granting of summary judgment against plaintiff who had offered less and sought specific performance of sales contract was proper, especially after plaintiff had failed to reply in time to defendants' demand for admissions. Naegli v. Daniels, 145 M 323, 400 P2d 896 (1965).

Sufficiency of Memorandum: The fact that the memorandum required by this section does not specify when the deed shall be furnished does not defeat the sufficiency of such memorandum because 28-3-601 implies that it must be furnished within a reasonable time after the other party performs. Hughes v. Melby, 135 M 415, 340 P2d 511 (1958).

Written Authorization of Agent Required: An alleged contract to sell realty on monthly installment basis which would require 15 years for performance, allegedly made by owner's agent, was invalid under Statute of Frauds in the absence of a writing signed by owner, either agreeing to sell or authorizing agent to so contract. Mahoney v. Lester, 118 M 551, 168 P2d 339 (1946); O'Neill v. Wall, 103 M 388, 62 P2d 672 (1936).

What May Constitute Memorandum: A letter written by vendee to vendor pending fulfillment of an escrow agreement which was claimed invalid under the Statute of Frauds, in which letter the writer acknowledged he had agreed to purchase the land in question, and that unless the vendor should fulfill the condition of the escrow agreement within a given time the transaction would be called off, was a sufficient memorandum in writing by the party to be charged, to bar the operation of the Statute under this section. Conner v. Helvik, 105 M 437, 73 P2d 541 (1937).

What Constitutes an Interest in Land: A permanent right-of-way across the land of another for ditch purposes constitutes an interest in the real property, an easement, which under this section must be in writing; whereas a license to so use the land does not create such an interest, may be given by parol, and is revocable at will even though the licensee has expended time and money in acting thereon. Rentfro v. Dettwiler, 95 M 391, 26 P2d 992 (1933).

What Constitutes Sufficient Part Performance: Where plaintiff in an action for the cancellation of a promissory note claimed by defendant to have been given in consideration of an oral contract to convey real property never entered into possession, and defendant neither pleaded nor proved that by plaintiff's alleged part performance of the contract consisting of having the property assessed in his name and paying the taxes thereon for several years, he (defendant) had been placed in such a situation that nonperformance would be a fraud upon him, the acts of plaintiff did not constitute such part performance as would take the contract out of the Statute of Frauds. Eccles v. Kendrick, 80 M 120, 259 P 609 (1927).

Promissory Note Not a Memorandum: A promissory note (or mortgage) said to have been given in connection with the oral transfer of real property is not a sufficient memorandum to take the contract out of the operation of the Statute of Frauds, within the meaning of this section, declaring such a contract invalid unless a note or memorandum thereof be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged. Eccles v. Kendrick, 80 M 120, 259 P 609 (1927).

Exception — Complete Performance: Where an agreement for an exchange of easements such as those involving irrigation ditches has been fully executed, it is valid though not in writing; this section being intended to prevent frauds and not to encourage their perpetration. Babcock v. Gregg, 55 M 317, 178 P 284 (1918).

When Evidence Admissible: Where plaintiff sought to recover money on a demand loan, defendant was properly allowed to introduce testimony tending to show that the money paid him by the former was not a loan, but a partial payment upon the purchase price of real property sold under an oral contract, even though such contract of purchase was invalid and therefore unenforceable under the Statute of Frauds. Perkins v. Allnut, 47 M 13, 130 P 1 (1913).

Grant of Interest in Real Estate: Where the interest acquired by a party under a contract is a right to have a conveyance of land to himself, the transfer of that interest by whatever name called is a grant of interest in real property which must be in writing. Flinner v. McVay, 37 M 306, 96 P 340 (1908).

Part Performance: An oral contract to sell land that has been partly performed is mutual, for both parties are reciprocally bound, the one to convey, and the other to pay the purchase price. Cobban v. Hecklen, 27 M 245, 70 P 805 (1902).

License to Use Land: A license to lay a water main over or through land may be given by parol, as no interest in the land is given, but the license may be revoked at any time, even after it has been executed and money advanced in reliance thereon. Great Falls Water Works Co. v. Great N. Ry., 21 M 487, 54 P 963 (1898).

Express Verbal Contract for Sale of Real Estate: An express verbal contract for the sale of real estate is void under the Statute of Frauds. Ryan v. Dunphy, 4 M 342, 1 P 710 (1882), affirmed in 116 US 491, 29 L Ed 703, 6 S Ct 486 (1886).

AGREEMENTS AUTHORIZING BROKER TO SELL OR PURCHASE REAL ESTATE FOR COMMISSION

Application of Procuring Cause Doctrine to Exclusive Listing Agreements: The procuring cause doctrine, which permits a broker to show that the broker's part of the contract was performed and that the principal reaped a benefit from the efforts, is not confined to consideration of nonexclusive listing agreements. It applies in all situations unless the parties agree otherwise in the listing contract. Lane v. Smith, 255 M 218, 841 P2d 1143, 49 St. Rep. 974 (1992), clarifying Flinders v. Gilbert, 141 M 442, 378 P2d 385 (1963), and followed in Hall & Hall, Inc. v. Hyde, 264 M 190, 870 P2d 1362, 51 St. Rep. 257 (1994).

Date of Lease-Purchase Agreement as Effective Date of Sale in Determining Broker's Commission: When negotiated within the time parameters of a listing agreement, the date on which a lease-purchase agreement is entered into is the effective date of sale for purposes of determining a broker's commission. Lane v. Smith, 255 M 218, 841 P2d 1143, 49 St. Rep. 974 (1992), followed in WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995).

Reliance on Statute of Frauds Not Perpetuation of Fraud Against Broker: Kraft, a broker, alleged that the seller, Hodson, had orally modified their listing agreement in a manner allowing Kraft to negotiate with the ultimate buyer of the property, thereby entitling Kraft to a commission. The Supreme Court held that any modification to the contract had to be in writing or else the statute of frauds would be rendered a nullity. Kraft v. Hodson, 254 M 262, 836 P2d 1234, 49 St. Rep. 792 (1992), followed in WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995).

Failure of Broker to Disclose When Commission Due: A party who contracted with a real estate broker for an exclusive listing was unaware that a transfer of title in lieu of foreclosure would constitute a conveyance entitling broker to a commission, and the broker never informed the party of that fact. Summary judgment was improper where there may have been a genuine issue of material fact as to whether the broker breached a fiduciary duty to disclose. Ellingson Agency, Inc. v. Baltrusch, 228 M 360, 742 P2d 1009, 44 St. Rep. 1598 (1987).

Buyers' Default Irrelevant Under Terms of Contract — Modification of Contract to Be in Writing: Real estate agent arranged sale of defendants' ranch to a partnership consisting of agent's brother and other investors. Sellers received $210,000 from sale before buyers' default. The agent, who had received one-half of his brokerage commission, brought suit to recover remainder of fee under written contract. The District Court granted the agent's motion for summary judgment. The Supreme Court found no material issues of fact in dispute and the District Court's ruling correct as a matter of law and affirmed summary judgment. The Supreme Court held that under the terms of the contract, the broker was entitled to the commission when the sale was made and that a sale was finalized when the sellers entered into a binding sales contract. It was not necessary for the entire purchase price to be paid. The sellers' claim that the broker orally waived the remainder of his commission in return for the opportunity to relist the property is not sufficient to prevent summary judgment because such modification of a written contract must be in writing. Taylor v. Weingart, 214 M 282, 693 P2d 1231, 41 St. Rep. 2474 (1984).

Real Estate Listing — Time Limits Binding: Defendant entered a real estate listing agreement with plaintiff. The agreement was entered June 25, 1979, and was to expire June 25, 1980, with a 180-day grace period for a buyer put in contact with the seller by the realtor. This period ended December 22, 1980. On October 23, 1979, defendant entered a buy/sell agreement with the Gerhardts, who were shown the ranch by a realtor affiliated with the defendant. The agreement was contingent on the Gerhardts' selling their ranch. The Gerhardts occupied defendant's ranch as tenants. Gerhardts were not able to sell their ranch until December 31, 1980, and on January 29, 1981, they bought defendant's ranch. Defendant refused to pay the real estate commission, and this suit followed. It is a generally accepted rule that a buyer is financially "able" only when he can command the necessary funds to complete the purchase within the time allowed by the offer. Here, the buyers were not able to purchase until they sold their ranch. Courts have generally strictly followed the time limits in listing agreements. An exception may occur if surrounding circumstances indicate the time provisions were waived by the parties or if the seller interfered with the sale. Nothing in this case suggests either, and judgment for the defendant was affirmed.

Property Brokers, Inc. v. Loyning, 201 M 309, 654 P2d 521, 39 St. Rep. 2128 (1982). See also WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995), distinguishing Snyder v. Schram, 547 P2d 102 (Oreg. 1976).

When Statute Inapplicable: Where an agreement authorizing the plaintiff to sell real estate for a commission was not in writing, as required by this section, but was nevertheless acknowledged by the defendant and acted on by it, this statute was inapplicable. This statute may not be used so as to defeat its purpose to prevent the commission of a fraud. Ryckman v. Wildwood, Inc., 197 M 154, 641 P2d 467, 39 St. Rep. 378 (1982).

Application of Statute to Real Estate Sale — Collection of Agent's Commission: In an action by the plaintiff real estate brokerage firm to recover a real estate sales commission, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a directed verdict based upon a failure of the plaintiff to comply with the Statute of Frauds. Even though no contract for deed was ever signed, the "contract" at issue in an action to collect a real estate sales commission is the real estate broker's employment contract or "listing agreement". As the listing agreement was in writing and signed by the defendants, the requirements of the Statute of Frauds have been complied with. Assoc. Agency of Bozeman, Inc. v. Pasha, 191 M 407, 625 P2d 38, 38 St. Rep. 344 (1981).

Jury Instruction Correct as to Statute of Frauds — Instruction Held Unnecessary: In an action by the plaintiff real estate brokerage firm to recover a real estate sales commission from the defendant, the trial court did not err in refusing to give the defendant's requested instruction setting forth the law of the Statute of Frauds. The contract at issue is not an oral contract for deed but the written listing agreement signed by the defendant. As there is no dispute over the listing agreement, the instruction was unnecessary and the defendant was not prejudiced by its refusal. Assoc. Agency of Bozeman, Inc. v. Pasha, 191 M 407, 625 P2d 38, 38 St. Rep. 344 (1981).

Real Estate Commission — Setting Chain in Motion Required to Collect Commission: Defendant contended that the requirements of a listing agreement were not sufficiently met by plaintiff to allow the collection of her commission. Plaintiff placed an ad in the newspaper, which named an erroneous price. As a result of that ad, the eventual buyer called plaintiff and obtained the location and identification of the property and the sellers. Plaintiff called defendant and advised her of this development. Defendant then negotiated with the buyer and closed the sale. A broker is entitled to his commission if his efforts set in motion a chain of events which finally culminate in the sale of the property. Here, plaintiff set that chain in motion. Barrett v. Ballard, 191 M 39, 622 P2d 180, 37 St. Rep. 2038 (1980), followed in Lane v. Smith, 255 M 218, 841 P2d 1143, 49 St. Rep. 974 (1992), and in Hall & Hall, Inc. v. Hyde, 264 M 190, 870 P2d 1362, 51 St. Rep. 257 (1994). See also Adams v. Cheney, 203 M 187, 661 P2d 434, 40 St. Rep. 383 (1983).

Modification of Listing Agreement and Failure to Provide Copy: A seller's alleged verbal consent to a broker's unsubscribed and unexecuted modification of a listing agreement was not a factual issue precluding summary judgment in light of the statutory and decisional law which is uniformly suspicious of such modifications. As a matter of law, the broker's failure to provide the seller with a copy of the listing agreement also supported the granting of summary judgment. Carnell v. Watson, 176 M 344, 578 P2d 308 (1978). See also WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995).

Completing Sale Distinguished From Finding Purchaser: In action to recover broker's commissions purportedly due and owing from sale of property owned by defendant, the Supreme Court held that the defendant was not liable because plaintiff broker failed to perform the terms of the exclusive listing agreement by completing the sale. It was insufficient under this agreement to merely find a purchaser. Diehl & Associates v. Houtchens, 173 M 372, 567 P2d 930 (1977), followed in Blumfield Agency v. Little Belt, Inc., 203 M 515, 663 P2d 1164, 40 St. Rep. 605 (1983). See also Ehly v. Cady, 212 M 82, 687 P2d 687, 41 St. Rep. 1611 (1984).

Proof of Agency: Where issue was whether defendant was realtor and had listed property for sale, summary judgment for plaintiff was proper when defendant could produce no written document establishing such facts. Pack River Co. v. Young, 162 M 271, 511 P2d 12 (1973).

Subsequent Oral Modification: Even if corporate minutes and subsequent listing agreement constituted written agreement to pay director commission on sale of corporation's real and personal property, alleged oral modification to permit sale to different buyer at lesser price was barred by this section; contract was not removed from bar of statute as an executed oral agreement under 28-2-1602. Hart v. Billings Pub. Stockyards, 157 M 345, 486 P2d 120 (1971).

Agreement Between Brokers: Agreements between real estate brokers to divide commissions are not within the Statute of Frauds so that an oral agreement between them is enforceable. Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965).

Listing Contract — Burden of Proof: Plaintiff, in an action to recover a broker's commission for procuring a purchaser for real property, has the burden of showing such a contract as would be valid under this section. Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965); Newman v. Dunleavy, 51 M 149, 149 P 970 (1915).

Listing Contract: A listing contract empowering realtors to sell apartment building, being limited to question of sale of the building, was not evidence of any alleged oral agreement providing for management of the building by the realtors. Quitmeyer v. Theroux, 144 M 302, 395 P2d 965 (1964). (Dissenting opinion, 144 M 302, 395 P2d 965 (1964).)

When Writings Sufficient: In action for specific performance of contract for purchase of ranch of defendants, writings were sufficient to take the case out of the Statute of Frauds where instrument giving broker exclusive right for 30 days to sell ranch for $30,000, provided that defendants were to pay broker a $1,000 commission, recited that terms of sale were cash to defendants, possession should be taken by purchaser on named date and that defendants, who retained a 5% royalty, agreed to pay 1953 taxes and transfer all lease land to purchaser, who accepted unqualifiedly in writing accompanied by check as down payment. Ward v. Mattuschek, 134 M 307, 330 P2d 971 (1958).

Application of Subsection: Subsection (1)(e) of this section applies when the subject matter of the agency is real estate as distinguished from personal property and where compensation or a commission is claimed regardless of whether the agent has authority to make a conveyance. Featherman v. Kennedy, 122 M 256, 200 P2d 243 (1948).

Performance of Contract by Buyer and Seller: The fact that the contract between the buyer and seller of real estate has been fully performed has nothing to do with the contract between the seller and the agent claiming a commission and cannot have the effect of removing such contract from the operation of the Statute of Frauds. Featherman v. Kennedy, 122 M 256, 200 P2d 243 (1948).

No Recovery on Quantum Meruit: Where contract with agent for sale of real property is not in writing there can be no recovery of a commission either on the contract or on quantum meruit. Featherman v. Kennedy, 122 M 256, 200 P2d 243 (1948); Roscow v. Bara, 114 M 246, 135 P2d 364 (1943).

Modification Must Be in Writing: Under the Statute of Frauds one who seeks to recover a broker's commission upon an agreement authorizing him to procure a purchaser of real property must be able to show a note or memorandum, subscribed by the party to be charged or his agent, and where the original agreement was modified in its terms, the modification must likewise have been in writing and subscribed, the two being considered together as constituting the note or memorandum required by this section. Roscow v. Bara, 114 M 246, 135 P2d 364 (1943); Gantt v. Harper, 82 M 393, 267 P 296 (1928).

Option Contracts — Not an Interest in Land: The holder of an option to purchase land acquires nothing more than a personal privilege to purchase which does not ripen into an interest in the land itself until the privilege is exercised; hence where the optionee assigned his right to another and entered into an agreement with him whereby he (the assignor) was to find a buyer in consideration of half the profits realized on the sale, his engagement was to perform a service which could lawfully be made orally. O'Neill v. Wall, 103 M 388, 62 P2d 672 (1936); Awbery v. Schmidt, 65 M 265, 211 P 346 (1922).

Employment to Procure Lease: A lease of land is not real estate and therefore a contract employing a broker to procure or sell a lease is not within subsection (1)(e) and therefore need not be in writing. O'Neill v. Wall, 103 M 388, 62 P2d 672 (1936).

Consideration for Agreement: The services rendered by a real estate broker in securing a purchaser constitute the consideration for the commission sought to be recovered by him in his action against the seller; the memorandum evidencing his employment does not require a consideration, and a memorandum executed after the services have been performed is sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the Statute of Frauds. Gantt v. Harper, 86 M 69, 281 P 915 (1929).

Note or Memorandum — What Constitutes: While a brokerage contract sufficient to avoid the Statute of Frauds may be established by an interchange of letters between the broker and the owner of real property sold, a letter written by the secretary-manager of defendant corporation as an individual and not in his official capacity to another of its stockholders stating the attitude of certain holders of stock relative to a sale of the company's real property, the terms to be exacted and commission to be allowed in case sale was made to "anyone", was neither the act of the corporation defendant nor such a note or memorandum as is contemplated by the Statute of Frauds, and therefore plaintiff broker was properly nonsuited in his action to recover commissions for the sale of the property. Skinner v. Red Lodge Brewing Co., 79 M 292, 256 P 173 (1927).

Writing Mandatory: Under this section, which is mandatory, a brokerage contract for the sale of real property as well as any modification in terms must be in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or his authorized agent, to permit a broker to recover compensation or a commission on sale of the property by the owner. Skinner v. Red Lodge Brewing Co., 79 M 292, 256 P 173 (1927); Hartt v. Jahn, 59 M 173, 196 P 153 (1921).

Testimony Inadmissible: A contract to sell real estate belonging to another for a compensation must under this section be in writing, otherwise it is void. Where such a contract is in parol, testimony in support of a cause of action based upon it is inadmissible. Dick v. King, 73 M 456, 236 P 1093 (1925).

Optionholder — What Constitutes Employment of Broker: Since the person to whom an option to buy land is granted acquires no interest in the property itself until he exercises the privilege granted, a contract between the plaintiff and defendant under which the former was to secure the assignment of an option from the holder thereof to defendant did not amount to an employment of plaintiff as a broker or agent to buy land or an interest in land which, under this section, is required to be in writing, but was one to perform a service which could lawfully be made by parol. Kramer v. Schmidt, 62 M 568, 206 P 620 (1922).

Executed Contracts: Under subsection (1)(e) of this section, an agreement authorizing or employing an agent or broker to sell real estate on commission must be in writing, as must also a subsequent modification of its terms, so long as the contract or modification is executory in character, the rule, however, not applying where the contract has been executed. Cobb v. Warren, 64 M 10, 208 P 928 (1922).

Recovery Barred: Where it did not appear that a broker's contract of employment to sell real estate was in writing, or that any note or memorandum thereof, signed by the party to be charged, had been executed as required by this section, no recovery could be had for services rendered thereon. Marshall v. Trerise, 33 M 28, 81 P 400 (1905); King v. Benson, 22 M 256, 56 P 280 (1899).

ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

Allowance of Parol Evidence Rendered Harmless Through Other Evidence: Although a District Court allowed parol evidence to determine the meaning of a "perpetual first option to purchase" in a memorandum of understanding, other evidence in the memorandum was sufficient to reach the same conclusion. Kluver v. PPL Montana, LLC, 2012 MT 321, 368 Mont. 101, 293 P.3d 817.

Failure to Plead: A defendant's failure to mention the Statute of Frauds in the pleadings precludes its consideration. Peretti v. St. Bd. of Educ., 464 F. Supp. 784 (D.C. Mont. 1979).

Memorandum Not Naming Parties: While the Statute of Frauds does not require that the memorandum be contained in a single document, where a memorandum did not name the parties to the alleged contract but referred to them as "we" and "our" and also tended to show that further negotiations were intended by the parties, it was not sufficient to satisfy the Statute. Anderson v. KFBB Broadcasting Corp., 143 M 423, 391 P2d 2 (1964), distinguished in Daley v. Daley, 150 M 432, 436 P2d 88 (1968).

Note May Be Several Writings: The note or memorandum necessary to meet the requirements of this section may consist of several writings, and it is sufficient if it contains all the essentials of the contract, although they are stated in general terms. Hughes v. Melby, 135 M 415, 340 P2d 511 (1958).

What Constitutes Note: An endorsed bank check with the additional words "Payment land" written on it is insufficient to constitute the written "note or memorandum" required by the statutes for it does not contain all the essentials of the agreement. Lewis v. Peterson, 127 M 474, 267 P2d 127 (1954).

Elements of Contract Required: The memorandum must contain all the essentials of the contract but if the material elements are stated in general terms, not all the details or particulars need be stated. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

Pleading: Although a contract to be valid must be in writing, that fact is a matter of proof and need not be alleged in the pleading. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

Presumption of Writing: The law will presume that a contract was in writing in the absence of any statement to the contrary. Johnson v. Elliot, 123 M 597, 218 P2d 703 (1950).

Note or Memorandum — Lack of Elements: Where complaint shows on its face that memorandum of agreement does not contain all essentials of agreement and such essentials cannot be ascertained without resort to oral evidence, demurrer to complaint was properly sustained. Dineen v. Sullivan, 123 M 195, 213 P2d 241 (1950).

Parol Evidence on Memorandum: Parol evidence is admissible to explain ambiguities in note or memorandum relied upon as taking contract out of Statute of Frauds, and to apply the note or memorandum to the subject matter. Johnson v. Ogle, 120 M 176, 181 P2d 789 (1947).

Contract as Evidence to Support Other Pleas: Though an oral contract be invalid under the Statute of Frauds and in an action thereon evidence seeking to establish it is incompetent, it may be received as evidence in support of a plea such as ratification. Arnold v. Genzberger, 96 M 358, 31 P2d 296 (1934).

When Objection Is Waived:

The objection that a contract in suit is invalid under the Statute of Frauds is waived where the point that the contract, to be enforceable must be in writing, was not raised either in the pleadings or by objection to the introduction of evidence. Alley v. Peeso, 88 M 1, 290 P 238 (1930).

Though a contract may have been executed in contravention of this section, it will not be declared void where the statute is not pleaded. Mitchell v. Henderson, 37 M 515, 97 P 942 (1908).

Void Contract Not Admissible: Unless a contract void under the Statute of Frauds because not in writing is removed from the operation of the Statute by an exception, it is not only unenforceable but evidence of it may not be received. McIntyre v. Dawes, 71 M 367, 229 P 846 (1924).

Burden of Proof: The rule is well settled that though a contract to be valid under the statute must be evidenced by a writing and subscribed by the party to be charged or his agent, the fact that it is in writing is a matter of proof and not of allegation in pleading. Blankenship v. Decker, 34 M 292, 85 P 1035 (1906); Hefferlin v. Karlman, 29 M 139, 74 P 201 (1903); Mayger v. Cruse, 5 M 485, 6 P 333 (1885); Sweetland v. Barrett, 4 M 217, 1 P 745 (1882).

Preponderance of Evidence Required: Where the value of property involved in a sale is sufficient to bring the contract of sale within the provisions of section 74-201, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), the burden is on plaintiff, in an action for breach of the contract, to establish by a preponderance of evidence that a valid contract under the statutes was entered into between the parties, together with a breach of such contract, and the consequent damages. Brophy v. Idaho Produce & Provision Co., 31 M 279, 78 P 493 (1904).

PAROL EVIDENCE

Statute of Frauds and Parol Evidence Rule Not Bar to Alleged Oral Contract — Genuine Issue of Material Fact Regarding Intent — Written Agreement Did Not Clearly Evidence Final Expression — Uniform Commercial Code Applied: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for summary judgment based on the defendant's assertion that an alleged oral contract was barred by the statute of frauds or the parol evidence rule. The agreement between the parties involved the sale of brake linings from the defendant to the plaintiff and the sale of remanufactured brakes from the plaintiff to another party. The brake linings and remanufactured brakes constituted moveable goods under 30-2-105, making the alleged oral contract within the ambit of the Montana Uniform Commercial Code's statute of frauds provision in 30-2-201. Because the parties entered into a written agreement and one party asserted the existence of an additional oral contract, the parol evidence rule provided for in 30-2-202 was applied. After the District Court made an initial determination under 30-2-202 that the program agreement did not clearly evidence a final expression of the parties' agreement, it properly denied summary judgment and allowed the jury to consider evidence to elucidate the true nature of the parties' agreement. S & P Brake Supply, Inc. v. STEMCO LP, 2016 MT 324, 385 Mont. 488, 385 P.3d 567, following Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 Mont. 417, 684 P.2d 1067 (1984).

Claims of Oral Misrepresentations Precluded by Terms of Written Contract — Applicability of Parol Evidence Rule: An agreement for the sale of a trailer park contained multiple written terms, including plaintiff's agreement that he had not relied on any assurances as to the condition of the property. In a subsequent disagreement over the condition of the trailer park water system, plaintiff sought to introduce evidence of oral statements made by the seller that the water system was in good or fine condition and that plaintiff had relied on the statements to his detriment. The District Court properly applied the parol evidence rule to exclude the evidence. Plaintiff could not claim that, pursuant to the written contract, he had not relied on any assurances and then claim that he was misled by oral statements contradictory to the contract. Deschamps v. Treasure St. Trailer Ct., Ltd., 2010 MT 74, 356 Mont. 1, 230 P.3d 800, distinguishing Jenkins v. Hillard, 199 Mont. 1, 647 P.2d 354.

Failure to Bring Fraud Action Within Time Claim Accrues — Statute of Limitations Precluding Fraud Action: Plaintiff discovered or reasonably should have discovered within 6 months of purchasing a trailer park in May 2003 that a fraud may have been perpetrated regarding the profitability of the park and the condition of the park water system, but plaintiff did not bring a fraud or misrepresentation claim until 2007. The actual and constructive fraud claims were therefore precluded by the statute of limitations in 27-2-203, which requires an action for fraud to be commenced within 2 years. Plaintiff's claims were properly dismissed as untimely. Deschamps v. Treasure St. Trailer Ct., Ltd., 2010 MT 74, 356 Mont. 1, 230 P.3d 800.

No Ambiguity in Complete, Final Sales Agreement — Parol Evidence Inadmissible: The parties entered a sale agreement for a ready-mix concrete plant. Plaintiff subsequently filed an action alleging that defendant violated the agreement by breaching the covenant to not compete and the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which constituted malice resulting in lost profits, sales, and goodwill. The District Court granted summary judgment to defendant and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly concluded that the sales agreement constituted a complete, final agreement and unambiguously did not include a noncompetition provision, but in fact provided that plaintiff would sell concrete to defendant for use in the area. The intention of the parties was ascertainable from the writing alone, and the agreement was presumed to represent all transactions regarding elements extrinsic to the agreement and was thus considered complete and final, so parol evidence was inadmissible. Richards v. JTL Group, Inc., 2009 MT 173, 350 M 516, 212 P3d 264 (2009). See also Lindey's, Inc. v. Professional Consultants, Inc., 244 M 238, 797 P2d 920 (1990), and Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest States, Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Refusal to Enforce Unsubstantiated Oral Agreement to Dismiss Claim for Prescriptive Easement — Parol Evidence Rule and Statute of Frauds Inapplicable: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to estop plaintiff from asserting claims for a prescriptive easement across defendant's property because an agent of plaintiff orally agreed to dismiss the claims and defendant relied on the promise to defendant's detriment. The District Court held that the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds prohibited admission of evidence of an oral agreement to dismiss the case because there were written temporary access agreements in place and that defendant did not offer sufficient evidence to meet either a fraud or estoppel exception to the parol evidence rule. The Supreme Court found that the trial court reached the correct result, albeit for the wrongs reasons, by automatically applying the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds without determining whether either rule applied. Actually neither rule barred admission of the evidence in this case, so the trial court was free to consider the merits of the existence of an oral contract without defendant having to prove the elements of fraud or detrimental reliance. Nevertheless, the trial court found defendant's story of an oral agreement to be unsubstantiated and correctly refused to enforce an oral agreement based on the facts before it. Brimstone Min., Inc. v. Glaus, 2003 MT 236, 317 M 236, 77 P3d 175 (2003).

Application of Parol Evidence Rule to Stranger to Contract — Stranger to Contract Exception Clarified: Habets bought a 7-mile stretch of buried pipeline from Cenex and, upon attempting to recover the pipeline from the ground pursuant to the contract of sale, was refused access to part of the pipeline by the Swansons, who claimed that they had previously purchased a section of the same pipeline from Cenex. Habets brought an action against the Swansons for access to the pipeline, and the Swansons sought to introduce extrinsic parol evidence to show that under their contract with Cenex, which did not show the purchase of the segment of the pipeline in question, they had in fact purchased the segment of the pipeline in question. The District Court excluded the extrinsic parol evidence because of the parol evidence rule, and the Supreme Court affirmed the exclusion of that evidence. The Supreme Court examined the "stranger exception" to the parol evidence rule, which seemed to indicate that extrinsic parol evidence could be introduced by a person not a party to the contract to vary the terms of the contract. The Supreme Court distinguished its previous opinions in Read v. Lewis & Clark County, 55 M 412, 178 P 177 (1919), Greening v. Gazette Printing Co., 108 M 158, 88 P2d 862 (1939), and Fillinger v. NW. Agency, Inc., of Great Falls, 283 M 71, 938 P2d 1347 (1997), raised by the Swansons in support of that exception. The Supreme Court held that the parol evidence rule applies to exclude evidence extrinsic to an unambiguous contract in any situation involving either parties or strangers to the contract when rights and duties created by the contract are the dispositive issue. Habets v. Swanson, 2000 MT 367, 303 M 410, 16 P3d 1035, 57 St. Rep. 1567 (2000).

Rights Under Written Contract Not Obliterated by Implied Obligation — Nonrenewal of Term Contract: Farris was hired under a term contract that lasted 1 year. The contract provided for nonrenewal with adequate notice. After signing term contracts for 3 consecutive years, Farris was notified that employment would be discontinued. Farris sought to invoke the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, contending that the employer's oral negotiations implied permanent employment and objective manifestations of job security. However, consideration of the oral negotiations was barred by the parol evidence rule of this section, under which oral stipulations are superseded by a written contract. Consideration of representations of permanent employment made after the contract was signed was barred by 28-2-1602, which allows only written or executed oral agreement to affect the validity of a written contract. The Supreme Court cited Carma Developers v. Marathon Dev. Calif., Inc., 826 P2d 710 (Calif. 1992), for the proposition that no obligation can be implied that would result in the obliteration of a right expressly given under a written contract. In interpreting a contract, an implication should not be made when the contrary is indicated in clear and express words. Farris v. Hutchinson, 254 M 334, 838 P2d 374, 49 St. Rep. 717 (1992), distinguishing at-will dismissal under a written contract in Stark v. Circle K Corp., 230 M 468, 751 P2d 162 (1988), and Prout v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 236 M 152, 772 P2d 288 (1989), and followed in Talley v. Flathead Valley Community College, 259 M 479, 857 P2d 701, 50 St. Rep. 889 (1993).

Summary Judgment Proper: Plaintiff, a subcontractor, submitted a bid for excavation, relying on a statement by defendants' representative that there were 25,000 cubic yards of excavation to be performed. The bid was accepted, and work was begun before a final contract was signed using the figure of 25,000 cubic yards. The actual excavation turned out to be about 50,000 cubic yards. Defendants were granted summary judgment, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the parol evidence rule, plaintiff could not introduce evidence of the alleged oral misrepresentations. Sherrodd, Inc. v. Morrison-Knudsen Co., 249 M 282, 815 P2d 1135, 48 St. Rep. 671 (1991), followed in Savik v. Entech, Inc., 278 M 152, 923 P2d 1091, 53 St. Rep. 894 (1996), and Richards v. JTL Group, Inc., 2009 MT 173, 350 M 516, 212 P3d 264 (2009).

Test for Determining Whether Parol Testimony Varies Writing: In determining whether or not the terms of a written instrument are varied by parol testimony, the most satisfactory test is found in the circumstance whether or not the particular element of the alleged extrinsic negotiation is dealt with at all in the writing; if it is mentioned, covered, or dealt with in the writing, then presumably the writing was meant to represent all of the transactions on that element. Lindey's, Inc. v. Professional Consultants, Inc., 244 M 238, 797 P2d 920, 47 St. Rep. 1570 (1990); Cont. Oil Co. v. Bell, 94 M 123, 21 P2d 65 (1933); Hosch v. Howe, 92 M 405, 16 P2d 699 (1932).

Water Well Use Agreement Not Subject to Modification by Parol Evidence: The parties entered into an agreement regulating the use of water from a well owned by the plaintiffs. In their counterclaim, the defendants alleged that the reason the agreement provided that the plaintiffs did not have to extend use of the water to any subsequent purchaser of the defendants' property was in order to assure plaintiffs some say regarding the kind of people who bought the defendants' property. The defendants asserted that the plaintiffs had assured them orally that they would not unreasonably withhold use of the well from subsequent buyers of the defendants' property. The Supreme Court overruled the lower court and held that the agreement was clear on its face and that the parol evidence rule excluded any extrinsic evidence concerning the water use agreement. The defendants were unable to show a breach of the terms of the agreement, and therefore there could be no finding of a violation of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. Baker v. Bailey, 240 M 139, 782 P2d 1286, 46 St. Rep. 2005 (1989).

Unambiguous Contract Description — Applicability of Parol Evidence Rule — Unilateral Mistake: Since a 1971 written agreement was not ambiguous with respect to the land it affected, the parol evidence rule prevented admission of evidence of a 1967 oral agreement to show intent of the parties as to what land was involved. Admission of the oral agreement would only have provided evidence of unilateral mistake, which is not grounds for reforming a written contract. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986), followed in Carelli v. Hall, 279 M 202, 926 P2d 756, 53 St. Rep. 1116 (1996). Carelli was followed in Habets v. Swanson, 2000 MT 367, 303 M 410, 16 P3d 1035, 57 St. Rep. 1567 (2000).

Prior Discussion Did Not Vary Terms of Written Contract: The discussion between the employer and employee concerning the employee's other job, which took place before a written employment contract was entered into, was not considered to have varied the terms of the contract. There was nothing in the written contract to suggest an intent to incorporate the prior discussion. Therefore, the jury was free to conclude that the conversation did not vary the contract. Wilkerson v. School District, 216 M 203, 700 P2d 617, 42 St. Rep. 745 (1985).

Parol Evidence Rules Substantive, Not Procedural — Subject to Rules of Evidence and Common-Law Exceptions: The Montana Uniform Commercial Code's parol evidence rule contained in 30-2-202 continues the operation of the traditional law of contracts parol evidence rule, though with some modifications. Each is a principle of substantive law, not a procedural rule of evidence. Thus, the admissibility of any evidence is ultimately subject to the provisions of the Montana Rules of Evidence, and the traditional common-law exceptions to the contract law parol evidence rule, such as proof of fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, remain exceptions to the parol evidence rule in the Montana Uniform Commercial Code. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984). See also Webcor Electronics, Inc. v. Home Electronics, Inc., 231 M 377, 754 P2d 491, 45 St. Rep. 695 (1988).

Sale of Front-End Loader — Applicable Parol Evidence Rule: Front-end loader that buyer purchased from seller was within the definition of "goods" set out in 30-2-105. Therefore, the sale was governed by the Montana Uniform Commercial Code, and any Code provisions addressing a parol evidence question controlled the answer to the question, with the contract law parol evidence rule of 28-2-904 being used only to supplement the Code. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Contract Part Oral, Part Written — Bid Not Contract — Parol Evidence Rule Inapplicable — Time of Essence by Oral Agreement: The plaintiff in a breach of contract case obtained a bid on a job building a basement. The defendant contractors on appeal argued: (1) that their bid constituted a contract and therefore the parol evidence rule barred testimony concerning a completion date not contained in the writing; and (2) time was not of the essence unless expressly provided in the writing. The Supreme Court said that the bid was an offer and that a purported acceptance which varied or added to the terms of the offer was not an acceptance but a counteroffer. The trial court's finding that the parties had agreed orally to a specific completion date was not clearly erroneous. The contract was partially written and partially oral. Because there was not a final, complete written document intended by the parties to contain all of the terms of the contract, the parol evidence rule did not apply. By agreeing to the completion date with the knowledge that the plaintiff considered the date essential because of approaching cold weather, the defendants agreed that time was of the essence. Therefore, the defendants were in substantial breach on the agreed date. Carriger v. Ballenger, 192 M 479, 628 P2d 1106, 38 St. Rep. 864 (1981), distinguishing Higby v. Hooper, 124 M 331, 221 P2d 1043 (1950).

Parol Evidence Rule Precluding Testimony on Destroyed Copy With Notation: Buechler entered into a contract with Payne, granting him the right to sell Buechler's property. Payne's copy of the contract stated that the listing was exclusive. Buechler offered parol evidence that Payne had written "nonexclusive" on her copy of the contract. Her copy was destroyed and therefore was not entered into evidence. The Supreme Court held that the parol evidence directly contradicts the plain and unambiguous language of the written instrument; it does not fall within any recognized exception permitting its admission in evidence and is clearly inadmissible. Payne v. Buechler, 192 M 311, 628 P2d 646, 38 St. Rep. 799 (1981).

Businessman Neglecting to Read Contract — Oral Testimony Not Admissible: A real estate developer who failed to exercise the care and prudence of a reasonable and cautious businessman by neglecting or failing to read contracts for deeds that he signed may not rely upon 28-2-905, concerning admissibility of extrinsic evidence about a mistake in the instrument, to allow oral testimony to be admissible because this section is given the greater weight when the proffered evidence, as here, is insufficient to establish mistake. Silva v. McGuinness, 189 M 252, 615 P2d 879, 37 St. Rep. 1401 (1980).

Parol Evidence Rule: Where the correspondence of the parties which constituted the written memoranda for an agreement for the sale of a truck crane did not provide that the time of delivery of the crane was of the essence in the contract, it was error to admit parol evidence regarding that term. Martel Constr., Inc. v. Gleason Equip., Inc., 166 M 479, 534 P2d 883 (1975).

Parol Inadmissible Where Terms Unambiguous: Contract between husband and wife for payment of $10,000 in purchase of partnership interest, which stated that the parties released each other from any further liability, was not ambiguous and could not be varied by parol evidence. Merritt v. Merritt, 165 M 172, 526 P2d 1375 (1974).

Change in Legal Effect: Where the consideration expressed in the written instrument is contractual in its nature, oral evidence is inadmissible to show a different consideration because then it changes the legal effect of the instrument. Warner v. Johns, 122 M 283, 201 P2d 986 (1949), followed, with regard to contractual interpretation, in Trustees of the Wash.-Idaho-Mont. Carpenters-Employers Retirement Trust Fund v. Galleria Partnership, 239 M 250, 780 P2d 608, 46 St. Rep. 1661 (1989).

Ambiguous Terms: In an action to recover the purchase price of merchandise (sewing machines) claimed to have been sold to defendants but alleged by them to have been delivered on consignment, plaintiff introduced in evidence a printed order for the goods obtained by its agent, which under the subject "Terms" contained the words "Finance Plan". Defendants, contending that the contract did not contain all the terms agreed upon and that the words "Finance Plan" rendered the contract ambiguous, were permitted to introduce parol evidence to explain the term. The evidence was properly admitted, in that the meaning of the term is not so free from doubt that it may be said, as a matter of law, that it furnishes its own interpretation. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Songer, 91 M 127, 7 P2d 238 (1931).

Object of Parties: The parol testimony rule does not forbid an inquiry into the object of the parties in executing and receiving the instrument sued upon; while its language cannot be qualified or varied from its natural import, the circumstances under which it was entered into and the real intention of the parties may be shown by parol to prevent either of the parties to it from committing a fraud on the other by claiming it to be what it in fact is not. Bridges & Co., Inc. v. Bank of Fergus County, 77 M 524, 251 P 1057 (1926).

Representations of Agent: In an action for damages for breach of a clause of a written contract of sale of a threshing machine warranting it as being as well made of good material and that with proper use and management it would do as good work as any other machine of the same size manufactured for the like purpose, evidence of statements made by defendant's agent in making the sale that it would thresh and clean alfalfa as well as any other machine of the same size, etc., was properly rejected as an attempt to vary the terms of the written instrument by parol. Rowe v. Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co., 61 M 73, 201 P 316 (1921).

Interpretation of Instrument: Where an agreement to furnish automobiles to be sold on commission did not furnish its own interpretation, parol evidence was properly admitted to determine the intention of the parties. Brockway v. Blair, 53 M 531, 165 P 455 (1917).

Error to Admit Parol to Vary Written Terms: Admission of parol evidence to vary and contradict the terms of a written contract is error. Pritchett v. Jenkins, 52 M 81, 155 P 974 (1916).

No Conflict of Evidence: A conversation between buyer and seller had prior to the execution of a bill of sale, with the terms of which it was not in conflict and which was material to show the circumstances under which the writing was executed, was admissible in evidence and not open to the objection that it varied the written agreement. Sutherland v. Green, 49 M 379, 142 P 636 (1914).

ORAL NEGOTIATIONS SUPERSEDED

Sale of Property Contingent on Financing — Financing Contingent on Grant of Contract — Oral Agreement to Purchase Additional Property Contingent on Initial Sale — Summary Judgment Proper Absent Genuine Issue of Fact: Community, Counseling, and Correctional Services, Inc. (Community), agreed to purchase Albright's property for a prerelease center. An additional oral agreement provided that Community would also purchase furnishings on the property when the sale was completed. The sale was contingent on Community's ability to obtain financing, and financing was contingent upon a grant for the prerelease center to Community from the Department of Corrections. Ultimately, the Department declined to issue the contract for prerelease services, Community was unable to obtain financing, and Albright was unable to sell the property or furnishings. Albright sued Community for breach of contract. The District Court granted summary judgment to Community, holding that under the plain language of the contract, the offer terminated when the Department did not issue the contract. Albright appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. No question of fact existed with respect to the conditions for the agreement because the agreement conditioned formation of any contract to buy the real property on Community's ability to obtain financing and Community could not obtain financing without the Department contract. Further, Albright's own affidavit stated that the oral agreement to purchase the furnishings was contingent on purchase of the property, so no issue of fact existed regarding the sale of the furnishings either, and that issue was also properly disposed of by summary judgment. Albright v. Community, Counseling, & Correctional Serv., Inc., 2001 MT 272, 307 M 289, 37 P3d 675 (2001).

Negative Easement Based on Oral Agreement — Statute of Frauds Inapplicable: Appellants claimed an oral agreement made in 1967 subjected land known as the Base Area Chalet to a negative easement that restricted the property to noncommercial activities. The Supreme Court found that a written 1971 agreement only contracted to convey property described as "sellers' land" which had been "subject to ski easement"; however, the chalet property was conveyed away by appellants in 1967 and had never been subject to the ski easement. Since the Base Area Chalet did not belong to "sellers" and was not subject to the easement in 1971, the 1971 agreement had no effect on the chalet property. For the same reason, the 1971 agreement could not satisfy the Statute of Frauds for any alleged oral agreement that would create a negative easement on the chalet property. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Consolidation and Extension of Agreement Between Lender and Borrowers: Defendants argued that a consolidation and extension agreement with the plaintiff bank lacked consideration. They contended that certain oral negotiations previously entered into by the parties had been fully performed by defendants, thus depriving the subsequent written agreement of any new consideration. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's conclusion that the execution of the written agreement in effect superseded and controlled all of the earlier oral agreements. First Nat'l Bank of Missoula v. McGuinness, 217 M 409, 705 P2d 579, 42 St. Rep. 1288 (1985). See also Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, Inc., 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988), and Lachenmaier v. First Bank Sys., Inc., 246 M 26, 803 P2d 614, 47 St. Rep. 2244 (1990).

Final Written Agreement as Precluding Oral Warranty: Plaintiffs and defendant entered an agreement whereby defendant would lease condominiums from the plaintiffs and would sell plaintiffs her home. The lease of one of the condominiums contained an option for defendant to purchase the unit by forgiving plaintiffs their obligation under the promissory note on the home. Plaintiffs discovered that the floors in the home sloped north at a rate of 5½ inches over 30 feet. Plaintiffs sought to rescind the contract, and defendant sought specific performance. Plaintiff contended that defendant stated that there were no problems whatsoever with the house and that this statement created an express warranty. Defendant denied making the statement. The contract between the parties contained a clause which stated that the written agreement constituted the entire agreement and superseded and waived all oral representations, so no express warranty existed. Woodahl v. Matthews, 196 M 445, 639 P2d 1165, 39 St. Rep. 238 (1982).

Effect of Oral Agreement on Written Agreement — Contract for Deed: In this case concerning a contract for deed, one issue on appeal was the effect of an oral agreement on written instruments that followed. The Supreme Court held that it was clear that the written instruments superseded the oral agreement. Stoddard v. Grokin, 191 M 495, 625 P2d 529, 38 St. Rep. 326 (1981).

Issue of Fact as to Whether a Written Agreement Supersedes an Oral Agreement: Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment was properly denied where there was some question of fact as to whether one written agreement signed by plaintiff as agent for his company, by the company vice-president, and by defendant entitling defendant to a salary advance supersedes a prior oral agreement allegedly made between plaintiff and defendant in which plaintiff personally guaranteed a salary to defendant. Reviewing the relationship of the two agreements in the light most favorable to the defendant, the alleged oral agreement is collateral to the written contract, is distinct, involves a different party, and is able to stand independent of the other. Reaves v. Reinbold, 189 M 284, 615 P2d 896, 37 St. Rep. 1500 (1980).

Written Agreement Presumed to Encompass Prior Oral Agreements: A written agreement must be considered as containing all prior oral ones concerning its subject matter, and its terms may therefore not be varied by oral testimony. Biering v. Ringling, 78 M 145, 252 P 872 (1927); Peterson v. Nelson, 77 M 539, 252 P 368 (1926); Swan v. LeClair, 77 M 422, 251 P 155 (1926); Wheeler v. James, 70 M 37, 223 P 900 (1924); Morehouse v. N. Land Co., 68 M 96, 216 P 792 (1923); Webber v. Killorn, 66 M 130, 212 P 852 (1923); Leigland v. Rundle Land & Abstract Co., 64 M 154, 208 P 1075 (1922); Helena Light & Ry. v. N. Pac. Ry., 57 M 93, 186 P 702 (1920).

Resting and Feeding of Livestock: Prior oral negotiations and directions as to points at which livestock should be stopped for resting and feeding were merged in the contract of shipment, where it and the waybills bore notations stating the points at which stops were to be made, and therefore parol testimony of directions to make other stops was incompetent as an attempt to vary the terms of the written contract. Cook v. N. Pac. Ry., 61 M 573, 203 P 512 (1921).

Written Control Supersedes: A written contract supersedes any oral negotiations theretofore had relative to the subject matter of it and must be considered as containing all of its terms agreed upon at the time it was executed. Arnold v. Fraser, 43 M 540, 117 P 1064 (1911).

Application of Section: This section applies to oral negotiations or stipulations concerning the matter of the agreement; if one of the parties was induced to sign the writing by reason of the other's fraud or deceit with respect to some collateral matter, then he might be heard to complain. Kelly v. Ellis, 39 M 597, 104 P 873 (1909).

Oral Negotiations and Stipulations: A contract in writing supersedes all the prior or contemporaneous oral negotiations and stipulations relating to the subject matter of the agreement between the contracting parties. Therefore a party to it will not be heard to complain that there were other stipulations, unless they pertain to some collateral matter which operated as an inducement to his entering into the principal agreement. Kelly v. Ellis, 39 M 597, 104 P 873 (1909).

Evidence of Conversations Incompetent: Evidence of negotiations and conversations immediately preceding the execution of a written contract is incompetent to show an agreement concerning its matter made by one claimed to be bound thereby. Largey v. Leggat, 30 M 148, 75 P 950 (1904).

Oral Promises: Evidence of oral promises or agreements made prior to or contemporaneously with the execution of a written contract purporting to embrace all its terms, which contradict, change, add to, or subtract from the express terms, is inadmissible. Riddell v. Peck-Williamson Heating & Ventilating Co., 27 M 44, 69 P 241 (1902). See State ex rel. W. Accident & Indem. Co. v. District Court, 55 M 330, 176 P 613 (1918).

CONTRACTS REQUIRED TO BE IN WRITING

Goodwill as Intangible Asset of Business: A contract for sale of a radio station that transferred "all fixed and other assets tangible and intangible" was presumed to include goodwill though goodwill was not specifically mentioned in the contract. Goodwill is considered an intangible asset of a business. W. Media, Inc. v. Merrick, 224 M 28, 727 P2d 547, 43 St. Rep. 1991 (1986), citing Baldwin v. Stuber, 182 M 501, 597 P2d 1135 (1979).

Variation of Terms of Written Contract Held Improper — Evidentiary Rule as Procedural Rule Only: In an action to collect the amount due under a promissory note, the District Court erred in allowing the plaintiff to prove that the terms of a written contract concerning only the terms of sale of a bar also applied to a previous sale of another business. Rule 106, Montana Rules of Evidence, relied on by the District Court to vary the clear terms of the parties' written agreement, is a procedural rule concerning the introduction of only a portion of a whole agreement and cannot be used to affect the substance of the existing law of parol evidence. Spraggins v. Elvidge, 192 M 8, 625 P2d 1151, 38 St. Rep. 493 (1981).

Sale of a Business — Automatic Passing of Goodwill: Seller operated a barber shop in leased premises. He agreed to sell the shop to the defendant. The selling agreement referred to the permanent fixtures and furniture, the shop name, and the phone number. The agreement did not mention goodwill. A dispute arose when the buyer refused to pay the seller. In response the seller removed all his fixtures, disconnected the phone, and brought suit. The court held that even though the buyer received none of the items referred to in the contract, he received goodwill and was therefore liable for the reasonable value of the goodwill. The rule is that if goodwill is not expressly reserved or excepted, it passes automatically to the purchaser of a business. Baldwin v. Stuber, 182 M 501, 597 P2d 1135 (1979).

Lease of State Lands: The Statute of Frauds barred testimony of an alleged oral agreement to sell or assign a state lease when written lease agreements provided specifically for a sublease. Montana law is clear that evidence of oral representations, relating directly to the subject matter of a contract, are not admissible to add to or alter the provisions of a written contract. Furthermore, the alleged oral agreement involved an agreement to transfer an interest in real property and thus is required to be in writing. Aye v. Fix, 176 M 474, 580 P2d 97 (1978).

Completeness of Instrument: Where the evidence showed that a written buy-sell agreement contained all the oral agreements of the parties, that the seller's agent prepared the agreement, and that it was certain in all essential matters, the agreement was specifically enforceable. Maxted v. Stenberg, 166 M 460, 534 P2d 864 (1975).

Two or More Instruments: If a release or quitclaim deed containing a statement of consideration as $1 and other considerations was the only instrument involved, oral testimony could be admissible to explain the "other considerations", but where the quitclaim deed was signed the same time as a property settlement agreement and the two instruments were part of the same transaction, oral evidence was inadmissible to show a different consideration. Warner v. Johns, 122 M 283, 201 P2d 986 (1949).

Fraud: Where plaintiff alleged mistake and fraud and the evidence disclosed that the inducement held out to plaintiff to sign an agreement was based on fraudulent representations of defendants that a lease need not be mentioned in a contract of sale of a business and the lease, the evidence was admissible to show the purchase of the lease and defendants' fraudulent conduct, over objection that it varied the contract. Sathre v. Rolfe, 31 M 85, 77 P 431 (1904).

Contemporaneous Agreement: Evidence of a contemporaneous agreement between the parties to a written sublease of a lode mining claim, that in case the sublessors should buy the property the lease would be extended, is inadmissible. Armington v. Stelle, 27 M 13, 69 P 115 (1902). See Kelly v. Ellis, 39 M 597, 104 P 873 (1909).

MISCELLANEOUS

Sufficient Evidence of Written Fixed Price Contract and Subsequent Binding Oral Agreements for Additional Construction Work: Defendant contracted in writing to perform concrete work at plaintiff's construction project, and the parties also orally agreed that additional concrete work would be done. A dispute arose concerning the existence of the contracts, the amount owed to defendant, and whether plaintiff had waived deficiencies in the work. The Supreme Court affirmed the existence of a written fixed price contract for the initial work and subsequent binding oral agreements for additional work. Defendant's completion of the work entitled him to the full amount called for in the written contract less an amount granted to plaintiff for repair of deficiencies in the work. As for the oral agreements, defendant's billing was the correct amount due for the additional services provided. The trial court also correctly apportioned the amount due to plaintiff for correcting deficiencies in the work, given that plaintiff waived or caused many of the deficiencies by accepting the work, making improper additions to the work, and issuing hasty and ill-conceived commands. Weimar v. Lyons, 2007 MT 182, 338 M 242, 164 P3d 922 (2007).

Court Finds Series of Executed Contracts — Not Subsequent Modifications: The Supreme Court, in dicta, held that a series of agreements, both oral and written, entered into by the parties were separate, fully performed contracts and not subsequent modifications of the original agreement. C. Haydon Ltd. v. Mont. Min. Properties, Inc., 286 M 138, 951 P2d 46, 54 St. Rep. 1341 (1997).

Agreement to Modify: In cattle-raising venture oral agreement between partnership and defendant that subsequent written contract would be modified when experience showed that each would profit by the change did not alter the terms of the written agreement under the rule of construction of this section. Heckman & Shell v. Wilson, 158 M 47, 487 P2d 1141 (1971).

Separate and Distinct Agreement: Testimony of a separate and distinct oral agreement can be received only when it does not conflict with or contradict or add to what is contained in the written contract. Warner v. Johns, 122 M 283, 201 P2d 986 (1949).

What Constitutes Oral Collateral Agreement Within Exception to Rule: An oral agreement, to be collateral within the meaning of the exception to the parol testimony rule (this section and 28-2-905) and as such admissible in evidence as against the objection that it varies a written instrument, must relate to a subject distinct from that to which the writing applies; the writing must remain intact after the reception of the parol testimony. Cont. Oil Co. v. Bell, 94 M 123, 21 P2d 65 (1933).

Obligations Assumed: Where a party seeks to recover on a written contract of sale, resort must be had to it alone, under this section, in determining the obligations assumed by defendant in attaching his name to it. Lewis v. Aronow, 77 M 348, 251 P 146 (1926).

Railroad Passenger Ticket: Plaintiff, having been compelled to purchase a passenger ticket to enable him to ride on freight train with his horse, was entitled to the benefit of such contract and could not be limited to the conditions of the shipping contract as to the amount of damages recoverable or as to the time within which his claim for damages for personal injuries was required to be presented under it. Jepsen v. Gallatin Valley Ry., 59 M 125, 195 P 550 (1921).

Termination of Payments in Lieu of Participation in Group Health Plan for Nonunion County Employee: The Board of County Commissioners may terminate payments in lieu of participation in a group health plan for a nonunion county employee only if termination is consistent with the county's employment agreement with the employee. 51 A.G. Op. 11 (2005).

WRITING PRESUMED TO CONTAIN ALL TERMS

Claims of Oral Misrepresentations Precluded by Terms of Written Contract — Applicability of Parol Evidence Rule: An agreement for the sale of a trailer park contained multiple written terms, including plaintiff's agreement that he had not relied on any assurances as to the condition of the property. In a subsequent disagreement over the condition of the trailer park water system, plaintiff sought to introduce evidence of oral statements made by the seller that the water system was in good or fine condition and that plaintiff had relied on the statements to his detriment. The District Court properly applied the parol evidence rule to exclude the evidence. Plaintiff could not claim that, pursuant to the written contract, he had not relied on any assurances and then claim that he was misled by oral statements contradictory to the contract. Deschamps v. Treasure St. Trailer Ct., Ltd., 2010 MT 74, 356 Mont. 1, 230 P.3d 800, distinguishing Jenkins v. Hillard, 199 Mont. 1, 647 P.2d 354.

No Ambiguity in Complete, Final Sales Agreement — Parol Evidence Inadmissible: The parties entered a sale agreement for a ready-mix concrete plant. Plaintiff subsequently filed an action alleging that defendant violated the agreement by breaching the covenant to not compete and the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which constituted malice resulting in lost profits, sales, and goodwill. The District Court granted summary judgment to defendant and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly concluded that the sales agreement constituted a complete, final agreement and unambiguously did not include a noncompetition provision, but in fact provided that plaintiff would sell concrete to defendant for use in the area. The intention of the parties was ascertainable from the writing alone, and the agreement was presumed to represent all transactions regarding elements extrinsic to the agreement and was thus considered complete and final, so parol evidence was inadmissible. Richards v. JTL Group, Inc., 2009 MT 173, 350 M 516, 212 P3d 264 (2009). See also Lindey's, Inc. v. Professional Consultants, Inc., 244 M 238, 797 P2d 920 (1990), and Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest States, Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Clear and Unambiguous Easement Language — Contract Principles Applied to Interpretation of Easement: After an initial conveyance of property, Tract A-1 was burdened by three easements: (1) an existing driveway; (2) an alternative drainfield easement; and (3) a trapezoid-shaped parcel called the trapezoid easement, which was designated as an easement for access to a seepage pit and alternative drainfield for an adjoining tract entitled "Tract 1". Following the subdivision of Tract 1 into Tract 1-A and Tract 1-B, the Linfords conveyed Tract 1-B to the Bings, but still continued to possess Tract 1-A and continued to benefit from the access easement. When Tract 1-A was later conveyed to the Bings, they acquired the same right to use easements appurtenant to the dominant estate that the Linfords previously enjoyed. A dispute then arose with the Mularonis, the owners of Tract 1-A, who contested the validity of the trapezoid easement, arguing that when the Bings took title to Tract A-1 from the Linfords, a merger of titles occurred that extinguished the easements. The District Court impliedly rejected the merger argument by holding that the easement burdening Tract A-1 benefited both Tract 1-A and Tract 1-B, and the Supreme Court concurred. In order to extinguish an easement by merger, there must be unity of title or ownership, coextensive in validity, quality, and all other circumstances of right. The language describing the trapezoid easement as an easement for access was clear and unambiguous and created a general access easement. Applying principles of contract interpretation to the transfer of property, the Supreme Court held that the incorporation of the certificate of survey into the deeds conveying the tracts to the Bings clearly and effectively described the easements in question and that the District Court did not err in finding that the Bings were entitled to general access across the trapezoid easement. Mularoni v. Bing, 2001 MT 215, 306 M 405, 34 P3d 497 (2001).

Bridle Path Easement — Express Easement by Reservation Versus Implied Easement — Extrinsic Evidence Regarding Parties' Intent Inadmissible: Purchasers in a subdivision had language in their deeds creating an express easement for a bridle path in the subdivision. The bridle path was never built, and over the years, the easement was obstructed by improvements on the lots of several subdivision residents. Eventually, the subdivision association attempted to extinguish the easement at a meeting of the board of directors. Some residents asked the District Court to establish the validity of the easement and to restrain obstruction of the easement, and their request was granted by partial summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted the difference between an implied easement, which is a creature of equity dependent on the intent of the parties, and an express easement by reservation, which is a creature of the documents of conveyance and the record. An express easement by reservation arises when the purchaser's deed refers to the plat where the easement is clearly depicted and labeled. In this case, the intent of the parties to create a bridle path easement was manifested through the language in the deeds and the plat, so under this section, extrinsic evidence regarding the intent of the parties was inadmissible. Further, the subdivision association was given oversight of the easement, but not ownership of it, and so lacked authority to extinguish the easement. The lower court's finding that a valid bridle path easement existed was affirmed. Pearson v. Virginia City Ranches Ass'n, 2000 MT 12, 298 M 52, 993 P2d 688, 57 St. Rep. 65 (2000), following Missoula v. Mix, 123 M 365, 214 P2d 212 (1950), Bache v. Owens, 267 M 279, 883 P2d 817 (1994), Halverson v. Turner, 268 M 168, 885 P2d 1285 (1994), and Tungsten Holdings, Inc. v. Parker, 282 M 387, 938 P2d 641, 54 St. Rep. 399 (1997), and distinguishing White v. Landerdahl, 191 M 554, 625 P2d 1145, 38 St. Rep. 412 (1981).

Goodwill as Intangible Asset of Business: A contract for sale of a radio station that transferred "all fixed and other assets tangible and intangible" was presumed to include goodwill though goodwill was not specifically mentioned in the contract. Goodwill is considered an intangible asset of a business. W. Media, Inc. v. Merrick, 224 M 28, 727 P2d 547, 43 St. Rep. 1991 (1986), citing Baldwin v. Stuber, 182 M 501, 597 P2d 1135 (1979).

Merger of Prior Agreement Into Deed — No Presumption of Surrender of Covenants: Appellants contended that since there was no express language in deeds recorded in 1972 that the parties intended to merge the restrictive provisions of a 1971 agreement into the deeds, the commercial use restrictions in the 1971 agreement still applied, regardless of being left out of the deeds. The Supreme Court, recalling its decision in Story v. Montforton, 112 M 24, 113 P2d 507 (1941), noted that "whether or not there has been a merger depends on the intention of the parties". The court applied this principle in Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965), quoting Reid v. Sykes, 27 Ohio St. 285: "... evidence of that intention may exist in or out of the deed. There is no presumption that a party, in giving or accepting a deed, intends to give up the covenants of which the deed is not a performance or satisfaction." In the present case, the court found strong evidence that the deeds contained all of the restrictions on the lands that were intended by the parties and that the contract had merged in the deeds. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Retail Installment Sale — Evidence Supporting — Allowable Interest: Defendant failed to make payment for materials supplied by plaintiff. The invoices of purchase stated that an interest rate of 1.5% a month would be levied on past due accounts. Plaintiff filed a mechanics' lien (now construction lien) representing the amount due and the service charge of 1.5% a month. Plaintiff sued to foreclose the lien. Defendant filed a confession of judgment for the full amount of purchase, plus interest at a legal rate. Plaintiff rejected the confession of judgment. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff for the amount of purchase, plus interest at a rate of 10% a year. Plaintiff appealed, seeking interest at the 1.5% a month rate. The Supreme Court held that the invoices, two of which were signed by both parties, describing the material purchased and stating the amount, including the interest rate to be charged, were sufficient to obligate defendant to pay the 1.5% charge on the unpaid balance. Although the invoices did not meet all the requirements of a retail installment contract, defendant's admission as to their authenticity and confession of judgment more than adequately evidenced that the purchases were retail installment sales. O'Neil Lumber Co. v. Nickelodeon Co., 190 M 25, 617 P2d 1291, 37 St. Rep. 1731 (1980).

Sale of a Business — Automatic Passing of Goodwill: Seller operated a barber shop in leased premises. He agreed to sell the shop to the defendant. The selling agreement referred to the permanent fixtures and furniture, the shop name, and the phone number. The agreement did not mention goodwill. A dispute arose when the buyer refused to pay the seller. In response the seller removed all his fixtures, disconnected the phone, and brought suit. The Court held that even though the buyer received none of the items referred to in the contract, he received goodwill and was therefore liable for the reasonable value of the goodwill. The rule is that if goodwill is not expressly reserved or excepted, it passes automatically to the purchaser of a business. Baldwin v. Stuber, 182 M 501, 597 P2d 1135 (1979).

Lease of State Lands: The Statute of Frauds barred testimony of an alleged oral agreement to sell or assign a state lease when written lease agreements provided specifically for a sublease. Montana law is clear that evidence of oral representations, relating directly to the subject matter of a contract, are not admissible to add to or alter the provisions of a written contract. Furthermore, the alleged oral agreement involved an agreement to transfer an interest in real property and thus is required to be in writing. Aye v. Fix, 176 M 474, 580 P2d 97 (1978).

Written Contract Controlling: Statements made by various agency personnel in regard to continued use of defendant's office building were not admissible under parol evidence rule to alter or contradict terms of express written contract since such statements and assurances did not come within any recognized exception to rule and since defendant admitted that he knew written contract would be controlling. U.S. v. Willard E. Fraser Co., 308 F. Supp. 557 (D.C. Mont. 1970), affirmed U.S. v. Willard E. Fraser Co., 459 F2d 483 (9th Cir. 1972).

Joint Venture Agreement: Trial court could have excluded evidence relating to an agreement for a joint venture, none of which was in writing, as being designed to alter or vary the terms of a note made by one joint venturer and held by the other. Barrett v. Morton, 137 M 190, 351 P2d 601 (1960).

Escrow Agreement: Where escrow agreement in connection with sale of land required $700 to be paid by a certain date, oral evidence could not be received to show that there had been an extension of time. Herman v. Herman, 123 M 39, 207 P2d 1155 (1949), distinguished in Dalakow v. Geery, 132 M 457, 318 P2d 253 (1957).

Correspondence Constituting Contract: An instruction in an action for breach of contract based largely upon correspondence between the parties that all papers or other instruments made by the parties at the same time and relating to the same subject matter should be considered by the jury as constituting one contract, if the preponderance of the evidence so showed, was proper. W. J. Lake & Co. v. Mont. Horse Prod. Co., 109 M 434, 97 P2d 590 (1939).

Corroborative Evidence: Where a contract whereunder the buyer was to receive one-half the freight refunds was established by a properly admitted copy of one of a number of letters, the fact that copies of the others may have been improperly admitted would not require a reversal of the judgment for plaintiff, where they were only corroborative, in the absence of substantial evidence refuting existence of the contract. W. J. Lake & Co. v. Mont. Horse Prod. Co., 109 M 434, 97 P2d 590 (1939).

Completeness of Writing: In determining whether parol testimony varied a written contract a satisfactory test is: Was the matter testified to mentioned, covered, or dealt with in the writing? If it was, then presumably, the writing was meant to represent the entire transaction, and the testimony was inadmissible. Cont. Oil Co. v. Bell, 94 M 123, 21 P2d 65 (1933).

Waiver of Rule by Introduction of Evidence: Where one party to an action on a written contract is permitted to introduce evidence of preceding oral negotiations leading up to the making of the writing, thus varying its terms, his opponent may properly give oral testimony as to the same matter, over an objection that the testimony offered tends to contradict the writing. Peterson v. Nelson, 77 M 539, 252 P 368 (1926).

Conveyance of Land: All oral negotiations relative to the covenant of seizin on a sale of land were superseded by the deed and a contemporaneous writing executed with relation thereto. Morehouse v. N. Land Co., 68 M 96, 216 P 792 (1923).

Prior Agreements Superseded:

Under this section and 28-2-904, when a contract has been reduced to writing its contents cannot be added to, contradicted, altered, or varied by parol or extrinsic evidence, and the writing supersedes all oral negotiations concerning its matter which preceded, accompanied, or led up to its execution. Webber v. Killorn, 66 M 130, 212 P 852 (1923).

Testimony concerning an alleged oral agreement between vendor and vendee that the latter bought the land subject to the right of possession of a tenant, in contravention of the recital in the deed, was inadmissible under the rule that execution and delivery of the deed supersede all former oral agreements. Adams v. Durfee, 67 M 315, 215 P 664 (1923).

Parol testimony to show the understanding of the parties that no interest was to be paid on a promissory note which provided for the payment of interest but did not specify the rate was properly excluded. Burnett v. Burnett, 68 M 546, 219 P 831 (1923).

A written agreement must be considered as containing all prior oral ones concerning its subject matter and its terms may therefore not be varied by oral testimony. Leigland v. Rundle Land & Abstract Co., 64 M 154, 208 P 1075 (1922).

Negotiations Prior to Contract:

In an action for damages for breach of a clause of a written contract of sale of a threshing machine warranting it as being well made of good material and that with proper use and management it would do as good work as any other machine of the same size manufactured for the like purpose, evidence of statements made by defendant's agent in making the sale that it would thresh and clean alfalfa as well as any other machine of the same size, etc., was properly rejected as an attempt to vary the terms of the written instruments by parol. Rowe v. Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co., 61 M 73, 201 P 316 (1921).

Prior oral negotiations and directions as to points at which livestock should be stopped for resting and feeding were merged in the contract of shipment, where it and the waybills bore notations stating the points at which stops were to be made, and therefore parol testimony of directions to make other stops was incompetent as an attempt to vary the terms of the written contract. Cook v. N. Pac. Ry., 61 M 573, 203 P 512 (1921).

A written contract supersedes any oral negotiations theretofore had relative to the subject matter of it, and must be considered as containing all of its terms agreed upon at the time it was executed. Arnold v. Fraser, 43 M 540, 117 P 1064 (1911).

Clear Language: Where in an action on a written contract, there was not any issue of fraud or mistake in the execution of it, or any imperfection in the writing, but the provisions of such instrument were plain and unambiguous, parol evidence, the tendency of which was to vary the terms thereof, was properly excluded. W. Loan & Sav. Co. v. Smith, 42 M 442, 113 P 475 (1911). See also Beebe v. Bd. of Directors of the Bridger Creek Subdivision Community Ass'n, 2015 MT 183, 379 Mont. 484, 352 P.3d 1094, holding that failure to identify ambiguity in an association's bylaws excluded consideration of extrinsic evidence.

Common-Law Rule: This section merely declares the common-law rule. Riddell v. Peck-Williamson Heating & Ventilating Co., 27 M 44, 69 P 241 (1902); Gaffney Mercantile Co. v. Hopkins, 21 M 13, 52 P 561 (1898).

CONTEMPORANEOUS ORAL AGREEMENTS

Sufficient Evidence of Written Fixed Price Contract and Subsequent Binding Oral Agreements for Additional Construction Work: Defendant contracted in writing to perform concrete work at plaintiff's construction project, and the parties also orally agreed that additional concrete work would be done. A dispute arose concerning the existence of the contracts, the amount owed to defendant, and whether plaintiff had waived deficiencies in the work. The Supreme Court affirmed the existence of a written fixed price contract for the initial work and subsequent binding oral agreements for additional work. Defendant's completion of the work entitled him to the full amount called for in the written contract less an amount granted to plaintiff for repair of deficiencies in the work. As for the oral agreements, defendant's billing was the correct amount due for the additional services provided. The trial court also correctly apportioned the amount due to plaintiff for correcting deficiencies in the work, given that plaintiff waived or caused many of the deficiencies by accepting the work, making improper additions to the work, and issuing hasty and ill-conceived commands. Weimar v. Lyons, 2007 MT 182, 338 M 242, 164 P3d 922 (2007).

Refusal to Enforce Unsubstantiated Oral Agreement to Dismiss Claim for Prescriptive Easement — Parol Evidence Rule and Statute of Frauds Inapplicable: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to estop plaintiff from asserting claims for a prescriptive easement across defendant's property because an agent of plaintiff orally agreed to dismiss the claims and defendant relied on the promise to defendant's detriment. The District Court held that the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds prohibited admission of evidence of an oral agreement to dismiss the case because there were written temporary access agreements in place and that defendant did not offer sufficient evidence to meet either a fraud or estoppel exception to the parol evidence rule. The Supreme Court found that the trial court reached the correct result, albeit for the wrongs reasons, by automatically applying the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds without determining whether either rule applied. Actually neither rule barred admission of the evidence in this case, so the trial court was free to consider the merits of the existence of an oral contract without defendant having to prove the elements of fraud or detrimental reliance. Nevertheless, the trial court found defendant's story of an oral agreement to be unsubstantiated and correctly refused to enforce an oral agreement based on the facts before it. Brimstone Min., Inc. v. Glaus, 2003 MT 236, 317 M 236, 77 P3d 175 (2003).

Defaulting Buyer Under Unambiguous Written Contract Cannot Rely Upon Expectations Not Covered by Contract to Avoid Contract — Disposition of Downpayment Amounts Paid and Due — County Not Liable for Negligent Misrepresentation as to Recordability of Deeds and Seller's Title Insurer Not Liable for Loss in Marketability: Documents for the sale and purchase of two sections of land unambiguously showed, and it was undisputed, that the resale of 20-acre parcels by the buyer, the immediate acceptance by the county of 20-acre resale deeds of a type that would make subdivision review unnecessary, and the ability to resell without having to undergo subdivision review were not parts of the bargain. The parties knew that these things were contemplated, but the documents did not refer to them or make them a part of the contract. Before the contract was made, the county indicated that it would accept the 20-acre resale deeds. The deal fell through when the county changed its position after the contract was signed. The buyer failed to pay the whole downpayment, and the seller terminated the contract and kept the paid portion of the downpayment. Precontract discussions on the matter must be disregarded as parol evidence because the documents were unambiguous and did not refer to the matter. The buyer was not entitled to rescind the contract and have the paid portion of the downpayment returned based on mutual mistake or failure of consideration. There was no mutual mistake because the parties knew that it was not a certainty that the county would accept the deeds. There was no failure of consideration because the resale, county acceptance of the deeds, and avoidance of subdivision review were not part of the written contract. In addition, the need for a subdivision review would not make the land unmarketable; at most, its market value decreased and it would take longer to sell it. Furthermore, a party in default is not entitled to rescission. The seller was entitled to terminate the contract. The seller was also entitled to keep an amount of the paid portion of the downpayment equal to the amount by which the contract price for the land exceeded the market value of the land at the time of the breach. The seller was not entitled to keep the remainder of the paid portion of the downpayment or to a judgment for the unpaid portion of the downpayment because the contract did not provide for that remedy. The county was not liable in tort to the seller for negligent misrepresentation, and the buyer's title insurance company was not liable to the seller for the loss in the marketability of the land caused by the need for subdivision review. Yellowstone II Dev. Group, Inc. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 2001 MT 41, 304 M 223, 20 P3d 755 (2001), overruled in Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), to the extent that Yellowstone II held that the determination of whether a term in a contract is ambiguous is not a question involving parol evidence.

Parol Evidence by Insureds Against Their Insurance Agent in Regard to Contract That Agent Was to Procure Between Insureds and Insurer: The parol evidence rule is applicable only between the parties to a written contract and parties who are privy to the contract and cannot be invoked either by or against a stranger to the contract. An insurance agency had an agent contract with the insureds to procure insurance for them but did not have an agency contract with the insurer and was not a party or privy to the contract between the insureds and the insurer. Therefore, in a breach of contract and negligence action by the insureds against the agency, the court properly allowed the insureds to introduce parol evidence of negotiations between the insureds and the agent and of the agent's oral representations. Furthermore, although the insureds and the insurer had a written contract, the insureds and the agency did not. Fillinger v. NW. Agency, Inc., of Great Falls, 283 M 71, 938 P2d 1347, 54 St. Rep. 500 (1997), distinguished in Habets v. Swanson, 2000 MT 367, 303 M 410, 16 P3d 1035, 57 St. Rep. 1567 (2000). See also Bailey v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 2013 MT 119, 370 Mont. 73, 300 P.3d 1149, in which the Supreme Court concluded that because the insureds placed the validity of the insurance application at issue by representing that they did not fill it out or understand its terms and that the application did not contain the coverage that they requested, evidence of the insureds' statements during the application process was not barred by the parol evidence rule.

Contract for Elk Sale — Telephone Conversations Occurring After Contract Admissible — Oral Agreement Extending Contract Cutoff Dates Inadmissible but Promise Enforced: Seller appealed a District Court judgment awarding buyer damages after seller breached contracts for the sale of elk. Seller entered into contracts agreeing to deliver elk before April 1 and May 1 and in subsequent telephone conversations promised to deliver elk after these contract cutoff dates. While the parol evidence rule bars prior or contemporaneous oral agreements, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court decision allowing testimony regarding telephone conversations that occurred after the written agreements. The buyer, to his detriment, entered into third-party contracts to resell the elk in reliance on the seller's promise that the elk would be available and delivered after the contract cutoff dates. The Supreme Court ruled that enforcing the oral agreement extending the cutoff dates of the contract avoided an injustice to the buyer. Trad Indus., Ltd. v. Brogan, 246 M 439, 805 P2d 54, 48 St. Rep. 51 (1991).

Contract Silent on Payment Procedure — Evidence of Supplemental Agreement Admissible: Defendant entered a lease agreement with Town Pump, Incorporated to operate a gas station. The monthly rental agreement was detailed in a written lease agreement. At trial, the District Court allowed employees of Town Pump to testify that Town Pump required defendant to make daily payment for all gasoline sold. Defendant objected to this testimony based on the parol evidence rule. Before a party to a contract can claim applicability of the parol evidence rule, there must be a showing that the written instrument is a complete and final document intended by the parties to contain all the terms of the contract. The lease agreement was silent on payment procedure and even contained a provision allowing the parties to mutually agree on payment terms and conditions. The parol evidence rule was inapplicable. St. v. Frederick, 208 M 112, 676 P2d 213, 41 St. Rep. 207 (1984). See also In re Estate of Stukey, 2004 MT 279, 323 M 241, 100 P3d 114 (2004).

Refund Agreement: In an action to recover the balance due under a contract of sale of gasoline to a dealer under a written contract fixing the price, parol testimony of defendant tending to prove an oral contract to refund a portion of the price was held inadmissible under the rule. Cont. Oil Co. v. Bell, 94 M 123, 21 P2d 65 (1933).

Collateral Agreement: An oral agreement, to be collateral within the meaning of the exception to the parol testimony rule, and as such admissible in evidence as against the objection that it varies a written instrument, must relate to a subject distinct from that to which the writing applies; the writing must remain intact after the reception of the parol testimony. Cont. Oil Co. v. Bell, 94 M 123, 21 P2d 65 (1933).

Time or Method of Payment: Parol evidence of an oral agreement, made contemporaneously with a promissory note which contains an absolute promise to pay at a specified time, is not admissible to extend the time of payment or to provide for payment in any other way than that so specified, or to make it depend upon condition. Hosch v. Howe, 92 M 405, 16 P2d 699 (1932).

Extension of Time: Where in an action by a building contractor to foreclose a mechanics' lien (now construction lien) defendant set up a counterclaim for damages for failure to complete the building within the time stipulated, but the contract provided that no additional time should be allowed unless request therefor was presented in writing to the architect, and plaintiff failed to make such request though the owner had directed alterations, he was precluded from asserting that before signing the contract defendant had orally agreed that the penalty therein provided for would not be enforced. Leigland v. Rundle Land & Abstract Co., 64 M 154, 208 P 1075 (1922).

Execution Before Contract: The mere execution of a bill of sale by the seller does not exclude proof of a parol agreement for the sale of an animal offered by the buyer, the terms of which had been agreed upon and the purchase price paid before the execution of the bill. Sutherland v. Green, 49 M 379, 142 P 636 (1914).

Usage and Custom: Evidence that at the time a written contract was made an oral contract was entered into that payments should be made in conformity with a usage and custom, as the work was done and materials furnished, was not admissible. Riddell v. Peck-Williamson Heating & Ventilating Co., 27 M 44, 69 P 241 (1902).

Mining Claim: Testimony by lessees that they would not have signed the lease of a lode mining claim but for an understanding that the time would be extended was not admissible to show a contemporaneous agreement to extend. Evidence of a contemporaneous agreement between the parties to a written sublease of said claim that in case the sublessors should buy the property the lease would be extended was inadmissible. Armington v. Stelle, 27 M 13, 69 P 115 (1902), distinguished in Orem v. Hansen Packing Co., 91 M 222, 7 P2d 546 (1932). See also Kelly v. Ellis, 39 M 597, 104 P 873 (1909), distinguished in Orem v. Hansen Packing Co., 91 M 222, 7 P2d 546 (1932).

Construction of Terms: Where it was alleged that at the time of the execution of a written agreement it was agreed that a particular construction should be given to the terms of the writing, to the effect that it meant that the collateral security should be exhausted before an action was commenced on the notes, such contemporaneous construction was within the purview of this section. Fisher v. Briscoe, 10 M 124, 25 P 30 (1890). See also Bohn Mfg. Co. v. Harrison, 13 M 293, 34 P 313 (1893).

Principal to Be Paid First: Evidence of a parol agreement, at the time of the making of a promissory note, that in case the same was not paid at maturity, subsequent payments might be applied upon the principal first and the interest afterward, is improper. Anderson v. Perkins, 10 M 154, 25 P 92 (1890). See also Gaffney Mercantile Co. v. Hopkins, 21 M 13, 52 P 561 (1898); York v. Steward, 21 M 515, 55 P 29 (1898).

MISTAKE OR IMPERFECTION OF WRITING

Extrinsic Evidence Permissible Based on Parties' Intent — Intent Defeated by Mistakes in Vital Facts: The District Court did not err by considering extrinsic evidence to interpret and reform the parties' contract. Generally, when the terms of an agreement are reduced to writing by the parties, the writing is considered as containing all those terms and there can be no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing. However, an exception to this rule permits extrinsic evidence to be admitted when a mistake or other imperfection of the writing is put at issue. The District Court correctly concluded that the recorded agreement did not reflect the parties' intent. The mistakes in the agreement constituted "vital facts" that defeated the parties' contractual intentions. It was therefore appropriate for the District Court to consider extrinsic evidence and to reform the contract to reflect the parties' true intent. In re Platt, 2018 MT 43, 390 Mont. 338, 413 P.3d 818.

Reformation of Insurance Policy Not Permitted — Clear and Explicit Language Used — Lack of Due Diligence in Discovering Error Not Justifying Reformation: An insurer attempted to reform an insurance policy on the ground that the policy should not cover property near a structure that was specifically exempted from the policy. However, the policy specifically included property within 1,000 feet of other insured property, including property around the exempted structure. The District Court applied 33-15-302 and determined that it was prohibited from reforming insurance policies. On appeal, the Supreme Court also declined to reform the contract, as the language was clear and explicit, due diligence would have uncovered the error, and the insurer failed to establish that its insurance policy expressed something other than what the parties mutually intended. Lincoln County Port Authority v. Allianz Global Risks US Ins. Co., 2013 MT 365, 373 Mont. 60, 315 P.3d 934.

Extrinsic Evidence Properly Admitted to Prove Original Contract Intent — Reformation of Warranty Deed Based on Mutual Mistake Proper: Extrinsic evidence provided by plaintiffs to prove the parties' original intent in entering a buy-sell agreement proved that, by virtue of a mutual mistake, the deed did not contain agreed-upon restrictions. The evidence was squarely within the exception to the parol evidence rule, and the District Court did not err in admitting the parol evidence or in reforming the deed to include the restrictions and enforcing the restrictions against defendants. Thibodeau v. Bechtold, 2008 MT 412, 347 M 277, 198 P3d 785 (2008), following Interstate Prod. Credit Ass'n v. DeSaye, 250 M 320, 820 P2d 1285 (1991).

Parol Evidence on Month and Day of Contract Admissible Where Parties Themselves Presented Parol Evidence on Year of Contract: Buyer failed to pay entire purchase price for irrigation system, and seller sued. Since buyer counterclaimed for crop losses allegedly resulting from seller's failure to install system within a reasonable time of contract, the exact date of the contract was an issue at trial. Seller submitted a copy of the contract dated May 20, 1976. Both parties agreed that the year was incorrect, as the transaction had actually taken place in 1977. However, the buyer claimed that the contract had been made in April, not May, and the District Court permitted him to present evidence in support of this. Seller appealed, claiming it was improper to allow the admission of parol evidence in contradiction of the terms of the contract. The Supreme Court held that since parol evidence had been allowed on the year of the contract, it was allowable for the month and day also. Ag Sales v. Klose, 199 M 400, 649 P2d 447, 39 St. Rep. 1482 (1982).

Businessman Neglecting to Read Contract — Not a Mistake: A real estate developer who failed to exercise the care and prudence of a reasonable and cautious businessman by neglecting or failing to read contracts for deeds that he signed may not rely upon this section to allow admission of oral testimony because 28-2-904, concerning the written instrument superseding negotiations, is to be given the greater weight when the proffered evidence, as here, is insufficient to establish mistake. Silva v. McGuinness, 189 M 252, 615 P2d 879, 37 St. Rep. 1401 (1980).

Clear Language: Parol testimony was not admissible to extend the term of a permissive easement beyond the expiration date set in a written agreement that clearly contained no mistake, imperfection, or ambiguity. Larson v. Burnett, 158 M 421, 492 P2d 921 (1972).

Pleadings Varying Terms of Agreement: In action by sellers of hotel business, including personal property, against buyers for balance due on contract, answer setting up affirmative defenses which pleaded mistake and invalidity based on representations and warranties of seller concerning the leasing of the premises on which the buyers relied was sufficiently clear to comply with this section as against motion to strike on the ground that the allegations tended to vary the terms of a written contract. Swecker v. Badura, 141 M 329, 377 P2d 752 (1963).

Misunderstanding of Conversations: Where a land contract required of the vendor the execution of a deed without reservations and the deed deposited in escrow excepted from its operation the timber growing thereon, parol evidence to the effect that the witness understood from conversations with the vendee that the latter was buying the land without the timber was inadmissible under this section. Hollensteiner v. Anderson, 78 M 122, 252 P 796 (1927).

Manner of Payment: Where the signers of a promissory note unqualifiedly bound themselves to pay a certain sum of money at a specified time, parol evidence was inadmissible for the purpose of showing that the payee in an oral contemporaneous stipulation had agreed that payment could be made in a certain manner; such oral agreement was superseded by the writing, and the evidence erroneously admitted tended to vary and contradict the writing, contrary to the provisions of this section, where the validity of the note was not attacked and a mistake or imperfection in the writing was not pleaded. Swan v. LeClair, 77 M 422, 251 P 155 (1926).

Endorsement on Instrument: In an action on a promissory note which had never been previously negotiated and was overdue when plaintiff acquired it by assignment, so that he was not a holder in due course, parol evidence was admissible to show that defendants with plaintiff's knowledge had endorsed the note with the understanding that each was doing so as representative of an association and not in his personal capacity. Anderson v. Border, 75 M 516, 244 P 494 (1926), distinguished in Swan v. LeClair, 77 M 422, 251 P 155 (1926).

Guaranty Agreement: An offer of proof by defendant directors, who had guaranteed payment of an account as represented by a note of the corporation, that it was their understanding that the guaranty was to be deemed merely an assurance on their part that plaintiff's account was recognized as a valid claim against the company was properly rejected under this section as contradicting the terms of the writing. Schauer v. Morgan, 67 M 455, 216 P 347 (1923).

Stranger as Party to Action: The rule that parol evidence cannot be introduced to vary, enlarge, or contradict its terms, except where a mistake or imperfection therein is put in issue by the pleadings, or when the validity of the contract is the fact in dispute, does not apply in a controversy between a party to the contract and a stranger; as against such stranger, a party may assert that the agreement was other or different in any respect from that which the writing expresses. Read v. Lewis & Clark County, 55 M 412, 178 P 177 (1919), distinguished in Habets v. Swanson, 2000 MT 367, 303 M 410, 16 P3d 1035, 57 St. Rep. 1567 (2000).

Purpose of Contract: Where a contract supplemental to one made for the sale of lands recited that it was made for the purpose of granting the buyer additional time in which to make payment, it precluded the idea that it was made for any other purpose, and in the absence of allegation of mistake or other imperfection, the presumption is conclusive that the writing contained all the engagements then made by the parties. Crawford v. Pierse, 56 M 371, 185 P 315 (1919).

Bill of Sale: Parol evidence that parties did not intend to include buildings described in a bill of sale was inadmissible. Hogan v. Kelly, 29 M 485, 75 P 81 (1904).

VALIDITY OF AGREEMENT DISPUTED

No Improper Reliance on Extrinsic Evidence in Finding of Valid and Enforceable Express 60-Foot Easement for Subdivision: Defendant acquired certain property after an express easement across the property was created by the former owner. Defendant refused to allow the building of an access road across the property, contending that the easement agreement was invalid on several grounds. The District Court examined the agreement and concluded that the easement was valid and enforceable and granted summary judgment for plaintiffs. On appeal, defendant asserted that the District Court erroneously relied on facts outside the agreement, making summary judgment inappropriate, but the Supreme Court affirmed. For purposes of interpreting a writing granting an interest in real property, evidence of the surrounding circumstances, including the situation of the property and the context of the parties' agreement, may be shown so that the judge is placed in the position of those whose language the judge is to interpret. However, to comply with the statute of frauds and the recording system, the writing itself must ultimately stand on its own and meet the formal requirements for granting a property interest. In this case, the District Court was allowed to consider various facts not contained in the easement agreement for purposes of understanding the situation, but the court's analysis of the easement's validity apparently was limited to the face of the agreement, so the court did not erroneously rely on extrinsic facts. The easement agreement satisfied the formal requirements for expressly granting an easement and created a valid 60-foot emergency public access and utility easement that was enforceable against defendant. Additionally, the District Court properly concluded that because there was no dominant tenement, the easement was in gross and could be used by members of the public to travel between the subdivision and the public highway for emergency purposes and to provide utility services. There being no questions of material fact, summary judgment was proper. Broadwater Dev., LLC v. Nelson, 2009 MT 317, 352 M 401, 219 P3d 492 (2009), distinguishing Blazer v. Wall, 2008 MT 145, 343 M 173, 183 P3d 84 (2008). See also Kuhlman v. Rivera, 216 M 353, 701 P2d 982 (1985).

Promissory Note Not Considered Contract of Adhesion: Plaintiff read and signed a promissory note to secure a loan for a friend who subsequently went bankrupt. The promissory note provided that plaintiff waived the right to rely on the defense of impairment. Nevertheless, after defendant bank foreclosed on the property that plaintiff used to secure the loan, plaintiff claimed impairment, arguing that the waiver constituted a contract of adhesion that was unenforceable. The District Court disagreed, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court noted that a contract of adhesion is a contract whose terms are dictated by one party to another who has no voice in the contract's formulation and that the contract is unenforceable if it is not within the expectations of the weaker party or if the contract terms are unduly oppressive, unconscionable, or against public policy. Plaintiff was a sophisticated businessman who did not attempt to negotiate the contract terms and who studied the contract prior to signing and thus could not later claim that he was unaware of the waiver provision and that it was not within his reasonable expectations. Although the bank prepared the contract, the transaction was entered solely at plaintiff's behest, and plaintiff voluntarily waived the defense of collateral impairment under 30-3-607. Therefore, the Supreme Court concluded that the promissory note was not a contract of adhesion, nor were the contract's general provisions outside of plaintiff's reasonable expectations. The District Court was affirmed. Denton v. First Interstate Bank of Commerce, 2006 MT 193, 333 M 169, 142 P3d 797 (2006), following Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002).

Investment Agreement Containing Arbitration Clause Considered Contract of Adhesion — Remand for Consideration of Investor's Reasonable Expectations and Potential Contract Formation Defenses: Zigrang entered an investment agreement with defendant investment company. The agreement contained an arbitration provision. When Zigrang learned that defendant frequently traded securities in Zigrang's account without permission, Zigrang filed a complaint, which was one of 23 suits filed by investors alleging defendant's mismanagement of accounts. Defendant moved to compel arbitration pursuant to the agreement. A panel of three judges sat en banc to hear evidence common to all 23 cases. Defendant's motion to compel arbitration was denied, but the order contained common findings of fact that did not apply to Zigrang, including a mischaracterization of Zigrang's investment agreement. Defendant appealed. The Supreme Court noted that the agreement constituted a contract of adhesion that supported other contract formation defenses, but did not in itself constitute a sufficient basis for invalidating the agreement. The Supreme Court was unable to completely examine Zigrang's contract formation defenses, including unconscionability, waiver, and reasonable expectations, because the District Court's order relied on the mistaken finding of fact. Thus, the court remanded for further findings of fact related to Zigrang's investment agreement, noting that an inquiry into Zigrang's expectations should consist only of an analysis of Zigrang's objectively reasonable expectations regarding the agreement from Zigrang's perspective and that Zigrang's expectations might negate the arbitration provisions. Zigrang v. U.S. Bancorp Piper Jaffray, Inc., 2005 MT 282, 329 M 239, 123 P3d 237 (2005). See also Iwen v. U.S. W. Direct, 1999 MT 63, 293 M 512, 977 P2d 989 (1999), and Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002).

Predispute Arbitration Provisions Unenforceable — Motion to Compel Arbitration Properly Denied: Plaintiff opened several Piper Automatic Transfer Accounts and later brought an action alleging defendants' mismanagement of the accounts. Defendants sought to compel arbitration based on predispute arbitration clauses in the account agreements requiring that any dispute be resolved by arbitration. The motion to compel arbitration was denied, and defendants appealed. The Supreme Court held that because the agreements granted defendants' brokers the discretion to buy and sell securities, a fiduciary duty was created that defendants breached by failing to explain the consequences of the arbitration provision prior to formation of the contract. The predispute arbitration provisions were therefore unenforceable, and denial of the motion to compel arbitration was affirmed. Willems v. U.S. Bancorp Piper Jaffray, Inc., 2005 MT 37, 326 M 103, 107 P3d 465 (2005), following Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002). See also Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26 (1993).

Collective Bargaining Agreement Not Considered Contract of Adhesion: When plaintiff filed a wrongful discharge claim, defendant pointed out that the employment was covered by a union collective bargaining agreement (CBA) and that 39-2-912 precludes an employee covered by a CBA from seeking relief under the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act. At argument in District Court on defendant's motion for summary judgment, plaintiff argued that the CBA was a contract of adhesion. The District Court held that the CBA was not a contract of adhesion and granted summary judgment, and on appeal the Supreme Court agreed. A contract of adhesion is a contract with terms dictated by one contracting party to another party who has no voice in the contract's formulation, and such contracts are unenforceable if they are not within the reasonable expectations of the weaker party or if they are unduly oppressive, unconscionable, or against public policy. Because CBAs arise only after a public employer and a union representative have bargained collectively and in good faith, it cannot be said that one party dictates the terms of a CBA to another, so a CBA cannot be considered a contract of adhesion. The court noted that under Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002), a contract of adhesion may also be found in cases when an contract arbitration provision is presented on a standardized form without the opportunity for negotiation. Arbitration provisions are also negotiated in a CBA rather than dictated by standardized form, so Kloss did not apply. Summary judgment was affirmed. LaFournaise v. Mont. Developmental Center, 2003 MT 240, 317 M 283, 77 P3d 202 (2003).

Security Brokerage Contracts — Contract of Adhesion Rendering Arbitration Clause Unenforceable: Kloss opened a full-service brokerage account with defendant, which permitted Kloss to purchase securities and maintain a money market account and which included a living trust account. The account did well, and Kloss decided to set up a charitable trust with the bond proceeds. The initial account and the living trust agreement contained a mandatory arbitration clause, and the charitable trust incorporated the arbitration clause by reference. Kloss then had second thoughts about the charitable trust and petitioned to revoke it. Defendant moved to compel arbitration, and the District Court granted the motion, citing Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26 (1993), and Iwen v. U.S. W. Direct, 1999 MT 63, 293 M 512, 977 P2d 989 (1999), for the holding that defendant had no obligation to explain the terms of the contract because it was within Kloss's reasonable expectations and that even if the contract was considered a contract of adhesion, it was not unenforceable because it was not unconscionable. Kloss appealed, arguing that the arbitration clause was part of a contract of adhesion and that waiver of the constitutional right to jury trial should not be presumed from the signing of a contract of adhesion. Defendant maintained that form contracts prepared by securities brokers are not contracts of adhesion dictated by one party to another who has no voice in its formulation, and that arbitration clauses contained in the contracts are not unconscionable. The Supreme Court examined Passage v. Prudential-Bache Sec., Inc., 223 M 60, 727 P2d 1298 (1986), for an explanation of contracts of adhesion in the securities context and the circumstances under which they are unenforceable. The court distinguished both Chor and Passage, finding that the contracts in this case were clearly contracts of adhesion because they were standardized forms containing terms that Kloss had no opportunity to negotiate if wishing to invest with defendant. Further, the arbitration clause by which Kloss waived the right to access to state courts, the right to jury trial, the right to reasonable discovery, the right to findings of fact based on the evidence, and the right to enforce the law by way of appeal was clearly not within Kloss's reasonable expectations. The arbitration clause was never explained by defendant, and Kloss was not aware of the arbitration provision in the contract. Thus, the District Court committed reversible error when it concluded that the arbitration clause was enforceable. Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002), followed in Larsen v. W. St. Ins. Agency, Inc., 2007 MT 270, 339 M 407, 170 P3d 956 (2007), with regard to factors to be applied in determining a contract of adhesion.

Extrinsic Evidence on Testamentary Intent Raising Genuine Issue of Material Fact — Summary Judgment Improper: Kuralt gifted Shannon with 20 acres along the Big Hole River, disguising the transaction as a sale. Shortly before he died, he sent Shannon a letter, which constituted a holographic will, suggesting that he intended to do the same with another 90 acres. The District Court allowed introduction of the letter as extrinsic evidence regarding testamentary intent, then granted summary judgment to the estate after finding that the letter contemplated a separate testamentary instrument not yet in existence to accomplish the transfer of the Montana property. Nevertheless, the letter raised a fundamental disagreement as to a genuine material fact—namely, whether Kuralt intended that the letter effect a posthumous disposition of the property. Regardless of whether the court admitted the evidence because it considered the letter ambiguous or because it agreed with Shannon that extrinsic evidence may be discretionarily admitted in holographic will disputes, the court nevertheless improperly resolved contested issues by granting summary judgment. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case for trial. In re Estate of Kuralt, 1999 MT 111, 294 M 354, 981 P2d 771, 56 St. Rep. 460 (1999).

Arbitration Clause in Standardized Form Advertising Agreement — Lack of Mutuality of Obligation and Meaningful Choice Considered Unconscionable Contract of Adhesion: Iwen sued U.S. West Direct for damages for negligent construction of a yellow pages advertisement, infliction of emotional distress, and punitive damages. The District Court held that the parties were bound by the arbitration clause in the directory advertising order. The advertising order was a standardized form, the terms of which Iwen was unable to negotiate and for which Iwen's only choice was to accept or reject, constituting an agreement of adhesion. The arbitration provision lacked mutuality of obligation, was one-sided, and contained terms that were unreasonably favorable to U.S. West Direct, leaving Iwen, as the weaker bargaining party, no meaningful choice regarding acceptance of its provisions. Viewed from the perspective of consumer Iwen, the arbitration clause was held to be unconscionable, and the Supreme Court reversed, striking the arbitration clause, pursuant to 30-2-302, and remanding for further proceedings. Iwen v. U.S. W. Direct, 1999 MT 63, 293 M 512, 977 P2d 989, 56 St. Rep. 263 (1999), following Passage v. Prudential-Bache Sec., Inc., 223 M 60, 727 P2d 1298, 43 St. Rep. 1532 (1986), and Leibrand v. Nat'l Farmers Union Property & Cas. Co., 272 M 1, 898 P2d 1220, 52 St. Rep. 557 (1995), and distinguishing Snap-on Tools Corp. v. Vetter, 838 F. Supp. 468 (D.C. Mont. 1993). See also Global Client Solutions, LLC v. Ossello, 2016 MT 50, 382 Mont. 345, 367 P.3d 361.

Sufficient Evidence to Establish Contract for Line of Credit: The execution of a promissory note and the procurement by the bank of a contract of guarantee issued by the Farmers Home Administration (FmHA) pointed to and confirmed an agreement between plaintiffs and the bank for a line of credit, despite bank's contention that the contract of guarantee was between the bank and FmHA and created no obligation on bank's part to loan money to plaintiffs. Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988), distinguished in Shiplet v. First Sec. Bank of Livingston, Inc., 234 M 166, 762 P2d 242, 45 St. Rep. 1816 (1988).

Performance Combined With Terms — Valid Contract: An agreement for development of a mineral interest did not include every item that might have been included with respect to operational aspects; however, the parties performed under the agreement for 3 years. The Supreme Court cited Wilkerson v. School District, 216 M 203, 700 P2d 617, 42 St. Rep. 745 (1985), in holding that a contract is not invalid simply because it does not contain all the provisions or conditions the parties might have incorporated into it. Therefore, performance under the agreement, combined with the actual terms provided, demonstrated the existence of a valid contract. Somont Oil Co., Inc. v. Nutter, 228 M 467, 743 P2d 1016, 44 St. Rep. 1685 (1987).

Enforceability of Arbitration Clause in Adhesion Contract: Plaintiffs contended that an arbitration clause in a brokerage agreement should have been declared unenforceable because it appeared in a contract of adhesion. The Supreme Court found nothing in the record to indicate that the arbitration clause was not within the parties' expectations or that the clause was oppressive or unconscionable. The court noted that federal case law demonstrates that arbitration clauses are common and enforceable in brokerage agreements (citing Finkle & Ross v. A.G. Becker Paribas, Inc., 622 F. Supp. 1505 (D.C. N.Y. 1985), and Southland Corp. v. Keating, 465 US 1, 79 L Ed 2d 1, 104 S Ct 852 (1984)) and held that even if the customer agreement form was an adhesion contract, the arbitration clause was enforceable. Passage v. Prudential-Bache Sec., Inc., 223 M 60, 727 P2d 1298, 43 St. Rep. 1532 (1986), followed in Chor v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, 261 M 143, 862 P2d 26, 50 St. Rep. 1234 (1993), and Iwen v. U.S. W. Direct, 1999 MT 63, 293 M 512, 977 P2d 989, 56 St. Rep. 263 (1999). See also Cohen v. Wedbush, Noble, Cooke, Inc., 841 F2d 282 (9th Cir. 1988).

Waiver of Provision in Collective Bargaining Agreement Not Properly Before Court: A declaratory judgment action was brought to construe a collective bargaining agreement. The plaintiff filed a motion for summary judgment. The defendant opposed the motion and filed an affidavit in support of its opposition. The plaintiff argued that the affidavit submitted by defendant was inadmissible as a violation of the parol evidence rule. The trial court concluded that no material factual issue existed but denied the motion because of waiver by the plaintiff. The waiver issue was addressed in the affidavit but not in any of the other pleadings. The Supreme Court held that the waiver issue was not properly before the trial court and ordered the trial court to reconsider its denial of the motion for summary judgment. The Supreme Court also said that the defendant could amend its answer to affirmatively plead waiver. Butte Teachers' Union v. Bd. of Trustees, 201 M 482, 655 P2d 146, 39 St. Rep. 2248 (1982).

Validity of Agreements Underlying Purchase Contract: In a case involving a contract for the sale of land referring to the licenses of cabin owners occupying a portion of the land where validity of the terms of the license agreements are a fact in dispute, parol evidence was admissible, not to vary the terms of the agreement but to show that those agreements which appear on their face as valid binding contracts are in fact not binding. Rase v. Castle Mtn. Ranch, Inc., 193 M 209, 631 P2d 680, 38 St. Rep. 992 (1981).

Exception to Parol Evidence Rule — Harmless Error: The defendant appealed from a judgment granting specific performance of an option agreement to the plaintiff and ordering the property involved conveyed to the plaintiff. The defendant argued that the judgment should be reversed because the trial court erred in excluding his testimony on matters going to the validity of the contract. He claimed he had no authority to sign the agreement, he had no intent to sign a contract, and he raised the question whether anyone had directed that a writing be made. The trial court had excluded the offered evidence as a violation of the parol evidence rule. The offered testimony went to the validity of the contract and therefore constituted an exception to the rule under 28-2-905, but no prejudice occurred because such testimony was admitted later in the trial. Van Atta v. Schillinger, 191 M 472, 625 P2d 73, 38 St. Rep. 426 (1981).

Failure of Consideration Exception: Defendant's testimony that he did not receive $24,000 recited in a bill of sale given by him to plaintiff was not admissible under the failure of consideration exception to the Parol Evidence Rule because such recitation was more than the acknowledgement of payment of money consideration. It constituted the central element of the contract. Additionally, defendant was not attempting to compel payment but rather to escape the legal effect of the bill of sale. Kinjerski v. Lamey, 185 M 111, 604 P2d 782 (1979).

Lease Effective Upon FHA Approval: Parol evidence could be received to show that a lease agreement was intended to be effective only if the FHA approved a loan to the lessee, since this question went to the validity of the agreement itself. Platt v. Clark, 141 M 376, 378 P2d 235 (1963).

Offer to Build: Parol evidence was admissible to show that a contractor's letter estimating the cost of a building was not intended as an offer to build at that price, but rather that the parties intended a cost plus contract. Hammond v. Knievel, 141 M 433, 378 P2d 388 (1963).

Lease Agreement: Where, in an action to recover damages for breach of a contract of lease for failure of the lessee to gain possession, a defense of the lessor was that the contract was entered into with the express understanding that it should not become effective until and unless a tenant in possession would relinquish possession or could be ousted, parol testimony was admissible to show that what appeared to be a valid and binding contract was in reality not such, under the exception provided for in this section, that where the validity of the agreement is the fact in issue, such testimony may be admitted. Smith v. Fergus County, 98 M 377, 39 P2d 193 (1934), distinguished in Wilkerson v. School District, 216 M 203, 700 P2d 617, 42 St. Rep. 745 (1985), and followed in Thornton v. Songstad, 263 M 390, 868 P2d 633, 51 St. Rep. 104 (1994).

Object of Parties: The rule excluding parol testimony to contradict or vary a written instrument does not forbid inquiry into the object the parties had in executing, delivering, and receiving instruments made the basis of an action for breach of grain buying contracts, which defendant claimed were to be used merely as memoranda to complete plaintiff's office files and not to hold him personally liable for delivery of the grain. McCaull-Dinsmore Co. v. Stevens, 59 M 206, 194 P 213 (1921), distinguished in Hosch v. Howe, 92 M 405, 16 P2d 699 (1932).

Warehouse Receipts: Warehouse receipts for grain stored in an elevator issued under the provisions of the grain elevator law constituted binding contracts between the bailor and bailee which could not be varied or contradicted by parol testimony, the effect of which was to show that the transaction amounted to a sale and not a bailment. State ex rel. Broadwater Farms Co. v. Broadwater Elev. Co., 61 M 215, 201 P 687 (1921).

Consideration for Contract: Where there was nothing in a contract signed by a third party which showed a consideration affecting him or inducing him to become a party to it, or an intent on his part to be bound as surety for or joint promisor with one of the parties efficiently bound, parol evidence may not be resorted to for the purpose of furnishing the basis of an inference that he was or was not bound. Henry O. Shepard Co. v. Freeman, 40 M 144, 105 P 484 (1909).

CIRCUMSTANCES OF EXECUTION

Arbitration Provision in Adhesive Contract Enforceable — Noncompetition Clause Within Weaker Party's Reasonable Expectation: Larsen asserted that an employment contract containing a noncompetition clause was a contract of adhesion and that the arbitration clause in the contract was unenforceable. The Supreme Court applied the factors in Kloss v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 2002 MT 129, 310 M 123, 54 P3d 1 (2002), and determined that the contract was indeed adhesive. However, simply being adhesive does not render a contract invalid and unenforceable under Kloss. The contract must also either fall outside the weaker party's reasonable expectation or be unconscionable. In this case, Larsen had 20 years' experience in the insurance industry and had entered various similar employment agreements that contained arbitration clauses during those years, and the arbitration provision was stated in bold letters on the first page of the agreement. These facts constituted sufficient grounds to support the conclusion that the arbitration clause fell within Larsen's reasonable expectations and was therefore enforceable. However, once the District Court determined the validity of the arbitration clause, the court exceeded its authority in deciding additional substantive issues under the agreement that should have been decided by an arbitrator, so the case was remanded for arbitration. Larsen v. W. St. Ins. Agency, Inc., 2007 MT 270, 339 M 407, 170 P3d 956 (2007), following Martz v. Beneficial Mont., Inc., 2006 MT 94, 332 M 93, 135 P3d 790 (2006).

Evidence of Circumstances Under Which Instrument Made Admissible for Determining Ambiguity: As a general rule, evidence of the circumstances under which an instrument was made may not be considered when the language of the instrument is clear and certain in its terms. However, objective evidence of those circumstances, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and the parties to it, may be shown and considered to aid the court in determining, as a preliminary matter, whether the instrument contains an ambiguity. If the court determines that no ambiguity exists, then the extrinsic evidence may not be considered further, but if the court determines that an ambiguity is present in the instrument, then the extrinsic evidence may be introduced at trial to allow the trier of fact to determine the intent of the parties in entering into the contract. In the present case, both parties agreed that language in a right-of-way contract was unambiguous, so the trial court did not err in refusing to consider the circumstances under which the contract was made. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007). See 11 Williston on Contracts, 33:39 (4th Ed. 1999). See also Beebe v. Bd. of Directors of the Bridger Creek Subdivision Community Ass'n, 2015 MT 183, 379 Mont. 484, 352 P.3d 1094, holding that failure to identify ambiguity in an association's bylaws excluded consideration of extrinsic evidence.

Defaulting Buyer Under Unambiguous Written Contract Cannot Rely Upon Expectations Not Covered by Contract to Avoid Contract — Disposition of Downpayment Amounts Paid and Due — County Not Liable for Negligent Misrepresentation as to Recordability of Deeds and Seller's Title Insurer Not Liable for Loss in Marketability: Documents for the sale and purchase of two sections of land unambiguously showed, and it was undisputed, that the resale of 20-acre parcels by the buyer, the immediate acceptance by the county of 20-acre resale deeds of a type that would make subdivision review unnecessary, and the ability to resell without having to undergo subdivision review were not parts of the bargain. The parties knew that these things were contemplated, but the documents did not refer to them or make them a part of the contract. Before the contract was made, the county indicated that it would accept the 20-acre resale deeds. The deal fell through when the county changed its position after the contract was signed. The buyer failed to pay the whole downpayment, and the seller terminated the contract and kept the paid portion of the downpayment. Precontract discussions on the matter must be disregarded as parol evidence because the documents were unambiguous and did not refer to the matter. The buyer was not entitled to rescind the contract and have the paid portion of the downpayment returned based on mutual mistake or failure of consideration. There was no mutual mistake because the parties knew that it was not a certainty that the county would accept the deeds. There was no failure of consideration because the resale, county acceptance of the deeds, and avoidance of subdivision review were not part of the written contract. In addition, the need for a subdivision review would not make the land unmarketable; at most, its market value decreased and it would take longer to sell it. Furthermore, a party in default is not entitled to rescission. The seller was entitled to terminate the contract. The seller was also entitled to keep an amount of the paid portion of the downpayment equal to the amount by which the contract price for the land exceeded the market value of the land at the time of the breach. The seller was not entitled to keep the remainder of the paid portion of the downpayment or to a judgment for the unpaid portion of the downpayment because the contract did not provide for that remedy. The county was not liable in tort to the seller for negligent misrepresentation, and the buyer's title insurance company was not liable to the seller for the loss in the marketability of the land caused by the need for subdivision review. Yellowstone II Dev. Group, Inc. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 2001 MT 41, 304 M 223, 20 P3d 755 (2001), overruled in Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), to the extent that Yellowstone II held that the determination of whether a term in a contract is ambiguous is not a question involving parol evidence.

Contents of Safe Deposit Box Not Considered Jointly Held Asset: Silver directed his son to lease a safe deposit box for Silver's cash and signed a statement authorizing his son's access to the box. The lease form was prepared by a bank employee, who indicated that it was a joint agreement. Without Silver's direction, consent, or knowledge, the son subsequently removed the cash and placed it in his own safe deposit box in the same bank. Silver died 8 days later, and the personal representative sought to recover the cash, a substantial portion of which Silver had bequeathed to a charitable foundation. The District Court allowed the personal representative and a family friend to testify regarding statements that Silver made to them about the cash and its disposition. The court also admitted extrinsic evidence regarding the safe deposit box lease, holding that the fact that the lease form was prepared by a bank employee was relevant to interpretation of the document. The son alleged error on both issues, contending that the cash was a jointly held asset. The Supreme Court, citing Thompson v. Steinkamp, 120 M 475, 187 P2d 1018 (1947), and Anderson v. Baker, 196 M 494, 641 P2d 1035 (1982), found that the contested testimony put into context Silver's lease of the box and constituted evidence of Silver's intent to retain ownership of the cash. The fact that Silver did not select the form of lease or check the box on the lease form was supported by substantial credible evidence and was not clearly erroneous. Nevertheless, the son cited 70-1-308 for the contention that the cash was a jointly held asset. However, both the lease agreement and the statute provided for joint access to and possession of the safe deposit box and its contents, but not for joint ownership of the contents. Moreover, the language regarding the rights of surviving joint tenants did not apply here because Silver was still alive when the cash was removed. Thus, the District Court correctly concluded that the cash was not a jointly held asset by virtue of the agreement or the statute. The son could cite no contract theory under which he could be declared the owner of the cash, so the District Court did not err in applying gift theory rather than contract theory in determining ownership of the contents of the box or in concluding that the cash was not a gift to the son, based on the fact that Silver retained ownership. The District Court properly awarded the contents of the box to the estate. In re Estate of Silver, 2000 MT 127, 299 M 506, 1 P3d 358, 57 St. Rep. 526 (2000), distinguishing Malek v. Patten, 208 M 237, 678 P2d 201 (1984).

Loan of Title Based Upon Exchange of Deeds Upheld — Oral Extrinsic Evidence Controlling: Johnson agreed to loan Anderson the title to several lots that Johnson owned on Flathead Lake so that Anderson could mortgage the lots and use the proceeds for a business venture. Johnson and Anderson both executed deeds to the property, and Anderson occupied the property pursuant to a lease agreement. Later, the agreement was breached when Anderson conveyed his interest to a third party and cut trees from the property. Both parties sought a declaration of ownership in a quiet title action. The District Court admitted oral evidence showing that nothing more than a loan of title evidenced by an exchange of deeds was intended. The Supreme Court held that the timing of the execution and delivery of the two deeds was not controlling and that the deed conveying the property back to Johnson, even though it may have been signed and delivered first, was controlling in light of the circumstances of the transaction. The Supreme Court held that the deed conveying the property back to Johnson was valid as between the parties even though it was not recorded until later. Anderson v. Johnson, 264 M 66, 870 P2d 59, 51 St. Rep. 149 (1994).

Recovery on Written Instrument Absent Defense — Parol Evidence Not Allowed: Under Montana's Uniform Commercial Code, when signatures to an instrument are admitted or established, production of the instrument entitles the holder to recover on it unless the defendant establishes a defense. Parol evidence will not be allowed to contradict, alter, or vary a contract that has been reduced to a writing. Niemen v. Howell, 234 M 471, 764 P2d 854, 45 St. Rep. 2058 (1988).

Testimony on Contract Negotiations Disallowed: The distinction between waiver and parol evidence allowed to establish a variance from contract terms explained and justified a lower court decision to sustain plaintiff's objection to witness testimony regarding contract negotiations. Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).

Letter Relating to Execution of Lease — Properly Accepted Parol Evidence: In reviewing the trial court's interpretation of the heating cost provisions of a 5-year lease, the Supreme Court held that a letter containing a payment schedule and testimony relating to the schedule was properly accepted parol testimony to explain circumstances surrounding the lease agreement. The letter and testimony aided in resolving the ambiguity existing in the instrument as permitted by 28-2-905(2). The role of the judge is to construe an instrument according to its terms or its substance, not to insert or omit terms. The judge, however, may consider circumstances surrounding the execution, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and of the parties, to place himself in a position to interpret the language. In construing terms, evidence is admissible to show a local, technical, or otherwise peculiar signification used and understood by the parties. Martin v. Laurel Cable TV, Inc., 215 M 229, 696 P2d 454, 42 St. Rep. 314 (1985).

Construction of Terms of Agreement — Factual Issue Precluding Summary Judgment: A June 1976 agreement between the parties provided that plaintiff would advance money for the downpayment in the purchase of real property in Billings and would receive certain benefits, including a 50% interest in the property, in return. Plaintiff was to control any contractual arrangements until defendant had contributed, by payment of the monthly installments, a sum equal to the downpayment. In 1977, prior to the equalization of contributions, plaintiff entered negotiations to sell the property. No agreement between plaintiff and defendant was reached regarding the sale, and plaintiff filed suit seeking specific performance of the agreement.

Plaintiff was granted summary judgment allowing him exclusive control of contract negotiations concerning the land for 1 year. Defendant contended on appeal that summary judgment was improper as there were factual controversies as to whether he had ever received an offer to sell the property and whether "control of any contractual arrangements" contemplated selling the property. Where, as here, the written agreement was imprecise and not artfully drawn, reference to extrinsic evidence indicating the intention of the parties would be proper, particularly since the same attorney represented both parties. Factual issues existed, and the case was remanded for trial on the merits. Downs v. Smyk, 200 M 334, 651 P2d 1238, 39 St. Rep. 1786 (1982).

Commodity Account Agreement: A stock brokerage firm explained to a customer the risk involved in a commodity straddle for tax deferral purposes and also had the customer sign a written agreement acknowledging the high degree of risk involved. Oral statements regarding the risk involved did not violate the parol evidence rule as they were evidence of the circumstances under which the written agreement was made. This evidence should be considered in determining whether to grant a motion for summary judgment. Brown v. Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc., 197 M 1, 640 P2d 453, 39 St. Rep. 305 (1982).

Savings Account Signature Card: A son was added as a joint tenant on his mother's savings accounts by signing the savings institution's signature card. The card contained language declaring one-half the deposit a gift to the joint tenant. The mother later brought an action against her son, asserting that she never intended to gift any portion of the accounts to her son but merely to allow him to withdraw money for her expenses if needed. The parol evidence rule was not an obstacle to the introduction of evidence extrinsic to the language on the signature card. Anderson v. Baker, 196 M 494, 641 P2d 1035, 39 St. Rep. 273 (1982).

Intent of Contracting Parties — Parol Evidence Admissible to Show Knowledge of Agent: In an action by the plaintiff contractor against the defendant motor carrier for breach of contract caused by the defendant's refusal to haul fabricated silo sections, the court did not err in finding that a memorandum of the agreement by the defendant's employee was sufficiently clear to form a valid contract. Parol evidence is admissible to apply the memorandum to the subject matter of the contract. The evidence showed that agents of the defendant knew the subject matter of the contract and that knowledge is imputed to the defendant and will be applied to the memorandum to determine the intent of the defendant as to the subject matter of the contract. Empire Steel Mfg. Co. v. Carlson, 191 M 189, 622 P2d 1016, 38 St. Rep. 101 (1981).

Waiver of Mechanics' Lien (Now Construction Lien): The circumstances of the parties to a transaction and their real purpose in executing instruments relating thereto is subject to interpretation and may be proved by parol testimony. Plaintiff retained lien rights for money owing to him despite his execution of a series of lien releases written in general terms when each release was executed upon the payment of an amount of money and uncontradicted parol testimony indicated that the parties regarded the lien waivers to be releases only as to amounts paid and not general releases of lien rights. Fillbach v. Inland Constr. Corp., 178 M 374, 584 P2d 1274 (1978).

Witness Testimony:

Under this section testimony of witnesses who were present at the time a contract of lease of oil lands was entered into, or just prior thereto, as to statements made by officers of the lessors in connection with conversations had with an officer of defendant with relation to offers received for drilling wells on the lands in question, was properly admissible in explanation of the circumstances under which the contract was made. Brown v. Homestake Exploration Co., 98 M 305, 39 P2d 168 (1934).

The parol testimony rule does not forbid an inquiry into the object of the parties in executing and receiving the instrument sued upon; while its language cannot be qualified or varied from its natural import, the circumstances under which it was entered into and the real intention of the parties may be shown by parol to prevent either of the parties to it from committing a fraud on the other by claiming it to be what it in fact is not. Bridges & Co. v. Bank of Fergus County, 77 M 524, 251 P 1057 (1926).

No Conflict of Terms: A conversation between buyer and seller had prior to the execution of a bill of sale, with the terms of which it was not in conflict, and which was material to show the circumstances under which the writing was executed, was admissible in evidence and not open to the objection that it varied the written agreement. Sutherland v. Green, 49 M 379, 142 P 636 (1914).

AMBIGUITY

Use of Extrinsic Evidence to Determine Scope of Servitude: The defendants disputed the plaintiff's right to a private road over their property that stemmed from an "access" easement. The District Court found in favor of the plaintiff, using extrinsic evidence to do so. The Supreme Court affirmed, stating that ambiguity in the plat description necessitated an examination of extrinsic evidence. Whitefish Congregation of Jehovah's Witnesses, Inc. v. Caltabiano, 2019 MT 228, 397 Mont. 284, 449 P.3d 812.

Port Authority Insured Under County Insurance Policy — Extrinsic Evidence Considered — Policy Construed Against Drafter — Insurer Not Immune From Suit as Reinsurer: After a port authority building was destroyed by a fire, the port claimed that it qualified as an insured under a county insurance company policy that included county members and any other county entities that receive insurance through a county joint insurance authority. The insurance company claimed that the language in the policy did not extend to county entities such as the port. Additionally, the insurance company claimed that it was a reinsurer and therefore it was improper for the port to bring a direct claim against it. The Supreme Court held that the port qualified as an insured under terms of the policy and that a direct claim was proper. In reaching a conclusion that was contrary to the language of the policy, the court gave meaning to the entire contract, considered extrinsic evidence, and construed ambiguous language in the policy against the insurer as the drafter. In determining that a direct claim was proper, the court reasoned that the port dealt directly with the insurance company, and therefore the insurer was an excess insurance carrier, rather than a reinsurer. Lincoln County Port Authority v. Allianz Global Risks US Ins. Co., 2013 MT 365, 373 Mont. 60, 315 P.3d 934.

Insurance Coverage for Intentional Dumping of Hazardous Waste Denied Under Policy Exclusion: For more than 3 years, defendant disposed of hazardous waste solvents into a sanitary landfill. The solvents migrated into the ground water, and neighbors sued defendant for personal injury and property damages. Defendant sought coverage from plaintiff insurer to remediate the damages and costs for the third-party suits, and the insurer eventually sought a declaration that it owed no duty to provide insurance coverage and defense costs for the environmental claims. Defendant's insurance policy contained a pollution exclusion that barred coverage for environmental damage unless the pollution was sudden or accidental. The District Court granted plaintiff summary judgment, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court applied general rules of contract law, strictly construing the policy provisions in favor of defendant, but affirmed summary judgment absent ambiguity in the policy language. Under the policy, the initial disposal, rather than the migration and any resulting damages, had to be sudden and accidental in order to fall within the pollution exclusion clause. Defendant's routine intentional disposal of waste over a period of years could not be considered sudden or accidental, so defendant was unable to establish that the claims fell within the basic scope of coverage. Thus, plaintiff had no duty to defend defendant, and summary judgment for plaintiff was proper. Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Ribi Immunochem Research, Inc., 2005 MT 50, 326 M 174, 108 P3d 469 (2005). See also Bozeman v. AIU Ins. Co., 272 M 349, 900 P2d 929 (1995), and Makarka v. Great Am. Ins. Co, 14 P3d 964 (Alaska 2000).

Ambiguous Deeds of Conveyance — Intent of Parties Properly Considered: A dispute arose in a quiet title action based on subdivision surveys that differed from the original government survey. The District Court held that the property belonged to defendants, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Inconsistencies between the original plat and the location of the subdivision surveyor's monuments created an ambiguity. References to quarter section lines and quarter corners in the original survey were definite and ascertainable, and the subdivision surveyor's improperly placed monuments were considered false particulars frustrating the conveyance. The District Court properly applied Brown's Boundary Control and Legal Principles (4th Ed. 1995) to determine that the subdivision surveyor's monuments conflicted with the government's original monument and correctly considered the intent of the parties in interpreting the surveys and conveyances. Further, the original plat was part of the deeds of conveyance in defendants' chain of title, so the District Court correctly allowed the certificate of dedication into evidence. Olson v. Jude, 2003 MT 186, 316 M 438, 73 P3d 809 (2003).

Wendell Test Applied to Determination of Whether Bodily Injury Caused by Accident "Resulting From the Use" of Insured Vehicle: Defendant's son was injured in a hunting accident after riding to the hunt in a vehicle owned by Wajahuski and insured by plaintiff. The insurance policy provided for coverage resulting from the use of a vehicle. The District Court applied the test in Wendell v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 17, 293 M 140, 974 P2d 623 (1999), and held that the automobile insurance policy did not provide liability coverage with respect to defendant's claims for bodily injury. Defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Even though the Wendell test was originally applied in an uninsured motorist case, the expansive, fact-intensive test also applied here. The phrase "resulting from the use" was ambiguous, so the contract terms were construed in a light most favorable to the insured or other beneficiary. The accident could have occurred in any location, regardless of how the hunters reached their destination. The fact that that particular vehicle was used to transport the hunters and assist in the hunt provided no connection between the use of the vehicle and the hunting accident. Thus, the District Court did not err in holding that the personal injuries were not caused by an accident resulting from the use of the insured motor vehicle. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Ferrin, 2002 MT 196, 311 M 155, 54 P3d 21 (2002).

Ambiguity Regarding Whether Settlement Contingent on Alternate Financing — Summary Judgment Improper: Plaintiff sought to foreclose on a loan made to defendant, alleging that defendant's liabilities exceeded the value of the collateral, resulting in default pursuant to the terms of the note. The parties made several attempts to settle the issue, resulting in defendant's payoff to plaintiff, but in an amount that the plaintiff claimed was insufficient. The District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff and ordered enforcement of the settlement agreement. However, a letter memorializing the settlement agreement, when considered with the parties' other correspondence, created an ambiguity regarding whether the settlement was contingent on alternate financing. Because there was more than one reasonable interpretation regarding the parties' intention, the parties' affidavits and testimony were admissible to determine intention and raised an issue of fact that precluded summary judgment. The case was remanded for further proceedings. Stockman Bank v. Potts, 2002 MT 178, 311 M 12, 52 P3d 920 (2002).

Modification of Nonexistent Contract Impossible — Minutes of Preconstruction Meeting Inadmissible Extrinsic Evidence Absent Ambiguity in Subsequent Contract: Keeney Construction (Keeney) subcontracted to perform certain construction work for James Talcott Construction Co., Inc. (Talcott). The subcontract stated that time was of the essence, but contained no specific date of completion, Rather, Keeney was to complete the work as directed by Talcott and on Talcott's completion schedule. Keeney asserted that the parties intended a 1996 completion date, but the project was not finished until 1997. Keeney sued for damages for delay and extra work, contending that extrinsic evidence in the form of minutes from a preconstruction meeting, held 2 days before the contract was finalized, would verify the parties' intent and represented an executed oral agreement that modified the written contract. The Supreme Court found no ambiguity in the written contract to warrant further examination of the intent of the parties. Because the intent of the contract was clear, the extrinsic evidence was inadmissible to support the contention that a specific completion date was intended. Keeney could not assert a claim for damages based on Talcott's direction of the timing of the completion of the project when the contract authorized Talcott to do so. Further, because an oral agreement cannot modify a contract that does not yet exist, the meeting and conversations held prior to the contract signing could not be interpreted as a modification of the subsequent written contract. Keeney Constr. v. James Talcott Constr. Co., Inc., 2002 MT 69, 309 M 226, 45 P3d 19 (2002).

Interpretation of Latent Ambiguity in Marital Property Settlement Agreement — Wife Entitled to Value of Improvements to Real Property Made Between Time of Dissolution and Time of Sale: A property settlement agreement provided that the wife would receive the family home subject to the debt owed upon it (although no debt was owing) and that when she sold it, she would return one-half of the proceeds of the sale of the house to the husband. The wife's subsequent improvements to the home increased its value from $55,500 at the time of dissolution to $75,000 at the time of sale. The wife requested an interpretation of the settlement agreement to address the division of proceeds in light of her substantial improvements to the property, as well as her payment of all property taxes since the date of dissolution. The District Court concluded that the property settlement agreement created a latent ambiguity by failing to address what would happen to the expenditures of one party that were for neither maintenance nor repairs. The court concluded that the agreement contemplated that the wife would maintain the value of the home at the time of dissolution and divide that value when the house was sold and that the property taxes were an item of maintenance that the wife was responsible for pursuant to the agreement. The Supreme Court affirmed. In light of the latent ambiguity in the agreement, the District Court did not introduce an additional provision to the agreement that deprived the husband of his contractual rights, but merely interpreted the agreement to clarify what was meant by "one-half of the proceeds of the sale of the house" in the context of nonmaintenance expenditures. Upon finding a latent ambiguity, the District Court properly admitted parol evidence to interpret the agreement and correctly allowed the wife to retain the proceeds from the sale of the house attributable to her expenditures for improvements beyond maintenance and repairs. In re Marriage of Holloway, 2000 MT 104, 299 M 291, 999 P2d 980, 57 St. Rep. 418 (2000).

"Arising Out of" Ambiguous — Coverage for Liability Not Excluded: Pablos were injured in a vehicle accident involving Moore, who was transporting a landscaping tractor for his employer. The employer was covered by a commercial general liability insurance policy that provided liability insurance for negligent acts of the corporation and its employees. Pablos contended that the employer was negligent in the hiring, training, and supervision of Moore. The employer conceded that the claim arose during the policy period and fell within the definitions of "bodily injury" and "occurrence" and that the policy would provide coverage unless coverage was denied by an exclusion but contended that coverage was excluded under both the exclusion for damages "arising out of" the use of an automobile and the exclusion for damages "arising out of" the transportation of mobile equipment. The District Court held that the term "arising out of" was ambiguous and, construing the instrument against the drafter-insurer, ruled that coverage for Pablos' accident was not excluded under the policy language. Noting that the phrase "arising out of" has been declared ambiguous in another insurance context in Wendell v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 17, 293 M 140, 974 P2d 623 (1999), the Supreme Court applied a similar rationale to the phrase in both exclusionary clauses at issue in the present case. The phrase was reasonably subject to more than one interpretation and thus ambiguous. Pursuant to Head v. Cent. Reserve Life of N. America Ins. Co., 256 M 188, 845 P2d 735, 50 St. Rep. 20 (1993), if the terms of an insurance policy are ambiguous, obscure, or open to different constructions, the construction most favorable to the insured or other beneficiary must prevail, particularly if an ambiguous provision attempts to exclude the liability of the insurer. Here, the policy did not clearly and unambiguously exclude coverage for the theories of liability pleaded by Pablos, and the District Court's summary judgment that coverage was owed on Pablos' claims for negligent hiring, training, and supervision of Moore was affirmed. Pablo v. Moore, 2000 MT 48, 298 M 393, 995 P2d 460, 57 St. Rep. 231 (2000), following Marquis v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 961 P2d 1213 (Kans. 1998).

Parol Evidence of Circumstances Under Which Bid Prepared Proper in Interpreting Uncertain Contract Provisions: Bid estimates on a road building project contained vague and ambiguous project requirements, and testimony at trial regarding the height of the finished road was conflicting. Thus, the District Court, in interpreting provisions of the contract that appeared ambiguous or uncertain, properly considered parol evidence of the circumstances under which the bid was prepared. The court found more credible the contractor's testimony that there was not agreement that a subroad would be constructed of pit run gravel 6 inches above field grade, and that determination was affirmed on appeal. DeNiro v. Gasvoda, 1999 MT 129, 294 M 478, 982 P2d 1002, 56 St. Rep. 521 (1999).

Extrinsic Evidence on Testamentary Intent Raising Genuine Issue of Material Fact — Summary Judgment Improper: Kuralt gifted Shannon with 20 acres along the Big Hole River, disguising the transaction as a sale. Shortly before he died, he sent Shannon a letter, which constituted a holographic will, suggesting that he intended to do the same with another 90 acres. The District Court allowed introduction of the letter as extrinsic evidence regarding testamentary intent, then granted summary judgment to the estate after finding that the letter contemplated a separate testamentary instrument not yet in existence to accomplish the transfer of the Montana property. Nevertheless, the letter raised a fundamental disagreement as to a genuine material fact—namely, whether Kuralt intended that the letter effect a posthumous disposition of the property. Regardless of whether the court admitted the evidence because it considered the letter ambiguous or because it agreed with Shannon that extrinsic evidence may be discretionarily admitted in holographic will disputes, the court nevertheless improperly resolved contested issues by granting summary judgment. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case for trial. In re Estate of Kuralt, 1999 MT 111, 294 M 354, 981 P2d 771, 56 St. Rep. 460 (1999).

Ambiguity of Draft Purporting to Be Release That Is Also Receipt — Summary Judgment Improper: The District Court improperly granted summary judgment for an insurance company after finding plaintiff had signed a release from suit. The Supreme Court found a contractual ambiguity existed because the release language was contained in a $1,500 draft that purported to be a release but was also a receipt in certain situations. The District Court adopted verbatim the proposed findings and conclusions presented by the insurer, which put it in the position of a trier of factual issues rather than determining whether genuine issues of material fact existed on the motion for summary judgment. Existence of ambiguity precluded summary judgment. Buskirk v. Nelson, 237 M 455, 774 P2d 398, 46 St. Rep. 964 (1989).

Commission as Evidence of Fiduciary Relationship — Rescission by Principal: The District Court did not err in relying on the explicit definition of the word "commission" in finding that a real estate agent who was granted a commission for the sale of a resort while intending to be one of the ultimate purchasers was acting in a fiduciary capacity in his relationship with the principal. Because the relationship existed, the sales agreement was voidable and subject to rescission by the principal. Boyne, U.S.A., Inc. v. Mallas, 236 M 305, 769 P2d 1235, 46 St. Rep. 380 (1989).

Contracts — Sufficient Ambiguity as Question of Law: In the interpretation of contracts, it is a question of law whether there is an ambiguity sufficient to submit the issue to a jury. Monte Vista Co. v. The Anaconda Co., 231 M 522, 755 P2d 1358, 45 St. Rep. 809 (1988), citing Nordlund v. School District, 227 M 402, 738 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 1183 (1987), and followed in Audit Serv., Inc. v. Systad, 252 M 62, 826 P2d 549, 49 St. Rep. 137 (1992), Doble v. Bernhard, 1998 MT 124, 289 M 80, 959 P2d 488, 55 St. Rep. 489 (1998), and, with regard to admissibility of parol evidence in determining the intent of the parties when ambiguities exist in a contract, Molerway Freight Lines, Inc. v. Rite-Line Transp. Serv., Inc., 273 M 95, 902 P2d 9, 52 St. Rep. 839 (1995). See also Johnson v. Nyhart, 269 M 379, 889 P2d 1170, 52 St. Rep. 37 (1995), and Rich v. Ellingson, 2007 MT 346, 340 M 285, 174 P3d 491 (2007).

No Ambiguity in Oil Drilling Contract — Personal Liability When Escrow Unfunded: Defendant corporation was to ensure that a drilling company was paid either by funding an escrow or by making the payments itself. Defendant contended that contract provisions created an ambiguity by requiring the "operator" and the third-party escrow company to make required payments. The Supreme Court noted that: (1) the contract did not state that the corporation's payment was conditioned on escrow being set up; and (2) even if the escrow provision was a condition precedent waived by the drilling company, such waiver did not release the corporation from its payment obligation. The escrow provision was waived when adequate funds were not deposited. The remaining provision specifically stated the corporation's liability to pay, and failure to do so was breach of contract. Drilcon, Inc. v. Roil Energy Corp., Inc., 230 M 166, 749 P2d 1058, 45 St. Rep. 114 (1988).

Ambiguous Language Regarding Conduct of Mineral Development Operations: An agreement implementing development of a mineral interest indicated that the parties would operate the venture as joint operators, but it was ambiguous as to who would conduct the day-to-day operations of the property, seemingly implying that daily operations would be conducted by the oil company. Evidence indicated that lessor worked as an employee in the operations, so the District Court properly granted the company authority to conduct daily operations subject to a right of inspection by the lessor. Somont Oil Co., Inc. v. Nutter, 228 M 467, 743 P2d 1016, 44 St. Rep. 1685 (1987).

Parol Evidence Necessary to Determine Intention When Latent Ambiguity Exists: A party transferred property back to sellers in lieu of foreclosure. The transfer arguably constituted a technical conveyance. "Conveyance" had different meanings for the parties and therefore was to be interpreted in accord with the manifest intent of the parties. Parol evidence was necessarily admissible to demonstrate and explain this latent ambiguity, and summary judgment on the issue was improper. Ellingson Agency, Inc. v. Baltrusch, 228 M 360, 742 P2d 1009, 44 St. Rep. 1598 (1987), followed in Fox Grain & Cattle Co. v. Maxwell, 267 M 528, 885 P2d 432, 51 St. Rep. 1136 (1994).

Construction of "Cash and Savings" Clause in Will and Subsequent Agreement — Parol Evidence Admissible: In broadly construing a clause in a will leaving "cash and savings" to the wife and when the clause was also used in a subsequent agreement wherein the parties more clearly delineated the division of property, the trial court properly granted to the wife a promissory note, a diamond ring, partnership interests, and corporate shares. A residuary clause bequeathing to a brother the remainder of the estate, "including but not limited to my ranch and any livestock and machinery", properly included all personal property and assets connected with the ranch, including patronage and capital credits in electric, telephone, and farming cooperatives. The "cash and savings" clause as used in the subsequent agreement did not alter the will and was properly construed in the context of the will. Further, it was not error for the lower court to admit parol evidence relative to the parties' intent as to the agreement in interpreting ambiguous language in the agreement. In re Estate of Flasted, 228 M 85, 741 P2d 750, 44 St. Rep. 1362 (1987).

Ambiguity in Reservation — Summary Judgment Improper: In a 1944 deed, the grantor reserved "six percent of all royalties received for oil and gas removed from the above-described property". In 1968, the mineral owners leased the property subject to a one-eighth landowner's royalty (12½% of oil and gas produced). In a subsequent suit, the royalty owners claimed they were entitled to 6% of production and the mineral owners claimed that the royalty owners were entitled to 6% of the landowner's royalty of 12½% of production. The District Court granted summary judgment for the mineral owners. The Supreme Court reversed on the grounds that the reservation language is ambiguous and the true intent of the parties is discernible only with reference to extrinsic evidence, not from the deed alone; therefore, summary judgment was inappropriate. Proctor v. Werk, 220 M 246, 714 P2d 171, 43 St. Rep. 333 (1986).

Ambiguous Assignment — Construction of Document as a Whole: Peterson sold property to the Blairs under a contract for deed that reserved one-half the mineral rights in Peterson. Peterson then assigned her rights under the contract to Hopkins. The Blairs paid Hopkins and recorded. Peterson sued Hopkins to quiet title when the lessee of Peterson's one-half mineral rights claimed Peterson had assigned them to Hopkins by mistake. Hopkins was granted summary judgment because the assignment conveyed all of Peterson's right, title, and interest in the property, together with the contract for deed. The judgment was reversed, and judgment was granted Peterson. The assignment stated that it was subject to the contract for deed, thus creating an ambiguity. Taken as a whole, it appeared that the assignment was of the contract for deed and was not itself a deed of the entire surface and mineral interests to Hopkins. This was supported by the conduct of the parties, for Peterson leased her reserved interest for the 22 years following the assignment until lessee raised the alleged mistake, and at no time up to his death in the 17th year of the 22 years did Hopkins claim all the mineral rights or demand Peterson's one-half interest. Peterson v. Hopkins, 210 M 429, 684 P2d 1061, 41 St. Rep. 1140 (1984).

Ambiguous Assignment — Explanatory Evidence Admissible: A contract for deed reserved one-half the mineral rights in seller. Seller's subsequent assignment was ambiguous where it assigned all of seller's right, title, and interest in the property, together with the contract for deed, yet also stated that it was subject to the contract for deed. Therefore, the evidence was admissible to explain the ambiguity and the intent of seller and assignee of seller's rights under the contract for deed. Peterson v. Hopkins, 210 M 429, 684 P2d 1061, 41 St. Rep. 1140 (1984).

Commission Agreement Found Unambiguous — Use of Extrinsic Evidence to Prove Lack of Ambiguity Upheld: Where the defendant seller of real estate made a commission agreement with the plaintiff providing for payment of the commission out of the receipts from the contract for deed, the District Court did not err in holding that money received by the defendant under a modification of the contract for deed could not be used to calculate the amount of commission owed to the plaintiff. The terms of the commission contract were not ambiguous and show that it was the intent of the parties to count only that money received under the original agreement. The District Court properly looked to the terms of the contract for deed only to determine whether an ambiguity existed in the commission agreement, and having determined there was none, properly excluded other evidence of the parties' intent in making the commission agreement. Martin v. Community Gas & Oil Co., 205 M 394, 668 P2d 243, 40 St. Rep. 1385 (1983).

Ambiguity in Reservation — Course of Conduct: Plaintiffs initiated an action to determine their rights under a reservation in an assignment of an oil and gas lease. The 1926 lease assigned reserved the right to take and use gas "for the purpose of extracting, making, or manufacturing casing-head gasoline or by-products or carbon black". The course of conduct and expert testimony both showed that the language was meant to be nonrestrictive. Souders v. Mont. Power Co., 203 M 483, 662 P2d 289, 40 St. Rep. 583 (1983).

Ambiguous "Cost-Plus" and Ceiling Price Language in Building Contract — Parol Evidence Properly Admitted: Plaintiff agreed to build a house for defendants. The contract entered into contained "cost-plus" language as well as ceiling price language. Costs were more than anticipated. Defendants ordered plaintiff to stop working on the house. Defendants paid the ceiling price referred to in the contract, which left plaintiff with no profit. Plaintiff filed a mechanics' lien (now construction lien) on the property. A trial was held, with the judge finding for defendants. Plaintiff contended it was error to admit parol evidence to modify the contract. The Supreme Court found that the admission of parol evidence was proper due to the ambiguity of the contract. The question was then a factual one for the District Court. There was substantial evidence to support the finding of the ceiling price. Matos v. Rohrer, 203 M 162, 661 P2d 443, 40 St. Rep. 366 (1983), distinguished in Lewistown Miller Constr. Co., Inc. v. Martin, 2011 MT 325, 363 Mont. 208, 271 P.3d 48.

Termination of Lease — Removal of Holdover Tenant — Agricultural Exception to Landlord-Tenant: Defendant sold plaintiff her property. The instrument contained a lease back to defendant of the buildings and 6 acres. Plaintiff gave notice that the lease was to terminate. Defendant refused to vacate. Plaintiff brought an action under the unlawful detainer statutes which provide for an award of treble damages. Defendant contended the dispute was governed by the Montana Residential Landlord and Tenant Act of 1977. Plaintiff contended the lease was within the "agricultural" exclusion contained in 70-24-104(8). The lease provisions gave no indication of the nature of the buildings or of the intended use of the 6 acres. The trial court allowed the introduction of photographs and oral testimony regarding the lease, which established that the use of the land was for maintenance of defendant's livestock. The trial court properly allowed parol evidence to resolve an ambiguity in the lease. The Supreme Court determined that the legislative intent of 70-24-104 was for a comprehensive coverage of all agricultural operations, whether they are large-scale operations for profit or small-scale operations secondary to the use of the residence. The unlawful detainer provisions were properly applied. Dussault v. Hjelm, 192 M 282, 627 P2d 1237, 38 St. Rep. 738 (1981).

Conveyances in Mineral Deed: No ambiguity existed between clause conveying one-half of the minerals in 1,040 acres and the conveyance of 520 mineral acres, so that mineral deed could not be varied by parol evidence. Superior Oil Co. v. Vanderhoof, 297 F. Supp. 1086 (D.C. Mont. 1969).

Court to Determine Intent: In action for specific performance arising over interpretation of contract for conveyance of land reserving mineral interest, where cross-complaint of defendants alleged that the contract was ambiguous and uncertain and prayed for a declaratory judgment to adjudicate the rights of the parties, it was the duty of the trial court to determine the intent of the parties, and the exclusion of parol evidence of intent was error. Stokes v. Tutvet, 134 M 250, 328 P2d 1096 (1958).

When Language Needs Interpretation: If the language of a contract is clear it needs no interpretation, and the intention of the parties in entering into it must be ascertained from the writing alone. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Songer, 91 M 127, 7 P2d 238 (1931).

Commission Sales Agreement: Where an agreement to furnish automobiles to be sold on commission did not furnish its own interpretation, parol evidence was properly admitted to determine the intention of the parties. Brockway v. Blair, 53 M 531, 165 P 455 (1917).

FRAUD

Summary Judgment on Fraud Claim Improper Given Genuine Issue of Material Fact: In order to purchase a condominium in downtown Bozeman, the plaintiff arranged bank financing. She requested a traditional 30-year loan and the bank provided her a truth in lending statement and a good faith estimate for a 30-year mortgage. At closing, and unbeknownst to her or her realtor, she signed documents for a loan with an 18-month finance term and a balloon payment instead. She claimed to have learned of the change in term only a couple of weeks before the balloon payment was due and, because the property was zoned as commercial, was unable to obtain long-term financing and was forced to sell it. She sued the bank for fraud for changing the term of the loan without informing her. The District Court granted the bank summary judgment, ruling that the plaintiff had not stated facts to support each of the nine elements of fraud. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed summary judgment, based on its conclusion that the facts as presented by the plaintiff established a genuine issue of material fact, and remanded the matter to the District Court. McCulley v. Amer. Land Title Co., 2013 MT 89, 369 Mont. 433, 300 P.3d 679.

Representations in Negotiations:

The Graveleys argued that during negotiations for a loan, the Farm Credit Bank assured them that there was enough equity in the two properties that they were seeking to buy to secure the loan and that they did not have to worry that the home ranch would be subject to foreclosure if the loan failed. In a foreclosure action, the bank sought a summary judgment that would also allow it to foreclose on the home ranch for any deficiency judgment existing after the sale of the secured property for which the loan had been made. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had correctly denied the motion on the basis that the Graveleys' defense of equitable estoppel raised questions of fact. State ex rel. Farm Credit Bank of Spokane v. District Court, 267 M 1, 881 P2d 594, 51 St. Rep. 709 (1994).

In an action by the seller against the buyer for the purchase price of a hotel, the buyer should be permitted to present evidence that: (1) he was given false information by the seller's agent in response to inquiries made upon buyer's inspection of the property; and (2) that he was prevented by the seller from further inspection of the premises. Jenkins v. Hillard, 199 M 1, 647 P2d 354, 39 St. Rep. 1156 (1982).

Where a contract is sought to be avoided on the ground that the party bound was induced to enter into it by his opponent's fraudulent representations, the latter is not in a position to invoke the rule that a contract in writing may not be varied by parol testimony to prevent the former from testifying to such representations made during preliminary negotiations. Advance-Rumely Thresher Co. v. Wenholz, 80 M 82, 258 P 1085 (1927).

Court Review of Claim of Fraud Inducing Arbitration Clause Not Fraud Inducing Entry Into Contract Allowed Under Federal Arbitration Act: The appellant alleged that fraud had induced him to enter into an option agreement and margin contract with the respondents. The appellant further stated that he had not read the arbitration clause or the clause that exposed him to unlimited losses. The Supreme Court ruled that since the appellant only alleged fraud in the inducement and did not specifically allege that he had been induced to agree to the arbitration clause, the entire matter, including fraud in the inducement, was subject to arbitration under the Uniform Arbitration Act (Title 27, ch. 5). Larsen v. Opie, 237 M 108, 771 P2d 977, 46 St. Rep. 660 (1989).

Parol Evidence Inadmissible to Show Sham or Fraud: Plaintiff and defendant were in the business of developing oil and gas property. Defendant executed a promissory note in favor of plaintiff and gave plaintiff a "letter agreement" supplementing and clarifying the note. In plaintiff's action on the note, defendant attempted to introduce evidence of a contrary oral agreement that the note was a sham intended to induce third parties to give plaintiff investment funds and that it was never intended that the note be paid. The parol evidence rule prevented introduction of the evidence. In addition, defendant was not entitled to relief under the rule that delivery of an instrument for a special purpose is a defense against one not a holder of the instrument in due course. The sham claim in this case does not constitute a special purpose. Perez-Lizano v. Ayers, 215 M 95, 695 P2d 467, 42 St. Rep. 208 (1985).

Parol Evidence Rule — Constructive Fraud as Within the Exception: Defendant represented plaintiff in a civil action in federal court. The parties agreed that the case was originally handled on a 50% contingency fee basis. The case lasted almost 10 years. Plaintiff signed a formal authorization for defendant to settle. At the time of settlement, plaintiff contended the parties agreed to replace their 50% of net fee agreement with a percentage distribution of the gross settlement amount. At some point in time, the parties signed an agreement in defendant's handwriting providing for a 75%-25% split of the settlement. The agreement contained a clause stating the agreed sums had been paid in full. Plaintiff contended defendant had retained half the settlement. Defendant contended that the trial court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify concerning the agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the fraud exception to the parol evidence rule addresses both actual and constructive fraud. The court stated that constructive fraud often exists where the parties to a transaction have a special confidential or fiduciary relation which affords the power and means to one to take undue advantage of or exercise undue influence over the other. The attorney-client relationship is a fiduciary one. Evidence presented along with plaintiff's testimony established constructive fraud on defendant's part. The court held that plaintiff's claim of conduct against defendant, which constituted at least constructive fraud, fell within the ambit of the fraud exception of the parol evidence rule. Eaton v. Morse, 212 M 233, 687 P2d 1004, 41 St. Rep. 1708 (1984).

Independent Investigation Clause Not to Preclude Justifiable Reliance on Representations: Defendants owned property in Flathead County. Water for the property came from a neighbor's well for which they paid him $8 per month. No written agreement existed concerning the water supply. Defendants listed the property for sale with Tri-City Real Estate. Inserted in the listing contract in the printed space following "water" were the words "community $8/mo." Plaintiffs were interested in the land and looked at it. They asked both defendants and the realtor about the water supply and were told it came from a community well. Plaintiffs wanted written verification of the interest in the water system. The realtor told them he would obtain a copy of the register of the well for them. Plaintiffs continued asking for the register but never received it. Plaintiffs signed a contract for deed to buy the property which had been prepared by the realtor's attorney. The contract contained an "independent investigation" clause, which stated that plaintiffs had investigated the property and entered the contract based upon that investigation and that there were no other agreements or representations concerning the property. The neighbor stopped supplying water, and plaintiffs were forced to dig their own well. They sought recovery from defendants. It was held that defendants were responsible for the negligence of their agents in the sale as related to the community water interest. The Supreme Court held that the "independent investigation" clause did not preclude a holding that the plaintiffs justifiably relied on the representations of the realtor. Parkhill v. Fuselier, 194 M 415, 632 P2d 1132, 38 St. Rep. 1424 (1981), distinguished in Garrison v. Averill, 282 M 508, 938 P2d 702, 54 St. Rep. 454 (1997).

Fraud — Circumstances Leading to Contract: Letters from defendant to plaintiff relating to circumstances leading up to the execution of a promissory note for the purchase of property on a contract are admissible to establish fraud. It is an exception to the parol evidence rule. Flemmer v. Ming, 190 M 403, 621 P2d 1038, 37 St. Rep. 1916 (1980).

Fraud Exceptions: Defendant, who gave a bill of sale to plaintiff for 80 cows, was allowed to testify over a parol evidence objection that his own bill of sale was a sham and a means for providing plaintiff increased borrowing power under Higby v. Hooper, 124 M 331, 221 P2d 1043 (1950), this testimony is not admissible under the fraud exception. Kinjerski v. Lamey, 185 M 111, 604 P2d 782 (1979).

Parol Evidence to Show Fraud or Resolve Ambiguity: Parol evidence is admissible to resolve ambiguities and to determine whether the buyers were fraudulently induced into entering a written contract where seller made express warranties that application for SID had been made when he knew that an application had not been made. Dodds v. Gibson Prod. Co., 181 M 373, 593 P2d 1022 (1979).

Renewal Note: In an action by the payees against the makers for the balance due on a renewal note, where there was fraud and partial failure of consideration and one of the makers testified that he did not know how to figure interest, the makers were not precluded from showing that the contract was different from what the writing showed it to be. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

Illiteracy of Party: Generally in the absence of fraud or mistake where the terms of the contract have been reduced to writing by the parties it must be considered as containing all the terms of the agreement and parol evidence cannot be resorted to, to alter the written contract and usually plaintiff's inability to read does not alter the rule. Ikovich v. Silver Bow Motor Car Co., 117 M 268, 157 P2d 785 (1945).

Conditional Contract: In the absence of fraud, an unconditional written contract of purchase of building material presumably embraced the whole agreement of the parties, and therefore evidence of an oral understanding to the effect that it should not become binding until the architect in charge had approved the materials was inadmissible. Wheeler v. James, 70 M 37, 223 P 900 (1924).

Inducement for Agreement: Where plaintiff alleged mistake and fraud, and the evidence disclosed that the inducement held out to plaintiff to sign an agreement was based on fraudulent representations of defendants that a lease need not be mentioned in a contract of sale of a business and the lease, the evidence was admissible to show the purchase of the lease and defendant's fraudulent conduct, over objection that it varied the contract. Sathre v. Rolfe, 31 M 85, 77 P 431 (1904).

MISCELLANEOUS

Genuine Issue of Material Fact Whether Dam Operation Damaged Lakeshore Properties — Summary Judgment Improper — Class Action Vacated: Flathead Lake landowners brought a class action suit against defendant operators of Kerr Dam for operating outside the scope of their easements in a manner that continuously eroded and damaged plaintiffs' lakeshore properties. The District Court rejected plaintiffs' argument that the dam operator was not allowed to affect plaintiffs' properties above an elevation of 2,893 feet, concluding instead that defendants' easements covered entire parcels. The court concluded that erosion, including wave action erosion, was within the scope of the easements and held that any duty defendants had to not cause unreasonable damage to plaintiffs' properties applied only to damage unrelated to use of the easement. Therefore, summary judgment was granted to defendants, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court first agreed that the District Court's contour line theory was correct. The "2,893 feet" clause did not establish the vertical limit argued by plaintiffs because although the dam operators' right to flood, subirrigate, drain, or otherwise affect the shoreline was not unlimited, it was not restricted to a maximum elevation of 2,893 feet at each parcel, but rather extended to whatever part of each parcel was affected when the lake was held at 2,893 feet above mean sea level as measured at the dam. The court also agreed that the right to cause some erosion was necessary to the enjoyment of the right to perpetually flood, subirrigate, and drain and was thus included by implication in the easements. However, further factual development and trial were necessary to address the question of whether the erosion was reasonable, necessary, and within the scope of the easements, which could not be resolved by summary judgment. Additionally, the question of whether defendants breached their obligation to not cause unreasonable damage to the shoreline properties and to not unreasonably interfere with plaintiffs' enjoyment also required further factual development and possibly trial. Therefore, the order certifying the case as a class action was vacated and the case was remanded for further consideration. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2009 MT 286, 352 M 212, 215 P3d 675 (2009).

On remand, the District Court decertified the class as to one defendant and denied the plaintiffs' motion for certification as to another defendant on the basis that the question of whether the erosion caused unreasonable damage to or unreasonably interfered with the plaintiffs' properties required an individual, property-by-property analysis that was improper for class certification. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that class certification to both defendants was proper because the reasonableness of the erosion presents a common question that is incapable of being resolved on a property-by-property basis since an aggregate of the benefits and burdens imposed on all of the shoreline properties must be considered together to determine reasonableness. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2012 MT 318, 368 Mont. 1, 291 P.3d 1209.

Conscionability Analysis of Contractual Liquidated Damages Clause — Liquidated Damages Clause Presumed Enforceable: To provide direction to contracting parties and resolve the disparities in case law regarding liquidated damages, the Supreme Court adopted a rule to analyze liquidated damages clauses from the perspective of whether or not the clause is unconscionable as indicated by the nature of the bargaining process between the parties. Unconscionability involves a two-pronged determination regarding whether: (1) the clause fits the doctrine of contract of adhesion such that the weaker party had no meaningful choice regarding acceptance of the contract provisions; and (2) the contractual terms are unreasonably favorable to the drafter, which is usually the party with superior bargaining power. Whether the clause is unreasonably favorable to the drafter in turn involves an inquiry into whether the clause is within the reasonable expectations of or unduly oppressive to the weaker party. Liquidated damages clauses are presumed enforceable, and the party seeking to avoid the clause has the burden of proving unconscionability. Unless there are underlying disputed issues of fact, the question of unconscionability is purely a matter of law for the court to decide. Arrowhead School District No. 75 v. Klyap, 2003 MT 294, 318 M 103, 79 P3d 250 (2003), overruling Daugherty Cattle Co. v. Gen. Constr. Co., 254 M 479, 839 P2d 562 (1992), to the extent that it prevented one party from introducing relevant evidence by granting summary judgment based on contract language alone, overruling Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202 (1993), to the extent that it placed the burden on the nonbreaching party to prove the enforceability of a liquidated damages clause, and followed in Am. Music Co. v. Higbee, 2004 MT 349, 324 M 348, 103 P3d 518 (2004), and in Highway Specialties, Inc. v. Mont. Dept. of Transportation, 2009 MT 253, 351 M 527, 215 P3d 667 (2009).

Presumption That Services Provided by Relative Rendered Gratuitously — Compensation for Personal Care Services Provided by Decedent's Daughters Properly Denied: Following their father's death, three daughters presented a claim against the estate for personal care services that they provided to their father. Their claims were disallowed, and the daughters appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. Generally, when services are provided to one person by another and the services are knowingly and voluntarily accepted, the law presumes that the services were provided in expectation of payment. However, a generally acknowledged exception applies when a relative seeks payment for services, and the presumption in those cases is that the services were rendered gratuitously unless there was an express agreement for payment or unless such an agreement can be inferred. In this case, the decedent determined prior to death how he wished his assets to be distributed and, despite several opportunities to do so, made no provision for compensation for the personal services that his daughters provided. The daughters were unable to rebut the general presumption of gratuity, and the Supreme Court declined to disturb the District Court's denial of their claims for services. Application of Parol Evidence Rule to Stranger to Contract — Stranger to Contract Exception Clarified: Habets bought a 7-mile stretch of buried pipeline from Cenex and, upon attempting to recover the pipeline from the ground pursuant to the contract of sale, was refused access to part of the pipeline by the Swansons, who claimed that they had previously purchased a section of the same pipeline from Cenex. Habets brought an action against the Swansons for access to the pipeline, and the Swansons sought to introduce extrinsic parol evidence to show that under their contract with Cenex, which did not show the purchase of the segment of the pipeline in question, they had in fact purchased the segment of the pipeline in question. The District Court excluded the extrinsic parol evidence because of the parol evidence rule, and the Supreme Court affirmed the exclusion of that evidence. The Supreme Court examined the "stranger exception" to the parol evidence rule, which seemed to indicate that extrinsic parol evidence could be introduced by a person not a party to the contract to vary the terms of the contract. The Supreme Court distinguished its previous opinions in Read v. Lewis & Clark County, 55 M 412, 178 P 177 (1919), Greening v. Gazette Printing Co., 108 M 158, 88 P2d 862 (1939), and Fillinger v. NW. Agency, Inc., of Great Falls, 283 M 71, 938 P2d 1347 (1997), raised by the Swansons in support of that exception. The Supreme Court held that the parol evidence rule applies to exclude evidence extrinsic to an unambiguous contract in any situation involving either parties or strangers to the contract when rights and duties created by the contract are the dispositive issue. Habets v. Swanson, 2000 MT 367, 303 M 410, 16 P3d 1035, 57 St. Rep. 1567 (2000).

Coexistence of Instructions on Parol Evidence and Waiver: An instruction prohibiting consideration of parol evidence on what the contract language required for performance may coexist with an instruction and evidence on waiver. Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).

Extrinsic Evidence Unnecessary When Devise Clear: The language of a devise bequeathed property, if any, left in a partnership at the time of testator's demise. The District Court found the partnership to be a conduit through which the partners conducted their tenancy-in-common business and reported income for tax purposes; however, absent any partnership interest in real property, the court determined no property should pass and properly granted summary judgment. Because the testator's intention could be ascertained from the plain language of the devise alone, it was not necessary or proper for the court to receive extrinsic evidence in making its determination. In re Estate of Greenfield, 232 M 357, 757 P2d 1297, 45 St. Rep. 1112 (1988).

Extrinsic Evidence of Ownership of Joint Bank Account Inadmissible When Third-Party Rights Involved: Evidence of the intent of the parties with respect to ownership of funds in a joint bank account is admissible only in a dispute between those parties and not when the dispute involves the rights of a third party. Univ. of Mont. v. Coe, 217 M 234, 704 P2d 1029, 42 St. Rep. 1160 (1985), distinguished in Seman v. Lewis, 252 M 508, 830 P2d 1294, 49 St. Rep. 206 (1992), in which extrinsic evidence regarding intent was held admissible because it was submitted to supplement rather than contradict the uncertain terms of the signature card.

Case Notes

No Modification of Original Construction Agreement: In a construction contract dispute, the general contractor submitted a Subcontract Agreement (Agreement) to the subcontractor 2 weeks after the subcontractor had begun work. The Agreement expanded the scope of the work the subcontractor had agreed to perform without additional compensation. The general contractor argued the Agreement modified any contract with the subcontractor because the subcontractor: (1) orally agreed to the Agreement; (2) submitted a payment application in compliance with the Agreement; and (3) admitted to having signed the Agreement. The Supreme Court concluded no modification occurred. The parties had not fully executed the alleged oral agreement; therefore, it could not operate as a modification. Compliance with the payment process did not rise to the requisite level of assent to modification. Pursuant to 28-2-906, a written contract must be delivered before it becomes effective. Since the subcontractor never returned the Agreement to the general contractor, no modification occurred. AAA Constr. of Missoula, LLC v. Choice Land Corp., 2011 MT 262, 362 Mont. 264, 264 P.3d 709.

Incomplete Instrument: Delivery of an incompleted instrument is ineffective; hence where at the time a lessee signed a receipt for a copy of a lease the instrument was incomplete in that one of the lessors had not signed it, the Court properly found that it was ineffective for failure of delivery, the fact that later in the day the missing signature was appended not changing the result in the absence of evidence that the instrument was delivered thereafter. Nelson v. Davenport, 86 M 1, 281 P 537 (1929).

Lease: A lease, like any other written contract, does not become effective until it is delivered, the mere signing of it not binding the parties; the object of the delivery of such an instrument is to indicate an intent on the part of the grantor to give effect to the instrument, and whether delivery is complete is largely a question of intention. Nelson v. Davenport, 86 M 1, 281 P 537 (1929).

Enforcement of Contracts

Part Case Notes

Party Not Entitled to Arbitration After Termination of Contract: The Whites entered into a construction contract with Longley for the construction of their home. After failing to perform under the terms of the contract, Longley persuaded the Whites to buy him out of the contract for $30,000 and to let him continue to build the home without a contract. Subsequently, Longley failed to build a house that could be occupied or salvaged. Prior to the start of trial, Longley filed a motion to compel arbitration under the terms of the original contract. The Supreme Court held that Longley had taken $30,000 to terminate the parties' ongoing obligations under the contract and therefore there was no legal or factual basis upon which Longley could compel the Whites to arbitrate any dispute. White v. Longley, 2010 MT 254, 358 Mont. 268, 244 P.3d 753.

District Court Enforcement of Settlement Agreement in Pending Case: When a case is pending before a District Court, either party is entitled to make a motion to enforce a settlement agreement as long as the existence and terms of the agreement are not in dispute. Hinderman v. Krivor, 2010 MT 230, 358 Mont. 111, 244 P.3d 306.

Challenge to Contract or to Arbitration Clause — When Arbitration Appropriate: Plaintiffs defaulted on a loan with defendant, and nonjudicial foreclosure proceedings were begun. The loan contract contained an arbitration clause, but plaintiffs challenged the validity of the contract as a whole, not the validity of the arbitration clause. On defendant's motion, the District Court ordered arbitration, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court held that under federal law, when a complaint specifically challenges a contract arbitration clause, the doctrine of severability set out in Prima Paint Corp. v. Flood & Conklin Mfg. Co., 388 US 395 (1967), in conjunction with the Federal Arbitration Act, allows a court to hear the challenge. However, when, as here, a complaint challenges a contract as a whole, Prima Paint and Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna, 546 US 440 (2006), require a court to grant a motion to compel arbitration if the contract contains an arbitration provision. Thus, despite plaintiffs' contention that the contract itself was void ab initio, the District Court was affirmed. Martz v. Beneficial Mont., Inc., 2006 MT 94, 332 M 93, 135 P3d 790 (2006). However, see Thompson v. Lithia Chrysler Jeep Dodge of Great Falls, 2008 MT 175, 343 M 392, 185 P3d 332 (2008), in which a narrow exception to the Martz rule established that when a party challenges a contract containing an arbitration clause on the ground that the parties never entered a contract, the court, not arbitration, is the appropriate forum to decide whether a contract existed, prior to compelling arbitration.

Federal Law Regarding Nonliability for Borrower's Payment of Fees to Lender Upon Loan Rescission Inapplicable to Mortgage Broker Fees: Plaintiff helped defendant secure a loan, which defendant subsequently rescinded within the applicable 3-day period pursuant to the federal Truth in Lending Act. Plaintiff sent defendant a bill for its brokerage fee and out-of-pocket expenses incurred in securing the loan commitment, as provided in the brokerage contract and an attendant promissory note. Defendant refused to pay the bill, and plaintiff brought an action to enforce the contract and promissory note, and the District Court enforced the note and ordered defendant to pay the bill. Defendant appealed on grounds that 16 U.S.C. 1635(b) of the Truth in Lending Act and 12 CFR 226.23, Regulation Z, clearly provide that when a consumer rescinds a transaction, the consumer is not liable for any amount, including any finance charge. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court ruling. Although the federal law protects defendant from paying any fees to the lender, it does not address arrangements between a borrower and a mortgage broker, and in fact, portions of Regulation Z at 12 CFR 226.4(a) expressly exclude appraisal and service fees from the definition of a finance charge. Therefore, even though defendant effectively rescinded that mortgage with the lender, the rescission did not affect or alter defendant's obligation to the mortgage broker pursuant to the brokerage contract and promissory note. Mortgage Source, Inc. v. Strong, 2003 MT 205, 317 M 37, 75 P3d 304 (2003).

Attempted Sale of Parcel in Violation of Contract — Plantiff Allowed to Block Sale: Defendants contracted to purchase several parcels of property from plaintiff. When defendants ended up in default, defendants decided to sell one of the parcels to pay off part of the contract balance. Plaintiff attempted to block the sale, and the District Court confirmed plaintiff's ability to do so under the terms of the contract. Defendants appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A provision of the contract allowed the subsequent sale of the parcels by defendants, but only after the principal balance was paid. Because defendants were in default when the attempted sale was made, sale of the tract was not permitted by the terms of the contract. The District Court did not err in holding that plaintiff had a contractual right to block the sale. Weter v. Archambault, 2002 MT 336, 313 M 284, 61 P3d 771 (2002).

State Remedy and State Court Enforcement of Contract Wages Required by Federal Davis-Bacon Act: The District Court had subject matter jurisdiction of state contract law claims against a contractor and subcontractors by workers hired to build housing on Malmstrom Air Force base under a contract between the contractor and the Air Force. The workers claimed that they were not paid the prevailing wages required by the federal Davis-Bacon Act. The defendants claimed that there was no private right of action and that the workers had not exhausted their federal administrative remedies. The evidence showed that the workers extensively used the administrative remedies, taking all proper steps to attempt to administratively resolve the dispute. The workers were not seeking to enforce the Davis-Bacon Act labor standards; they sought to enforce a contract that includes wages required by the Act, a subtle but important distinction. The Act does not preempt the workers' right to a state enforcement action, using state remedies, under the facts of this case. That right is in keeping with Montana's longstanding policy and constitutional guarantee in Art. II, sec. 16, Mont. Const., of citizens' access to Montana courts when they are aggrieved. As third-party beneficiaries of the contract, the workers have the right to sue in state court to enforce the contract under state law. Favel v. Am. Renovation & Constr. Co., 2002 MT 266, 312 M 285, 59 P3d 412 (2002).

Vehicle Service Contract — Enforcement as Third-Party Beneficiary: When Harman bought an automobile from a dealer, he also bought an extended service contract that was to be administered by MIA. MIA declared itself bankrupt shortly after Harman's purchase. Century, a wholly owned subsidiary of CIGNA, sold an insurance policy to the car dealer to cover repair costs not covered by the agreement between the dealer and MIA. When MIA declared bankruptcy, AAC, another subsidiary of CIGNA, was used to adjust service contracts sold by MIA. Later, Harman made a claim against the service contract when the front axle of his vehicle was damaged. AAC refused the claim, saying that the repair was not covered by the contract. Harman brought a breach of contract action against AAC, but the District Court found that because AAC was not a party to the contract between MIA and Harman, Harman could not sue AAC. Citing Restatement (Second) of Contracts 302 (1981), the Supreme Court held that Harman was the third-party beneficiary of an agreement between AAC and Century for AAC to adjust the claims covered by Century's insurance contract with the dealer. Because Harman was an intended beneficiary, he had a right to seek damages for breach of contract by AAC for its failure to perform its administrative responsibilities in accordance with Harman's rights under the contract. Harman v. MIA Serv. Contracts, 260 M 67, 858 P2d 19, 50 St. Rep. 954 (1993).

Obligation to Make Payments Under Mining Agreement When Escrow Not Established: In a mining agreement with an option to purchase, the covenant to establish escrow was a material part of the contract and a condition precedent to the plaintiff's obligation to make payments. Although the plaintiff knew escrow had not been established, he did not waive the requirement, and the defendant defaulted first when he refused to establish escrow. Therefore, the defendant could not enforce the making of payments. Rogers v. Relyea, 184 M 1, 601 P2d 37 (1979).

Successive Action for Each Missed Payment Under Contract — No Claims Preclusion: The parties entered into a contract whereby the defendant would operate a ski lift on behalf of a housing development in Big Sky for an annual fee. In 2008, the defendant filed a breach of contract claim against the plaintiff and sought payment for operating the ski lift from 2001 to 2002. In 2009, the plaintiff filed an action alleging that the defendant had engaged in wrongful collection efforts, and the defendant counterclaimed for operating costs for three more ski seasons. The plaintiff argued that the defendant's new claims were barred under claims preclusion because the issues in the earlier suit were the same. The District Court granted the defendant summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that each missed payment was for a different time period and therefore the issues were not the same. Lone Moose Meadows, LLC v. Boyne USA, Inc., 2017 MT 142, 387 Mont. 507, 396 P.3d 128.

Lease for Term of Years: Tenants after bringing action against landlords for breach of contract at end of 1957-1958 season could treat each year of the ranch lease contract as a divisible part of the contract where it contained several divisible parts and ran for 4 successive years; each year of the farm operation and each year of the livestock operation was a separate phase to be separately performed and settled. Green v. Wolff, 140 M 413, 372 P2d 427 (1962).

Part 16
Modification of Contracts

Part Case Notes

Reliance on Numerous Extensions of Loan to Receive Another — No Excuse for Nonpayment of Debt — Foreclosure — No Error: The defendant argued that the plaintiff bank waived its right to the mature debt of a loan at the end of a seventh extension period by continuing to give extensions, and the defendant did not pay off the loan because he assumed he would receive another extension. However, the plaintiff waived its rights only for a defined period within the extension agreements, not its right to full, eventual payment. Because the defendant was not promised another extension period and the evidence indicated that the plaintiff informed the defendant the loan would not be extended again, there was no issue of material fact to excuse the defendant's nonpayment of the debt, and the District Court did not err in granting the plaintiff summary judgment to foreclose. Furthermore, the plaintiff was not obligated by the covenant of good faith and fair dealing to extend the loan repayment an eighth time. HSBC Bank USA, N.A. v. Anderson, 2017 MT 257, 389 Mont. 106, 406 P.3d 416.

No Implied Waiver Contract Provision Subject to Waiver or Modification: In an action involving several complex business transactions, the District Court allowed the plaintiffs to present evidence regarding contract formation and waiver to the jury. On appeal, the defendant bank argued that the no waiver provision of the contract applied. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that antiwaiver clauses are like any other clause in a contract, subject to waiver or modification by performance. Masters Group Int'l, Inc. v. Comerica Bank, 2015 MT 192, 380 Mont. 1, 352 P.3d 1101.

Bridle Path Easement — Express Easement by Reservation Versus Implied Easement — Extrinsic Evidence Regarding Parties' Intent Inadmissible: Purchasers in a subdivision had language in their deeds creating an express easement for a bridle path in the subdivision. The bridle path was never built, and over the years, the easement was obstructed by improvements on the lots of several subdivision residents. Eventually, the subdivision association attempted to extinguish the easement at a meeting of the board of directors. Some residents asked the District Court to establish the validity of the easement and to restrain obstruction of the easement, and their request was granted by partial summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted the difference between an implied easement, which is a creature of equity dependent on the intent of the parties, and an express easement by reservation, which is a creature of the documents of conveyance and the record. An express easement by reservation arises when the purchaser's deed refers to the plat where the easement is clearly depicted and labeled. In this case, the intent of the parties to create a bridle path easement was manifested through the language in the deeds and the plat, so under 28-2-905, extrinsic evidence regarding the intent of the parties was inadmissible. Further, the subdivision association was given oversight of the easement, but not ownership of it, and so lacked authority to extinguish the easement. The lower court's finding that a valid bridle path easement existed was affirmed. Pearson v. Virginia City Ranches Ass'n, 2000 MT 12, 298 M 52, 993 P2d 688, 57 St. Rep. 65 (2000), following Missoula v. Mix, 123 M 365, 214 P2d 212 (1950), Bache v. Executed Oral Agreement — Meeting of Minds Required: The parties entered into an agreement for the lease of a truck. The lease agreement contained a noncancellation provision and provided alternative remedies to the lessor in the event of a default. Lessee returned the truck with current payments to lessor prior to the termination date of the lease. Lessor had to make repairs to the truck. Lessee contended the return was a fully executed oral contract to terminate the lease. Lessor contended that termination was dependent on the condition of the truck. There was substantial evidence to support the finding that there was no meeting of the minds and therefore no agreement to terminate the lease. Diede v. Davis, 203 M 205, 661 P2d 838, 40 St. Rep. 394 (1983).

Enforceability of Nonmodification Clause: Parties filed a joint petition for dissolution of marriage in 1979. With their petition they filed a separation and property settlement agreement that included a provision requiring the husband to pay the wife $375 a month until she died or remarried. The agreement contained a nonmodifiability clause. The court found the agreement was not unconscionable and incorporated it into the decree. In 1982, the wife petitioned the District Court to order the husband to appear and show cause why he had not complied with the agreement. The husband cross-petitioned for an order terminating his maintenance obligation. The District Court granted the husband's petition. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded, finding that under 40-4-201(6) the nonmodifiability clause was valid and enforceable regarding maintenance. Bolstad v. Bolstad, 203 M 131, 660 P2d 95, 40 St. Rep. 344 (1983).

Implied Easements — When Found — Effect of Contract: The plaintiffs sold a parcel of land to the defendants after a series of negotiations. No easement was specified through that parcel to the plaintiff's adjoining parcel, and no other access existed to that second parcel. The Supreme Court found no implied easement, noting that the trial court would have been rewriting the contract had it found an implied easement. The trial court cited eight offers and counteroffers regarding an easement in this land sale and noted that there was a final decision between the parties that there would be no easement across the defendants' land. A court may not create as a matter of law an implied easement when the facts indicate the parties did not intend that an easement be created. Implied easements rest upon the intent of the parties gathered from the evidence. The record contained insufficient evidence to support an implied easement but contained substantial evidence to support the trial court's findings, conclusions, and judgment. White v. Landerdahl, 191 M 554, 625 P2d 1145, 38 St. Rep. 412 (1981), distinguished in Pearson v. Virginia City Ranches Ass'n, 2000 MT 12, 298 M 52, 993 P2d 688, 57 St. Rep. 65 (2000), with regard to the applicability of an implied easement, which is a creature of equity dependent on the intent of the parties, versus an expressed easement by reservation, which is a creature of the documents of conveyance and the record.

Case Notes

Employee Handbook — Adoption by Employer After Employee Began Work — Consideration Found in Continuation of Employment — Part of "Bargained" Contract — Gates Distinguished — Remand Unnecessary: After Langager went to work for Crazy Creek Products (CCP), CCP distributed an employee handbook that Langager felt changed the terms of her oral contract regarding earning and using paid vacation days by requiring that she be present to work immediately before and after a paid vacation. At a meeting of CCP employees that was held after distribution of the handbook, CCP supervisors asked if there were any comments from employees concerning the handbook. After Langager went on a 2-week vacation but was refused pay for her vacation weeks because she quit her job and was not at work the shift following her vacation, she filed an action to recover her wages earned while she was on vacation. The Supreme Court held that because Langager remained an employee at CCP after the handbook was distributed, there was sufficient consideration for the change in her contract represented by the handbook and that because employees were asked for their input concerning the handbook, the change in the employment contract represented by the handbook had been "bargained" for. In so holding, the Supreme Court distinguished Gates v. Life of Mont. Ins. Co., 196 M 178, 638 P2d 1063 (1982), in which an employee handbook was adopted many years after some employees commenced employment, was not bargained for, and constituted a unilateral amendment of an employment contract. The Supreme Court also held that since there was general evidence throughout the District Court record that the terms of the handbook were bargained for and that new consideration was given for the change, it was unnecessary, in response to CCP's argument that the District Court substituted its judgment for that of the Board of Personnel Appeals in violation of 2-4-704, to remand the case to the District Court. In re Wage Claim of Langager v. Crazy Creek Products, Inc., 1998 MT 44, 287 M 445, 954 P2d 1169, 55 St. Rep. 169 (1998).

Prior Oral Agreement Extinguished by Doctrine of Merger: The plaintiff, Eiselein, argued that the lower court had erred in granting the bank's motion for summary judgment. The lower court ruled that even if the bank had made an oral promise to lend Eiselein $150,000, that agreement was extinguished by a subsequent written agreement under which the bank lent the plaintiff only $35,000. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's decision on the basis that even if there had been a prior oral agreement, the subsequent writing between the parties would extinguish the oral agreement pursuant to the doctrine of merger. Eiselein v. Mont. Bank of Roundup, 250 M 71, 818 P2d 365, 48 St. Rep. 826 (1991).

Alteration of Oral Contract — Rescission — Damages: Plaintiffs had an oral agreement with defendants to pay one-half of defendants' purchase price under defendants' written contract for deed for purchase of certain real property with the understanding that plaintiffs' names would be added to the title as copurchasers. Without plaintiffs' consent, defendants made written assignment of their interests under the written contract to a third party, retaining a life estate to themselves. Plaintiffs refused to make further payments and sued for damages and to quiet title in themselves. The District Court denied plaintiffs' claims and in effect found plaintiffs to be the breaching party. The Supreme Court found plaintiffs were entitled to rescission and reversed the District Court decision. Defendants' assignment while retaining a life estate constituted a material alteration of the oral agreement to which plaintiffs had not consented. Defendants' breach entitled plaintiffs to recover money they had paid on the contract with interest. Forsythe v. Elkins, 216 M 108, 700 P2d 596, 42 St. Rep. 680 (1985).

Employee Handbook — Not Modification of Employment Contract: Gates was discharged from her employment by Life of Montana, which did not follow its employee handbook in discharging her. The court found that the handbook was not distributed until 2 years after Gates was hired. It constituted a unilateral statement of company policies and procedures. Its terms were not bargained for, and there was no meeting of the minds. The employee handbook was not part of Gates' employment contract at the time she was hired, nor could it have been a modification to her contract because there was no new and independent consideration for its terms. Gates v. Life of Mont., 196 M 178, 638 P2d 1063, 39 St. Rep. 16 (1982), distinguished in In re Wage Claim of Langager v. Substantial Evidence to Support Award of Damages: In an action by the plaintiff contractor to foreclose a construction lien against the defendant homeowners, the District Court awarded contract damages to the plaintiff for $8,317 in contractor's fees, work completed, and materials used. The defendants appealed, arguing the District Court awarded damages to the plaintiff in error. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the parties had formed an enforceable contract with sufficient consideration between them, even though the contract consisted of a written construction estimate from the plaintiff that did not include some important terms. The Supreme Court found there was sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to its contractor fee for driveway work, based on an oral modification to the agreement and the defendants' payment of contractor fees for other work, and found there was also sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to additional money related to labor and materials supplied for masonry and stonework. Vintage Constr., Inc., v. Feighner, 2017 MT 109, 387 Mont. 354, 394 P.3d 179.

No Duty to Recover Funds Under Contract — No Breach of Contract or Covenant of Good Faith and Fair Dealing — Statute of Limitations for Equitable Relief Expired: The plaintiff contracted with Bancard Services, Inc. (Bancard), one of the defendants, for Bancard to provide processing services to the plaintiff's ATMs located throughout Montana. Bancard subcontracted with a third-party payment processor to assist in processing transactions, and an agent of the third party made a data entry error that transferred $285,000 of the plaintiff's funds to an out-of-state individual, Leland Ruzicka, and B&B Lounge (collectively Ruzicka), also defendants in the case. Bancard was able to recover all but $35,000 of the plaintiff's funds. Eventually, the plaintiff sued both Bancard and Ruzicka for the outstanding $35,000. The plaintiff also filed several contractual related claims against Bancard. The District Court granted summary judgment to the defendants because Bancard did not have an obligation to recover the funds under the parties' contract and because the statute of limitations had expired on the unjust enrichment claims against Ruzicka. Grizzly Sec. Armored Express, Inc. v. Bancard Serv., LLC, 2016 MT 287, 385 Mont. 307, 384 P.3d 68.

Acquiescence in Contract Modification Precluding Assertion of Damages From Breach of Original Contract — Proof of Waiver: A party that acquiesces to the modification of a contract may be estopped from asserting damages arising from breach of the original contract. Waiver of contract provisions may be proved by express declarations or by a course of acts and conduct that induce the belief that the intention or purpose was to waive. In the present case, the District Court did not err in finding that the parties agreed to a modification in the terms of a road building contract and that the contractor was not in breach of the original contract by building the road to the specifications of the modification. DeNiro v. Gasvoda, 1999 MT 129, 294 M 478, 982 P2d 1002, 56 St. Rep. 521 (1999), following Hellickson v. Barrett Mobile Home Transp., Inc., 161 M 455, 507 P2d 523 (1973), Mathis v. Daines, 196 M 252, 639 P2d 503, 39 St. Rep. 73 (1982), and Lemley v. Allen, 203 M 37, 659 P2d 262, 40 St. Rep. 279 (1983). See also Lewistown Miller Constr. Co., Inc. v. Martin, 2011 MT 325, 363 Mont. 208, 271 P.3d 48.

Lease — Effective Date of Oral Modification: Lessor and lessee orally agreed to modify written lease to expand the space leased and raise the rent from $150 to $220 a month. The oral agreement was executed and in force when lessee started using the additional space and began paying the additional rent. Lemley v. Allen, 203 M 37, 659 P2d 262, 40 St. Rep. 279 (1983), followed in Eagle Watch Inv., Inc. v. Smith, 278 M 187, 924 P2d 257, 53 St. Rep. 757 (1996), and DeNiro v. Gasvoda, 1999 MT 129, 294 M 478, 982 P2d 1002, 56 St. Rep. 521 (1999).

Modification of Lease: A written lease may be modified by executed verbal agreements such as increases in the rental payment and expansion of the leased premises. Kosena v. Eck, 195 M 12, 635 P2d 1287, 38 St. Rep. 1736 (1981), followed in Eagle Watch Inv., Inc. v. Smith, 278 M 187, 924 P2d 257, 53 St. Rep. 757 (1996).

Waiver of Contract Requirement:

Buyer and seller of real estate could orally alter agreement to sell and purchase, thus waiving condition in the instrument that it would be void if contract for deed was not executed within 10 days. Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965).

Where a building contract required that all changes in building plans by the owner were to be in writing and owner later made oral changes in the plans, the requirement of writing was deemed waived by the court. Gramm v. Ins. Unlimited, 141 M 456, 378 P2d 662 (1963).

A requirement of written notice may be waived by parol, and a waiver of notice may be express or may be inferred from the conduct of the parties. Flint v. Mincoff, 137 M 549, 353 P2d 340 (1960).

Oral Termination: A written lease for term of years may be terminated by an oral agreement provided the conduct of the parties is consistent with such an agreement. Rodgers v. Saunders, 144 M 424, 396 P2d 817 (1964).

Acceleration Agreement: Plaintiff, subcontractor, a bridge construction specialist, under road construction project, was entitled to part of acceleration payment under prime contract pursuant to agreement, where written contract was orally modified to provide for acceleration of certain items of work by plaintiff and for payment of additional sums to him; there was consideration for the modification, and such work was performed by plaintiff. Dalakow v. Geery, 132 M 457, 318 P2d 253 (1957), distinguished in Total Indus. Plant Serv., Inc. v. Turner Indus. Group, LLC, 2013 MT 5, 368 Mont. 189, 294 P.3d 363.

When Oral Agreement Fully Executed:

The date when an oral agreement takes effect as altering a written contract within the meaning of this section is the date when it is executed. Griffiths v. Thrasher, 95 M 210, 26 P2d 995 (1955).

Where the maturity of promissory notes had been extended 2 years by an executed oral agreement, to wit, by payment of $1,000 in consideration of such extension, immediately upon payment of the consideration the agreement became fully executed and effective to modify the written contract of the parties under this section. Griffiths v. Thrasher, 95 M 210, 26 P2d 995 (1933).

Extension — Consent: Where the lessor of oil and gas lands, before default by the lessee, orally agreed to an extension of the time within which the latter was required to make payment under the contract, and the lessee remained in possession of and exercised dominion over the property thereafter with the consent of the lessor, the written contract became modified by an executed oral agreement. Griffith v. Cedar Creek Oil & Gas Co., 91 M 553, 8 P2d 1071 (1932).

Complete, Not Partial, Execution of Oral Agreement Necessary:

A contract to sell land is an "executory contract" until the conveyance is made. Bauer v. Monroe, 117 M 306, 158 P2d 485 (1945).

An "executed contract" is one where nothing remains to be done by either party, while an "executory contract" is one in which a party binds himself to do or not to do a particular thing in the future. Bauer v. Monroe, 117 M 306, 158 P2d 485 (1945).

An oral agreement altering a written agreement is not an "executed oral agreement" within statute authorizing modification of a written contract by an executed oral agreement unless its terms have been fully performed, and performance on one side is not sufficient. Ikovich v. Silver Bow Motor Co., 117 M 268, 157 P2d 785 (1945).

To bring about a modification or alteration of a written contract by an executed oral agreement under this section or to make parol evidence of such modification admissible there must have been a complete, not partial, execution of the obligations of both parties. Cont. Oil Co. v. Bell, 94 M 123, 21 P2d 65 (1933).

Extension of Due Date by Executed Oral Agreement — Authority of Agent to Agree to Extension Need Not Be in Writing: Where the due dates of chattel mortgage notes were extended 2 years by oral agreement between the maker and the agent of the payee, which agreement was at once fully executed by payment of a consideration for the extension, it was not necessary that the authority of the agent to act should have been in writing; the oral agreement having been fully executed, it was valid though not in writing (this section) and therefore the authority of the agent was likewise not to be required to be in writing. Griffiths v. Thrasher, 95 M 210, 26 P2d 995 (1933).

Abrogation — Subsequent Agreement: The parties to an agreement may abrogate it by a subsequent one, and therefore may in a deed agree that it shall run to the purchaser "and wife" though in a bond for the deed it was provided that it should run to the purchaser alone. Humble v. St. John, 72 M 519, 234 P 475 (1925).

ORAL MODIFICATION INEFFECTIVE

No Modification of Original Construction Agreement: In a construction contract dispute, the general contractor submitted a Subcontract Agreement (Agreement) to the subcontractor 2 weeks after the subcontractor had begun work. The Agreement expanded the scope of the work the subcontractor had agreed to perform without additional compensation. The general contractor argued the Agreement modified any contract with the subcontractor because the subcontractor: (1) orally agreed to the Agreement; (2) submitted a payment application in compliance with the Agreement; and (3) admitted to having signed the Agreement. The Supreme Court concluded no modification occurred. The parties had not fully executed the alleged oral agreement; therefore, it could not operate as a modification. Compliance with the payment process did not rise to the requisite level of assent to modification. Pursuant to 28-2-906, a written contract must be delivered before it becomes effective. Since the subcontractor never returned the Agreement to the general contractor, no modification occurred. AAA Constr. of Missoula, LLC v. Choice Land Corp., 2011 MT 262, 362 Mont. 264, 264 P.3d 709.

Landowner Subdivision Rights Precluded by Restrictive Covenants — No Oral Contract Without Consideration — Statute of Frauds Applied: Plaintiffs subdivided about 80 acres into a 40-acre water ski lake and five residential lots. Restrictive covenants provided that no more than six landowners would be allowed to use the lake, that five landowners would be owners of lots in the subdivision, and that one landowner would be the owner of a single family dwelling built on property immediately west of the lake. Plaintiffs initially intended to build on the west side of the lake and become the sixth landowner but changed their minds, sold the west side property, and decided to build on the south side instead. Four of the five landowners filed an affidavit that when they purchased their lots, they understood that plaintiffs would be the sixth landowner and that they had orally approved the relocation of plaintiffs' residence to the south shore. After plaintiffs' home was built on the south side, they sought a declaratory judgment that they were the sixth landowner under the restrictive covenants and thus had the right to use the lake. One dissenting landowner opposed the declaratory judgment and moved for summary judgment on grounds that the restrictive covenants prohibited plaintiffs from use of the lake. The District Court agreed and granted summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that there was no evidence of consideration given to the landowners for modification of the covenants and that as a result, the modification benefited plaintiffs only. The right to use the lake ran with the land and was therefore a real property interest, and under the statute of frauds, any transfer of the right from one parcel to another had to be in writing or altered by an executed oral agreement. However, without consideration, there could be no oral contract, and without an oral contract, there could be no executed oral contract. Plaintiffs' argument that because they relied on oral agreements, equitable estoppel should prohibit defendants from denying plaintiffs' use of the lake also failed because equitable estoppel does not apply under the statute of frauds except when the statute would operate to perpetuate a fraud. The District Court was affirmed. Hanson v. Water Ski Mania Estates, 2005 MT 47, 326 M 154, 108 P3d 481 (2005).

Contract With Dispute Resolution Clause Not Superseded by Unexecuted Oral Agreement: Nelcon made an agreement with the state for highway construction work, and Nelcon subcontracted the clearing of trees to Westfork, agreeing that Westfork could have the timber that was removed from the property. After discovering that the timber belonged to Champion and had been removed, Westfork wrote Nelcon, requiring additional payment for the missing trees. Nelcon provided notice to the state that Nelcon needed additional compensation for the missing trees and was paid approximately $20,000, which Nelcon paid to Westfork. Westfork brought an action against Nelcon for additional compensation, and the District Court granted a directed verdict for Nelcon. Citing Kraft v. Hodson, 254 M 262, 836 P2d 1234 (1992), the Supreme Court held that there was no executed oral modification of the original contract. The Supreme Court also held that the language of the original contract was clear in its meaning, binding Westfork to the same rights against Nelcon that Nelcon had against the state. Westfork Constr. Co. v. Nelcon, Inc., 265 M 398, 877 P2d 481, 51 St. Rep. 553 (1994), followed, with regard to lack of court authority to insert or delete contract provisions in an unambiguous contract, in Topco, Inc. v. St., 275 M 352, 912 P2d 805, 53 St. Rep. 175 (1996), and distinguished in Lewistown Miller Constr. Co., Inc. v. Martin, 2011 MT 325, 363 Mont. 208, 271 P.3d 48.

Reliance on Statute of Frauds Not Perpetuation of Fraud Against Broker: Kraft, a broker, alleged that the seller, Hodson, had orally modified their listing agreement in a manner allowing Kraft to negotiate with the ultimate buyer of the property, thereby entitling Kraft to a commission. The Supreme Court held that any modification to the contract had to be in writing or else the statute of frauds would be rendered a nullity. Kraft v. Hodson, 254 M 262, 836 P2d 1234, 49 St. Rep. 792 (1992), followed in WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995).

Breach of Verbal Agreement — Proof of Performance and Damages Required: Defendants claimed that their bank breached its verbal agreement to reamortize loan payments, which led to defendants' inability to repay the loan and eventual foreclosure. In order for defendants to prevail, they had to prove that they would have been in a position to perform their part of such an agreement and that they were damaged by the bank's refusal to reamortize their loan. However, evidence showed that reamortization would have resulted in payments higher rather than lower than the original loan payments, which defendants were unable to repay. Absent evidence of the ability to make further payments if allowed to reamortize, defendants sustained no damage by the bank's refusal to do so. Fed. Land Bank of Spokane v. Snider, 247 M 508, 808 P2d 475, 48 St. Rep. 285 (1991).

Oral Profit-Sharing Agreement Not Executed: Winkel filed a complaint arising out of an employment contract. Vranish argued that Winkel was not entitled to any profit-sharing bonus because the original written employment contract did not provide for a profit-sharing bonus. A contract in writing may be altered by a contract or by an executed oral agreement and not otherwise. An oral agreement altering a written agreement is not an executed oral agreement within this section unless its terms have been fully performed; performance on one side is not sufficient. The testimony reveals that the oral agreement concerning the profit-sharing bonus was never performed; thus the oral agreement was not executed. Winkel v. Family Health Care, 205 M 40, 668 P2d 208, 40 St. Rep. 1083 (1983), distinguished in Lewistown Miller Constr. Co., Inc. v. Martin, 2011 MT 325, 363 Mont. 208, 271 P.3d 48.

Alteration by Subsequent Oral Executed Agreement: Terms of written contract may be waived or modified by independent oral agreements between the parties that are subsequently executed. However, where electrical contractor submitted claim for extra material and services performed without written request of owner and owner refused to pay, owner could not be said to have waived any terms of original contract since no evidence was produced to indicate that he relinquished his right to object. Mathis v. Daines, 196 M 252, 639 P2d 503, 39 St. Rep. 73 (1982), followed in DeNiro v. Gasvoda, 1999 MT 129, 294 M 478, 982 P2d 1002, 56 St. Rep. 521 (1999). See also Lewistown Miller Constr. Co., Inc. v. Martin, 2011 MT 325, 363 Mont. 208, 271 P.3d 48.

Oral Modification of Contract for Deed: Under this section, a written contract for deed could not be properly modified by an oral agreement to offset against payments due under the contract certain rents due buyer from sellers. Hares v. Nelson, 195 M 463, 637 P2d 19, 38 St. Rep. 2036 (1981).

Effect of Oral Agreement on Written Agreement — Contract for Deed: In this case concerning a contract for deed, one issue on appeal was the effect of an oral agreement on written instruments that followed. The Supreme Court held that it was clear that the written instruments superseded the oral agreement. Stoddard v. Grokin, 191 M 495, 625 P2d 529, 38 St. Rep. 326 (1981), followed in Nimmick v. Hart, 248 M 1, 808 P2d 481, 48 St. Rep. 293 (1991).

Oral Modification of Written Property Settlement — Effect on Debts: An alleged oral modification of a written property settlement agreement could not have the effect of altering a written agreement to repay a loan made to spouses prior to divorce. Thus payment by one obligor (purportedly in the form of a loan to the obligee) of part of the balance was considered as a discharge of the other obligor's obligation to pay that portion. Davidson v. Lewis, 177 M 55, 579 P2d 762 (1978).

Modification of Listing Agreement and Failure to Provide Copy: A seller's alleged verbal consent to a broker's unsubscribed and unexecuted modification of a listing agreement was not a factual issue precluding summary judgment in light of the statutory and decisional law which is uniformly suspicious of such modifications. As a matter of law, the broker's failure to provide the seller with a copy of the listing agreement also supported the granting of summary judgment. Carnell v. Watson, 176 M 344, 578 P2d 308 (1978). See also WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995).

Partial Execution: Alleged oral agreement to pay director commission for procuring purchaser for corporation's realty and personalty was not an "executed oral agreement" within this section since there was no performance by corporation and director's performance was consistent with performance of his duties as an officer-director and not necessarily pursuant to contract. Hart v. Billings Pub. Stockyards, 157 M 345, 486 P2d 120 (1971).

Contract for Deed: Where a formal written contract for deed had been entered into, an alleged oral agreement of the vendor to give the purchaser a deed if he would, among other things, give the vendor a home, was an "executory contract" and was ineffectual to alter the written contract. Bauer v. Monroe, 117 M 306, 158 P2d 485 (1945).

Unexecuted Oral Agreement:

"A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise" (this section), and since the contract pleaded rested in parol and appears to have been unexecuted, it is impotent and constituted no defense. Olsen v. Zappone, 83 M 573, 273 P 635 (1929); Swan v. Le Clair, 77 M 422, 251 P 155 (1926).

An unexecuted oral agreement, the effect of which was to alter the terms of a promissory note by extending the time of payment and changing the amount due, constituted no defense under this section to the enforcement of the note, and evidence tending to prove the agreement was improperly admitted. Lish v. Martin, 55 M 582, 179 P 826 (1919). See also Morrow v. Bank of America, N.A., 2014 MT 117, 375 Mont. 38, 324 P.3d 1167.

A note and chattel mortgage given to secure it are not affected by an unexecuted oral agreement in respect to the time and manner of payment. Kinsman v. Stanhope, 50 M 41, 144 P 1083 (1914).

Sublease of Mining Claim: A subsequent oral agreement between the parties to a written sublease of a mining claim, that in case the sublessors should buy the property the lease would be extended, was void, being a mere executory agreement without consideration. Armington v. Stelle, 27 M 13, 69 P 115 (1902).

PAROL EVIDENCE ADMISSIBLE

Parol Evidence of Circumstances Under Which Bid Prepared Proper in Interpreting Uncertain Contract Provisions: Bid estimates on a road building project contained vague and ambiguous project requirements, and testimony at trial regarding the height of the finished road was conflicting. Thus, the District Court, in interpreting provisions of the contract that appeared ambiguous or uncertain, properly considered parol evidence of the circumstances under which the bid was prepared. The court found more credible the contractor's testimony that there was not agreement that a subroad would be constructed of pit run gravel 6 inches above field grade, and that determination was affirmed on appeal. DeNiro v. Gasvoda, 1999 MT 129, 294 M 478, 982 P2d 1002, 56 St. Rep. 521 (1999).

Construction Contract — Breach of Contract: Haines Pipeline Construction, Inc., contracted to build a pipeline for Montana Power Company (MPC). Performance was secured by an irrevocable letter of credit. The project ran into regulatory problems, and a settlement agreement was signed between the parties. The parties entered a second contract for miscellaneous repair work on the completed portion of the pipeline, including repair of buried pipeline. Haines extended the letter of credit at the request of MPC, and MPC subsequently drew upon the letter of credit. Haines sued to recover damages against MPC for breach of the construction contract. The District Court found that MPC had accepted Haines' work, that MPC had no authority to draw upon the letter of credit, and that presentment of the letter of credit constituted a breach of the construction contract. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in admitting parol evidence of the alteration or modification of the contract by performance and oral agreement of the parties and that the District Court's finding was supported by substantial evidence and was not clearly erroneous. Haines Pipeline Constr., Inc. v. Mont. Power Co., 251 M 422, 830 P2d 1230, 48 St. Rep. 1102 (1991).

Estoppel: Evidence of telephone conversations tending to show acquiescence to agreement to repurchase shares of stock pursuant to corporate officer's previously executed stock repurchase agreement was admissible to show that seller had waived benefit of or become estopped to assert his rights under some or all provisions in his favor in the agreement where conversations were not introduced to vary terms of the contract but to demonstrate that the tender and acceptance had in fact been made. State ex rel. Howeth v. D. A. Davidson & Co., 163 M 355, 517 P2d 722 (1973), overruled, with regard to elements of collateral estoppel, in Dagel v. Great Falls, 250 M 224, 819 P2d 186, 48 St. Rep. 919 (1991).

Parol Evidence of an Executed Oral Agreement:

A written contract may be altered or modified by an executed oral agreement as provided by this section, and parol evidence of alteration or modification may be heard. Jenson v. Olson, 144 M 224, 395 P2d 465 (1964).

Since under this section a written agreement may be modified by an executed oral one where parties had executed a portion of their engagement and then committed the remainder to writing, parol evidence of the part which had been executed was admissible. Webber v. Killorn, 66 M 130, 212 P 852 (1923).

Exception to Establish Fraud: In an action by the payees against the makers for the balance due on a renewal note, where there was fraud and partial failure of consideration and one of the makers testified that he did not know how to figure interest, the makers were not precluded from showing that the contract was different from what the writing showed it to be. Jensen v. Franklin, 135 M 341, 340 P2d 832 (1959).

PAROL EVIDENCE INADMISSIBLE

Modification of Nonexistent Contract Impossible — Minutes of Preconstruction Meeting Inadmissible Extrinsic Evidence Absent Ambiguity in Subsequent Contract: Keeney Construction (Keeney) subcontracted to perform certain construction work for James Talcott Construction Co., Inc. (Talcott). The subcontract stated that time was of the essence, but contained no specific date of completion, Rather, Keeney was to complete the work as directed by Talcott and on Talcott's completion schedule. Keeney asserted that the parties intended a 1996 completion date, but the project was not finished until 1997. Keeney sued for damages for delay and extra work, contending that extrinsic evidence in the form of minutes from a preconstruction meeting, held 2 days before the contract was finalized, would verify the parties' intent and represented an executed oral agreement that modified the written contract. The Supreme Court found no ambiguity in the written contract to warrant further examination of the intent of the parties. Because the intent of the contract was clear, the extrinsic evidence was inadmissible to support the contention that a specific completion date was intended. Keeney could not assert a claim for damages based on Talcott's direction of the timing of the completion of the project when the contract authorized Talcott to do so. Further, because an oral agreement cannot modify a contract that does not yet exist, the meeting and conversations held prior to the contract signing could not be interpreted as a modification of the subsequent written contract. Keeney Constr. v. James Talcott Constr. Co., Inc., 2002 MT 69, 309 M 226, 45 P3d 19 (2002).

Oral Testimony Inadmissible: Trial Court could have excluded evidence relating to a joint venture, 135 M 188, 338 P2d 1037 (1959).

Parol Evidence Inadmissible to Vary Written Contract:

Parol evidence which tended to vary or alter the terms of a written chattel mortgage will be disregarded, where the chattel mortgage was plain and unambiguous and needed no construction. First Nat'l Bank of Plains v. Green Mtn. Soil Conserv. Dist., 130 M 1, 293 P2d 289 (1956).

The statutory rule that a contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing or by an executed oral agreement and not otherwise is not a rule of evidence but a rule of substantive law. Bauer v. Monroe, 117 M 306, 158 P2d 485 (1945).

Parol testimony of an oral unexecuted agreement by the tenant holding under a written lease that he would surrender the lease and vacate the premises as soon as the landlord could procure a new tenant was inadmissible under this section. Quong v. McEvoy, 70 M 99, 224 P 266 (1924).

Admission of parol evidence to vary and contradict the terms of a written contract is error. Prichett v. Jenkins, 52 M 81, 155 P 974 (1916).

Waiver of Written Option: Where there was a written contract of lease with option to purchase, a waiver of such option could not be shown by oral testimony that lessee prior to time for exercising option made statements that he did not intend to purchase the property if he could get certain other property he was interested in. Fiers v. Jacobson, 123 M 242, 211 P2d 968 (1949).

Extension of Time for Payment: Where escrow agreement in connection with sale of land required $700 to be paid by a certain date, oral evidence could not be received to show that there had been an extension of time. Herman v. Herman, 123 M 39, 207 P2d 1155 (1949).

Rescission by Mutual Consent Not Such "Alteration" as Contemplated by This Section: Where evidence did not indicate an "alteration" of written contract for clearing of land after partial performance, except by rescission, the contention that evidence that parties mutually agreed to rescind written contract was inadmissible on ground that under this section contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing or by an executed oral agreement and not otherwise, while a novel argument, cannot prevail, since in Montana, under 28-2-1711, rescission of a contract may be had by mutual consent. Barnard-Curtiss Co. v. Maehl, 117 F2d 7 (9th Cir. 1941).

Executed Oral Agreement to Be Pleaded: Where plaintiff in an action on a written contract relies upon an alteration thereof by a subsequent executed oral agreement, he must plead it; in the absence of such a pleading, testimony of the alteration is inadmissible. Hunt v. S Y Cattle Co., 75 M 594, 244 P 480 (1926).

GENERAL

No Implied Waiver Contract Provision Subject to Waiver or Modification: In an action involving several complex business transactions, the District Court allowed the plaintiffs to present evidence regarding contract formation and waiver to the jury. On appeal, the defendant bank argued that the no waiver provision of the contract applied. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that antiwaiver clauses are like any other clause in a contract, subject to waiver or modification by performance. Masters Group Int'l, Inc. v. Comerica Bank, 2015 MT 192, 380 Mont. 1, 352 P.3d 1101.

Statement of Present Intent to Perform or Not Perform Not Considered Contract — Lease Not Altered by Gratuitous Promise: Defendants had a 99-year lease on a ranch owned by Earl. The lease provided that in case of need, it was subject to recall on demand by Earl. When Earl had to be placed in a nursing home without the assets to bear her expenses and needed to liquidate the property in order to qualify for federal benefits, defendants were notified that the lease was being terminated. Defendants objected, citing a letter from Earl purporting to gift to them all interest in the ranch. However, to be a gift, a transfer of property must be irrevocable, complete, without adequate or full consideration, and unmistakably intended to divest the donor of title, dominion, and control over the property. The District Court concluded that sufficient need existed to terminate the lease and denied defendants' motion to resolve any effect that the letter had on the original lease. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the letter was a mere statement by Earl of present intent to perform or not perform an act in the future and that such a gratuitous promise did not constitute a valid written modification of the original lease. Earl v. Beager, 2001 MT 44, 304 M 258, 20 P3d 788 (2001).

Acceptance of One Asphalt Test Sample Insufficient Proof of Waiver of Right to Apply Contract Specifications: Respondent submitted a bid on a highway construction project and contracted with the state to provide polymer modified asphalt cement (PMAC) according to specifications in the state contract, including satisfaction of the ring-and-ball softening point test. The contract required that asphalt samples be taken at the project site, with each sample representing an asphalt lot. Those samples began to fail the ring-and-ball softening point test almost immediately, so according to the contract terms, reductions were made in payments to respondent to make up for the shorter life expectancy and inferior quality of the asphalt. Respondent disputed the payment reductions on the basis that the state had improperly heated the project test samples to a pouring temperature of 330 degrees F rather than 340 degrees F used during the mix design testing, causing the project samples to fail the test. Citing Kelly v. Lovejoy, 172 M 516, 565 P2d 321 (1977), the District Court held that the state had waived the temperature requirements when it accepted the mix design sample at 340 degrees F and had therefore erroneously assessed price reductions for the samples tested at 330 degrees F. The Supreme Court noted that for the state to waive the right to enforce the contract, the acquiescence must be voluntary and intentional. By accepting one PMAC at 340 degrees F, unlike in Kelly, the state did not voluntarily and intentionally relinquish its right to enforce the contract specifications. Relinquishment may be proved either by express declaration or by a course of acts and conduct so as to induce the belief that the state's intention and purpose were to waive its rights. Evidence failed to show that the one-time acceptance was an intentional relinquishment of the right to enforce the contract specifications, nor was the one-time acceptance a course of conduct sufficient to induce the belief that the state's intention and purpose were to waive the temperature requirement mandated by the ring-and-ball softening point test. The District Court's finding of waiver was incorrect as a matter of law, constituting reversible error. Respondent's claims for breach of contract, fraud, and negligent misrepresentation and a motion for summary judgment were properly denied. Idaho Asphalt Supply v. St., 1999 MT 291, 297 M 66, 991 P2d 434, 56 St. Rep. 1168 (1999).

Question of Whether Contract Was Orally Modified Sufficient to Preclude Summary Judgment: For an oral contract to effectively alter the terms of a written contract, the oral agreement must be fully executed on both sides of the agreement. Whether Bernhard and his attorney agreed to permit Doble to continue logging Bernhard's property until all harvestable timber was removed, thereby agreeing to effectively extend the terms of the logging contract, was a question of material fact that precluded an award of summary judgment in Bernhard's favor. Doble v. Bernhard, 1998 MT 124, 289 M 80, 959 P2d 488, 55 St. Rep. 489 (1998).

Court Error in Modifying Clearing and Grubbing Contract: The District Court erred in: (1) substituting the subcontract price for the contract price in enforcing a highway clearing and grubbing contract that was assigned to the subcontractor; (2) awarding damages at the subcontract price rather than the contract price; (3) admitting testimony concerning custom and usage when the contract explicitly excluded its consideration in determining the area for which Topco was to be paid for clearing and grubbing; (4) determining the acreage measurement using horizontal distance rather than slope distance; and (5) failing to award the subcontractor compensation for acres cleared but not paid for. Topco, Inc. v. St., 275 M 352, 912 P2d 805, 53 St. Rep. 175 (1996).

Rights Under Written Contract Not Obliterated by Implied Obligation — Nonrenewal of Term Contract: Farris was hired under a term contract that lasted 1 year. The contract provided for nonrenewal with adequate notice. After signing term contracts for 3 consecutive years, Farris was notified that employment would be discontinued. Farris sought to invoke the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, contending that the employer's oral negotiations implied permanent employment and objective manifestations of job security. However, consideration of the oral negotiations was barred by the parol evidence rule of 28-2-904, under which oral stipulations are superseded by a written contract. Consideration of representations of permanent employment made after the contract was signed was barred by this section, which allows only written or executed oral agreement to affect the validity of a written contract. The Supreme Court cited Carma Developers v. Marathon Dev. Calif., Inc., 826 P2d 710 (Calif. 1992), for the proposition that no obligation can be implied that would result in the obliteration of a right expressly given under a written contract. In interpreting a contract, an implication should not be made when the contrary is indicated in clear and express words. Farris v. Hutchinson, 254 M 334, 838 P2d 374, 49 St. Rep. 717 (1992), distinguishing at-will dismissal under a written contract in Stark v. Circle K Corp., 230 M 468, 751 P2d 162 (1988), and Prout v. Sears, Roebuck & Co., 236 M 152, 772 P2d 288 (1989), and followed in Talley v. Flathead Valley Community College, 259 M 479, 857 P2d 701, 50 St. Rep. 889 (1993).

Elements Necessary to Show Waiver of Contractual Right of Nonwaiver: In determining if nonwaiver provisions of a contract should not be applied, not only must the evidence show a course of conduct by which one party waived the contractual obligations of the other party, but additionally the evidence should show that the same party also waived any right to rely on the nonwaiver provisions of his contract. Because waiver is a known and voluntary relinquishment of a known right, those elements of waiver at least have to appear from the evidence before it can be held that the contractual right of nonwaiver has been waived. Trustees of the Wash.-Idaho-Mont. Carpenters-Employers Retirement Trust Fund v. Galleria Partnership, 239 M 250, 780 P2d 608, 46 St. Rep. 1661 (1989).

Oral Waiver of Contract Requirements — Substantial Evidence to Support Jury Verdict: When the defendants failed to make four monthly payments on a contract for deed for the sale of a motel, the sellers sued to recover possession of the motel. The defendants counterclaimed for the payments they had made on the motel and for punitive damages on the grounds of "fraudulent malicious acts", contending that the sellers had orally waived the four monthly payments and ignored the notice provisions of the contract. The jury awarded a verdict of over $67,000 in favor of the defendants as actual damages and no punitive damages. The sellers appealed, alleging that the lower court erred by incorrectly stating the law in its jury instructions. The Supreme Court affirmed and held that the defendant's testimony regarding the sellers' alleged express waiver of the four payments is sufficient proof of the fact and sufficient evidence to support the jury verdict. Thiel v. Johnson, 219 M 271, 711 P2d 829, 42 St. Rep. 2010 (1985), followed in Holm-Sutherland Co., Inc. v. Shelby, 1999 MT 150, 295 M 65, 982 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 595 (1999).

Addenda Complete and Final Agreement of Parties: Written addenda to construction contract, which stated the addenda and attached agreement and exhibits constituted the entire agreement between the parties, represented the complete and final agreement of the parties. The language to this effect in the addenda was unambiguous; the contract taken as a whole in its wording and phraseology is not reasonably subject to two different interpretations. Martin Dev. Co. v. Keeney Constr. Co, 216 M 212, 703 P2d 143, 42 St. Rep. 752 (1985). On a later appeal, the parties were bound by the facts and law established in this prior case. Relitigation of issues was barred by collateral estoppel, and claims of legal malpractice were barred by the statute of limitations. Peschel v. Jones, 232 M 516, 760 P2d 51, 45 St. Rep. 1244 (1988).

Alleged Oral Modification of Written Real Estate Contract Not Sufficient to Prevent Summary Judgment: Real estate agent sued to recover remainder of his broker's commission on sale of ranch which fell through. District Court granted agent summary judgment, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The Supreme Court found there were no material issues of fact in dispute, and an allegation that the agent orally waived the remainder of the fee in return for the opportunity to relist the property was insufficient to prevent summary judgment because the alleged waiver was not in writing. Taylor v. Weingart, 214 M 282, 693 P2d 1231, 41 St. Rep. 2474 (1984).

Offer Followed by Suggested Changes, Passage of Time, and Acceptance: Following oral modification of written lease to allow lessee to use additional space for additional rent, lessor sent lessee a new lease that incorporated the modification and was essentially the same as the current lease. Lessee's attorney suggested changes not accepted by lessor. Lessor did not revoke his offer of the new lease, and a few months later lessee told lessor on the phone that her attorney's changes were not important to her and she would sign and deliver the lease, which she did the next month. The attorney's suggested changes were not a rejection, the time between the suggestions and the delivery of the signed lease by lessee was not unreasonable under the circumstances and did not work a revocation of the offer of the new lease, and the new lease was executed when lessee signed and delivered it. Lemley v. Allen, 203 M 37, 659 P2d 262, 40 St. Rep. 279 (1983).

Waiver of Provision in Collective Bargaining Agreement Not Properly Before Court: A declaratory judgment action was brought to construe a collective bargaining agreement. The plaintiff filed a motion for summary judgment. The defendant opposed the motion and filed an affidavit in support of its opposition. The plaintiff argued that the affidavit submitted by defendant was inadmissible as a violation of the parol evidence rule. The trial court concluded that no material factual issue existed but denied the motion because of waiver by the plaintiff. The waiver issue was addressed in the affidavit but not in any of the other pleadings. The Supreme Court held that the waiver issue was not properly before the trial court and ordered the trial court to reconsider its denial of the motion for summary judgment. The Supreme Court also said that the defendant could amend its answer to affirmatively plead waiver. Butte Teachers' Union v. Bd. of Trustees, 201 M 482, 655 P2d 146, 39 St. Rep. 2248 (1982).

Contract for Sale — Change to Option Contract: Plaintiff and realtor authorized to sell lots for corporation executed a 1975 contract under which plaintiff deposited $500, would pay $5,000 upon payment to plaintiff at a future uncertain time of a bonus in that amount, and would pay the balance of the purchase price within 90 days of the $5,000 payment and be given title. The contract was later modified to provide that if the bonus was not paid by January 1, 1980, plaintiff could either purchase the lot by paying the balance of the purchase price beyond the deposit within 90 days or choose not to purchase and to receive back his deposit. The modification changed both parties' rights and obligations, and such changes constituted consideration for the modification. The benefits and obligations of the parties under the modification were sufficient to constitute a mutually binding contract. Naylor v. Hall, 201 M 59, 651 P2d 1010, 39 St. Rep. 1953 (1982).

Essentials of Contract Required: A contract may be modified by a subsequent agreement that complies with the requirements of a contract. Naylor v. Hall, 201 M 59, 651 P2d 1010, 39 St. Rep. 1953 (1982).

Articles of Partnership — Subsequent Contract: Articles of partnership provided for a partner's retirement and the disposition of his interest in the partnership. However, the plaintiff partner contracted to sell her interest to the partnership for an amount greater than that provided for in the articles. Since a later written contract may alter a former contract if both parties so agree, the articles of partnership do not control. Bridaham v. Moore, 199 M 161, 648 P2d 731, 39 St. Rep. 1233 (1982).

Contingent Fee Contract: A contingent fee contract providing that in event suit was instituted attorney would be entitled to 40% of any sums recovered is binding in absence of written contract or executed oral contract varying the original contract. Gross v. Holzworth, 151 M 179, 440 P2d 765 (1968).

Application of Section: This section applied to all written contracts and not only to those which are required to be in writing by the Statute of Frauds. Fiers v. Jacobson, 123 M 242, 211 P2d 968 (1949).

New Contract on Same Subject as Extinguishing Old: Where the parties to a contract make a new and independent agreement concerning the same matter as the original and the terms of the new contract are so inconsistent with those of the former that they cannot stand together, the new agreement may be construed to discharge the preceding one. Kester v. Nelson, 92 M 69, 10 P2d 379 (1932).

When Escrow May Modify Contract for a Deed: While a deed to land is an "agreement" which when delivered may modify a contract for the deed, a deed deposited in escrow is but an escrow, does not pass title, and can modify the contract only on a clear showing that the opposing party knew of the recitals in the deed and acceded thereto and that the deed and contract were parts of the same transaction. Hollensteiner v. Anderson, 78 M 122, 252 P 796 (1927).

Presumption on Appeal: A contract which must have been in writing in order to be effective will be presumed on appeal to have been in writing, nothing to the contrary appearing in the record. Hurley v. Great Falls Baseball Ass'n, 59 M 21, 195 P 559 (1921).

Attorney General's Opinions

Termination of Payments in Lieu of Participation in Group Health Plan for Nonunion County Employee: The Board of County Commissioners may terminate payments in lieu of participation in a group health plan for a nonunion county employee only if termination is consistent with the county's employment agreement with the employee. 51 A.G. Op. 11 (2005).

When Collective Bargaining Agreement That Includes Payments in Lieu of Group Health Plan Participation May Be Altered: When a collective bargaining agreement includes a provision for payments to county employees in lieu of participation in a group health plan, that provision may not be altered by the Board of County Commissioners without the written agreement of the collective bargaining unit. 51 A.G. Op. 11 (2005). See also 43 A.G. Op. 79 (1990).

MUTUAL MISTAKE

Extrinsic Evidence Permissible Based on Parties' Intent — Intent Defeated by Mistakes in Vital Facts: The District Court did not err by considering extrinsic evidence to interpret and reform the parties' contract. Generally, when the terms of an agreement are reduced to writing by the parties, the writing is considered as containing all those terms and there can be no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing. However, an exception to this rule permits extrinsic evidence to be admitted when a mistake or other imperfection of the writing is put at issue. The District Court correctly concluded that the recorded agreement did not reflect the parties' intent. The mistakes in the agreement constituted "vital facts" that defeated the parties' contractual intentions. It was therefore appropriate for the District Court to consider extrinsic evidence and to reform the contract to reflect the parties' true intent. In re Platt, 2018 MT 43, 390 Mont. 338, 413 P.3d 818.

Extrinsic Evidence Properly Admitted to Prove Original Contract Intent — Reformation of Warranty Deed Based on Mutual Mistake Proper: Extrinsic evidence provided by plaintiffs to prove the parties' original intent in entering a buy-sell agreement proved that, by virtue of a mutual mistake, the deed did not contain agreed-upon restrictions. The evidence was squarely within the exception to the parol evidence rule, and the District Court did not err in admitting the parol evidence or in reforming the deed to include the restrictions and enforcing the restrictions against defendants. Thibodeau v. Bechtold, 2008 MT 412, 347 M 277, 198 P3d 785 (2008), following Interstate Prod. Credit Ass'n v. DeSaye, 250 M 320, 820 P2d 1285 (1991).

Standard of Proof Applicable to Reformation of Contract: A party urging reformation of a contract must overcome the presumption that the writing contains the final agreement of the parties and expresses their real purpose and intent. The correct standard of proof for reformation is clear, convincing, and satisfactory proof. Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993), distinguishing Reilly v. Maw, 146 M 145, 405 P2d 440 (1965).

Purchase Money Mortgages — Reformation: The bank prepared a mortgage from the buyer to the sellers and a deed of trust from the buyer to the bank as a service to and at the request of the buyer and the sellers. The bank inadvertently inserted the term "no exceptions" into the mortgage through a typographical error. Upon default of the buyer, the sellers filed an action for declaratory ruling that their purchase money mortgage was prior in time and right to the bank's deed of trust. The trial court reformed the sellers' mortgage to delete the term "no exceptions" and held that the bank's deed of trust was prior in time and right to the mortgage. The Supreme Court affirmed. The bank's mistake, while negligent, did not amount to neglect of a legal duty that would preclude reformation. The mistake was mutual because the mortgage as written did not reflect the mutual intentions of the parties which, the evidence indicated, were for the bank to receive a first mortgage and the sellers to receive a second mortgage. Pulse v. N. Am. Land Title Co. of Mont., 218 M 275, 707 P2d 1105, 42 St. Rep. 1578 (1985).

Deed Reserving Mineral Interest to County — No Mutual Mistake: A 1944 deed reserved a mineral interest to the county. The deed did not on its face indicate mutual mistake; the parties agreed in 1977 that the 1944 deed reserved a royalty, and not one of the interested parties claimed mutual mistake. Plaintiff did not overcome the presumption that the 1944 deed contained the final agreement of the parties. McSweyn v. Musselshell County, 193 M 525, 632 P2d 1095, 38 St. Rep. 1260 (1981).

Mistake as to Ownership: Where a deed reserved to the grantors the right to all the minerals, subject only to the right of grantee to receive half the royalties, the fact that grantors owned the mineral rights on only half the tract conveyed did not furnish ground for reformation in the absence of a showing of mutual mistake as to the extent of the grantor's ownership of minerals. Crawford v. Griffith, 137 M 140, 351 P2d 223 (1960).

When Reformation Lies for Mutual Mistake: Where both parties to a mortgage intended that it should cover all the lands of a livestock company, mortgagor, but stenographer of the mortgagee's attorney who prepared the document, in copying the description of the lands inadvertently omitted a tract of 440 acres of the total of 2,600 and the mistake was not discovered until shortly before commencement of the action to reform the mortgage and enforce it as reformed, the evidence was sufficient to warrant reformation. Clack v. Clack, 98 M 552, 41 P2d 32 (1935).

Equity Court: Where the parties to a contract agree upon its terms and conditions and through mutual mistake the writing signed by them fails to express their agreement, a court of equity will reform it. Clack v. Clack, 98 M 552, 41 P2d 32 (1935).

Proof Required for Mutual Mistake: To warrant reformation of a written instrument for mistake, it must appear that the parties agreed upon a certain contract, that they executed it, that the contract executed was not the one agreed upon, that the variance occurred by mistake, in what the mistake consisted, and that it was mutual. Thielbar Realties, Inc. v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co., 91 M 525, 9 P2d 469 (1932).

Mistake to Be Common and Reciprocal: The mutual mistake for which a written instrument may be reformed must be reciprocal and common to both parties, each alike laboring under the same misconception. Theilbar Realties, Inc. v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co., 91 M 525, 9 P2d 469 (1932).

Promissory Note: The rule declared by this section that a written contract which through mutual mistake does not truly express the intention of the parties may be reformed applies to a promissory note executed by the officers of a corporation for a company debt but which by such mistake made it their own obligation instead of their principal's. Bitter Root Creamery Co. v. Muntzer, 90 M 77, 300 P 251 (1931).

Fire Insurance Policy: Where reformation of a fire insurance policy was sought on the ground of a mutual mistake on the part of the insured and the agent of the insurer relative to the answer to the question in the application whether the building insured stood upon ground not owned by the insured, the evidence showing that plaintiff was unable to read the English language and that he advised the agent that he did not own the land but was assured that the policy "was all right", there was a sufficient showing that the mistake was mutual, within this meaning of this section. Krpan v. Cent. Fed. Fire Ins. Co., 87 M 345, 287 P 217 (1930).

Reliance on Another Document: Under this section, authorizing the reformation of a contract when through mutual mistake it does not truly express the intention of the parties, the court in a mortgage foreclosure suit properly excluded one of a number of lots described by number, where it was apparent that the mortgagor did not intend to include it and the attorney of the mortgagee who drew it, in following the descriptions given in another mortgage, inadvertently added the number of the lot excluded, the circumstances having been such as to excuse the negligence of the mortgagor in failing to read the mortgage before signing it. First St. Bank v. Mussigbrod, 83 M 68, 271 P 695 (1928).

Burden of Proof: The party who seeks to revise or reform a written instrument on the ground of a mutual mistake of the parties has the burden of establishing such mistake by clear, convincing, and satisfactory evidence if he would overcome the presumption that the writing contains their final agreement and expresses their real purpose and intent. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927).

Evidence to Be Presented: Before equity will intervene to correct an alleged mutual mistake in a written instrument the evidence of the mistake must be clear, convincing, and satisfactory. Humble v. St. John, 72 M 519, 234 P 475 (1925).

MISTAKE BY ONE PARTY

Competitive Bidding — Contract Formed by Execution of Written Instrument, Not by Award of Project — No Requirement That State Be Notified of Bidding Error Prior to Award of Project: After E.H. Oftedal and Sons, Inc. (Oftedal), submitted a bid on a highway project, but before the actual contract was signed, Oftedal notified the state that $789,000 in errors had been discovered. Oftedal requested that the bid be withdrawn or that the contract amount be adjusted upward, but the requests were denied. Oftedal appealed, but the District Court held that Oftedal did not give timely notice of the mistakes prior to the acceptance of the bid, so equitable relief was unavailable under this section. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. As a matter of law, no contract for performance of the highway project was formed by the award of the project, prior to execution of the written contract, so there could be no requirement that the state have knowledge of Oftedal's unilateral mistake prior to the award of the project. No notice of the mistake was necessary at that time to obtain equitable relief under this section. E.H. Oftedal & Sons, Inc. v. St., 2002 MT 1, 308 M 50, 40 P3d 349 (2002), distinguishing Baker v. St., 218 M 235, 707 P2d 20 (1985).

Equitable Relief Available to Correct Inadvertent Bidding Errors in Revising Highway Construction Project: Contractor E.H. Oftedal and Sons, Inc. (Oftedal), submitted a bid on a Montana highway project. Because Oftedal's was the lowest bid, the state awarded the contract to Oftedal, but upon later investigation, Oftedal determined that the bid contained several errors amounting to $789,000, and requested that the bid be withdrawn. The request was denied, so Oftedal requested an upward revision of the bid to reflect the mistakes. Even if the contract amount was revised upward to reflect the errors, Oftedal's bid would still have been lowest. Although the state recognized that Oftedal had made an unintended mistake, the request for upward revision was also denied, in part because the Federal Highway Administration would not allow any federal money to be used to cover any state cost over Oftedal's original bid. To avoid losing its substantial bid bond, Oftedal signed the contract under protest for the original amount and petitioned the District Court for equitable relief under this section through an upward revision of the contract sum. The District Court denied relief and granted summary judgment to the state. Oftedal appealed to the Supreme Court, seeking an upward revision to reflect the amount of the error and an order for specific performance of the revised contract. The Supreme Court found that equitable relief was appropriate because of mistake, and remanded to the District Court with instructions to reform the contract to reflect the true intentions of the parties. The mistakes in this case were inadvertent, and even though some negligence might have been inherent in the mistakes, they could not be said to preclude equitable relief when viewed in light of the parties' agreed assessment of the nature of the errors. Negligence of the party creating the mistake is not necessarily a bar to judicial reformation of a contract. Under 28-2-1612, for the purpose of revising a contract, a court must presume that all parties intended to make an equitable and conscientious agreement, and it could not be presumed that either party intended Oftedal to incur the hardship of supplying $789,000 of work and material to the state without compensation. E.H. Oftedal & Sons, Inc. v. St., 2002 MT 1, 308 M 50, 40 P3d 349 (2002).

Unambiguous Contract Description — Applicability of Parol Evidence Rule — Unilateral Mistake: Since a 1971 written agreement was not ambiguous with respect to the land it affected, the parol evidence rule prevented admission of evidence of a 1967 oral agreement to show intent of the parties as to what land was involved. Admission of the oral agreement would only have provided evidence of unilateral mistake, which is not grounds for reforming a written contract. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Essentials for Reformation: Where plaintiff knew that defendant was acting under a mistake with regard to a writing, he was not entitled to revision on the ground of mistake. Schillinger v.

Huber, 133 M 80, 320 P2d 346 (1958), followed in Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993), and Goodman Realty, Inc. v. Monson, 267 M 228, 883 P2d 121, 51 St. Rep. 1074 (1994).

Effect of Negligence on Reformation: Every mistake for which an instrument may be reformed involves the idea of negligence in greater or less degree, and if the negligence in failing to read the instrument is excusable under the circumstances, as where the person charged with negligence was of foreign extraction unable to read English well, and no rights of innocent third persons are involved, reformation may be had. Bitter Root Creamery Co. v. Muntzer, 90 M 77, 300 P 251 (1931).

Extent of Remedy: This section provides for the reformation of instruments on the ground of the mutual mistake of the parties. Section 28-3-304 declares that when through mistake a written contract fails to express the real intention of the parties, such intention is to be regarded and the erroneous part of the writing disregarded. Although a voluntary conveyance is unilateral and therefore lacks in mutuality, a court of equity under its inherent power and 28-3-304 may grant reformation of a deed evidencing such a conveyance even though the mistake was not mutual. Laundreville v. Mero, 86 M 43, 281 P 749 (1929).

Excusable Negligence: The mere fact that a party seeking a reformation of an instrument on the ground of mistake may himself have been negligent is not a ground for refusing relief; if the negligence is excusable, as where plaintiff is an old man and not accustomed to transact business and defendant a much younger man of extensive business experience, relief will be granted when, in view of all the circumstances, to deny it would permit plaintiff to suffer a gross wrong at the hands of defendant. Ayers v. Buswell, 73 M 518, 238 P 591 (1925).

Reformation Not to Lie for Unilateral Mistake: Where a mistake in an instrument was unilateral, i.e., made only by one party to it, and not mutual or one which the other party by it knew or suspected, reformation did not lie. Comerford v. USF&G Co., 59 M 243, 196 P 984 (1921).

Allegation of Mistake: In an action to reform a contract the complaint should allege some mistake in the making of the contract or some mistake or inadvertence in reducing its terms to writing. Gaffney Mercantile Co. v. Hopkins, 21 M 13, 52 P 561 (1898).

FRAUD

Sufficiency of Pleadings and Proof: The defendant sold real estate to plaintiff on a contract for deed, and the District Court reformed the contract, finding fraud by defendant in orally misrepresenting that there were three good wells on the property, that ownership of a cabin on the property would transfer with the property, and that he would survey or provide papers concerning the boundary of the property. The Supreme Court reversed, finding no basis for fraud in that: (1) the water in the wells had never been tested and proven unfit for use, and the lack of pumps on two wells was obvious from visual inspection at the time the contract was entered; (2) plaintiff had, on a verified complaint, in fact acknowledged defendant's continuing ownership of the cabin, contrary to her testimony and the District Court's finding; and (3) plaintiff never alleged that a survey was to be performed, contrary to the District Court's findings, and plaintiff could have easily ascertained the boundaries by looking at an existing survey and talking with a neighbor. Krone v. McCann, 197 M 380, 642 P2d 584, 39 St. Rep. 500 (1982). See also Fossen v. Fossen, 2013 MT 299, 372 Mont. 175, 311 P.3d 743.

Independent Investigation Clause Not to Preclude Justifiable Reliance on Representations: Defendants owned property in Flathead County. Water for the property came from a neighbor's well for which they paid him $8 per month. No written agreement existed concerning the water supply. Defendants listed the property for sale with Tri-City Real Estate. Inserted in the listing contract in the printed space following "water" were the words "community $8/mo." Plaintiffs were interested in the land and looked at it. They asked both defendants and the realtor about the water supply and were told it came from a community well. Plaintiffs wanted written verification of the interest in the water system. The realtor told them he would obtain a copy of the register of the well for them. Plaintiffs continued asking for the register but never received it. Plaintiffs signed a contract for deed to buy the property which had been prepared by the realtor's attorney. The contract contained an "independent investigation" clause, which stated that plaintiffs had investigated the property and entered the contract based upon that investigation and that there were no other agreements or representations concerning the property. The neighbor stopped supplying water, and plaintiffs were forced to dig their own well. They sought recovery from defendants. It was held that defendants were responsible for the negligence of their agents in the sale as related to the community water interest. The Supreme Court held that the "independent investigation" clause did not preclude a holding that the plaintiffs justifiably relied on the representations of the realtor. Parkhill v. Fuselier, 194 M 415, 632 P2d 1132, 38 St. Rep. 1424 (1981), distinguished in Garrison v. Averill, 282 M 508, 938 P2d 702, 54 St. Rep. 454 (1997).

Assignment of Royalty Interest: Where a landowner induced by the fraud of the person with whom he was contracting assigned a 1/32 royalty interest instead of an undivided 1/32 interest in and to minerals under and upon his lands, the assignment will be reformed, amended, and corrected by the courts to correctly embody the agreement of the parties. Carroll v. Funk, 222 F2d 508 (9th Cir. 1955).

Not Exclusive Remedy: Neither the remedy afforded by 28-2-1711, giving a party to a contract the right to rescind on the ground of fraud, among others, nor that granted by this section, under which he may have the contract reformed on the same ground, is exclusive, each being independent of the other; hence the defrauded party may elect to pursue either remedy. Campana v. Dobry, 69 M 240, 221 P 540 (1923).

GENERAL

Reformation of Insurance Policy Not Permitted — Clear and Explicit Language Used — Lack of Due Diligence in Discovering Error Not Justifying Reformation: An insurer attempted to reform an insurance policy on the ground that the policy should not cover property near a structure that was specifically exempted from the policy. However, the policy specifically included property within 1,000 feet of other insured property, including property around the exempted structure. The District Court applied 33-15-302 and determined that it was prohibited from reforming insurance policies. On appeal, the Supreme Court also declined to reform the contract, as the language was clear and explicit, due diligence would have uncovered the error, and the insurer failed to establish that its insurance policy expressed something other than what the parties mutually intended. Lincoln County Port Authority v. Allianz Global Risks US Ins. Co., 2013 MT 365, 373 Mont. 60, 315 P.3d 934.

Request for New Beneficiary Not Appropriate Use of Reformation — Summary Judgment Properly Granted to Stepson: Reformation does not permit the court to create an entirely new contract. In this case, the petitioner asked the court to name her as an entirely new beneficiary, which would be a substantial addition resulting in a new contract. This request went beyond what is permitted by way of reformation. Section 28-3-304 governs the interpretation of contracts, not their reformation, and was properly applied here; however, the standard for disregarding a writing contained in 28-3-304 was not met because the evidence showed the decedent intended to list his estate as his contingent beneficiary, so the District Court properly granted summary judgment to the decedent's stepson. In re Estate of Irvine, 2013 MT 271, 372 Mont. 49, 309 P.3d 986.

Public Contracts Subject to Fundamental Contract Analysis — Public Bidding and Contract Modification Statutes Not Inherently Inconsistent: Public contracts are not necessarily exempt from fundamental contract analysis because competitive bidding statutes were established for the benefit of the public rather than to establish the rights of bidders. Nothing in the competitive bidding statutes places public contracts out of reach of remedies at law or the equitable relief provided under this section if a party is otherwise qualified for relief under the terms of the statute. Further, public bidding statutes and contract modification statutes are not inherently inconsistent, so this section may be applied to public contracts. E.H. Oftedal & Sons, Inc. v. St., 2002 MT 1, 308 M 50, 40 P3d 349 (2002).

Modification of Property Settlement Resulting in Conflicting Provisions — Interpretation Giving Effect, Not Voidness, Preferred: The original property settlement agreement provided that husband and wife would divide equally the proceeds from the sale of their house. An escrow agreement, signed by all parties, later assigned the balances on a percentage basis, 72% to wife and 28% to husband, and further provided that wife would receive a total of $30,000 from the net proceeds of the sale. However, the percentage amount did not approximate the total amount. Husband contended that because the conflicting portions could not be taken together so as to give effect to every part of the contract and the intention of the parties, the modification should be voided and the original equal division contained in the dissolution should rule. The District Court inquired as to the instrument's intent and its legal consequences, favoring effect over voidness. The court properly confined its inquiry to the language of the instrument and held that the 72/28 provision ruled. The interpretation was reasonable and within the scope of the court's inquiry. In re Marriage of Bourque, 241 M 38, 785 P2d 699, 47 St. Rep. 64 (1990).

Effect of Unanticipated Condition on Contractor's Obligation: Even though a contract incorporates by reference federal, state, or local laws, a contractor is not required to alter construction plans to comply with health standards when the condition to be alleviated is abnormal, unanticipated, or substantially different from those in the contract plans and drawings. Ace Plumbing & Heating, Inc. v. School District, 204 M 81, 662 P2d 1327, 40 St. Rep. 678 (1983).

Merger of Conveyance Agreement Description Into Later Deed: There was a discrepancy between the descriptions of real property contained in an agreement to convey property and a later deed that purported to convey the same property. Where transferees were aware of the discrepancy for 12 years and did nothing to correct it, the agreement was merged into the deed and there were no grounds for reformation of the deed. Tillotsen v. Frazer, 199 M 342, 649 P2d 744, 39 St. Rep. 1442 (1982).

Certainty of Option Contract — Specific Performance of Reformed Contract: Where the plaintiff and defendant entered into an option contract giving the plaintiff an option to purchase certain real estate but the parties failed to specify the interest which would be retained by the defendant in certain improvements and failed to specify the dates upon which the downpayment and annual payments would be made and the date upon which interest would accrue, the contract was nonetheless sufficiently definite to allow its enforcement by specific performance. At trial, the court took testimony of the parties and reformed the contract so as to make it sufficiently definite as to the defendant's retained interest to allow specific performance. The fact that certain dates were not specified is not fatal to the contract, as it need not be absolutely certain in every detail, and where a time of performance is not specified, a reasonable time will be implied. Keaster v. Bozik, 191 M 293, 623 P2d 1376, 38 St. Rep. 194 (1981).

Regret Not Grounds for Avoiding Obligation: Courts must interpret contracts as they are made by the parties, not make new ones for them, no matter how unreasonable terms may appear after they have been consummated. Merely because the plaintiffs in an oil and gas lease may have reason to regret their bargain affords them no ground to avoid the obligation assumed. Fey v. A. A. Oil Corp., 129 M 300, 285 P2d 578 (1955).

Defect in Complaint Cured by Answer: Where defendant by his answer and cross-complaint alleged that he was a purchaser of the land in good faith for value and without notice of any adverse interest held by plaintiffs and this was denied in reply and answer of plaintiff, defendants supplied the issue of good faith and cannot complain of the absence of an allegation in the complaint that defendant was not a purchaser in good faith. Strack v. Fed. Land Bank of Spokane, 124 M 19, 218 P2d 1052 (1950).

Intention of Parties: Proof that failure of contract to express true intention of the parties was the result of fraud, mutual mistake, or a mistake of one party which the other at the time knew or suspected is necessary to warrant reformation of a written contract. Brubaker v. D'Orazi, 120 M 22, 179 P2d 538 (1947).

When Acquiescence in Contract Destroys Right of Reformation: Under the rule that acquiescence in a contract after learning that it does not represent the actual agreement destroys the right of reformation, where purchasers of land included in an irrigation district entered into the contract of purchase under alleged false representations by the vendor that the lands were not subject to liens for payment of bonds issued by the district and paid assessments for 10 years without protest, they will be held to have acquiesced in the contract, barring the right of reformation. Krueger v. Morris, 110 M 559, 107 P2d 142 (1940).

Judgment Lien Acquired After Execution of Mortgage No Bar to Reformation: The lien of a judgment is a general one and must yield to all prior equitable titles in others; hence such a lien acquired between the date of the execution of a mortgage and the bringing of an action to reform the instrument and foreclose it as reformed does not stand in the way of granting such relief. Clack v. Clack, 98 M 552, 41 P2d 32 (1935).

Oral Preceding Agreement: If a party claims that a written contract does not correctly state the true terms of the agreement, he must have it reformed and recover on it as reformed, if at all; but he cannot recover on an oral preceding agreement differing from that which was reduced to writing. Biering v. Ringling, 78 M 145, 252 P 872 (1927).

No Culpable Negligence: Reformation of an instrument will not be decreed on the ground of mistake unless the real intent of the parties is satisfactorily shown and the party seeking the relief was free from culpable negligence. Comerford v. USF&G Co., 59 M 243, 196 P 984 (1921), explained in Ayers v. Buswell, 73 M 518, 238 P 591 (1925).

Court Not to Insert Provisions: The purpose of the equity of reformation is not to make a new agreement but to establish and perpetuate the true one, and courts cannot insert a provision which was omitted with the consent of the party asking reformation, although such consent was given in reliance on an oral promise of the other party that the omission should not make any difference. Comerford v. USF&G Co., 59 M 243, 196 P 984 (1921).

28-2-1612. Presumption that parties intended equitable agreement.

Case Notes

Extrinsic Evidence Permissible Based on Parties' Intent — Intent Defeated by Mistakes in Vital Facts: The District Court did not err by considering extrinsic evidence to interpret and reform the parties' contract. Generally, when the terms of an agreement are reduced to writing by the parties, the writing is considered as containing all those terms and there can be no evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing. However, an exception to this rule permits extrinsic evidence to be admitted when a mistake or other imperfection of the writing is put at issue. The District Court correctly concluded that the recorded agreement did not reflect the parties' intent. The mistakes in the agreement constituted "vital facts" that defeated the parties' contractual intentions. It was therefore appropriate for the District Court to consider extrinsic evidence and to reform the contract to reflect the parties' true intent. In re Platt, 2018 MT 43, 390 Mont. 338, 413 P.3d 818.

Equitable Relief Available to Correct Inadvertent Bidding Errors in Revising Highway Construction Project: Contractor E.H. Oftedal and Sons, Inc. (Oftedal), submitted a bid on a Montana highway project. Because Oftedal's was the lowest bid, the state awarded the contract to Oftedal, but upon later investigation, Oftedal determined that the bid contained several errors amounting to $789,000, and requested that the bid be withdrawn. The request was denied, so Oftedal requested an upward revision of the bid to reflect the mistakes. Even if the contract amount was revised upward to reflect the errors, Oftedal's bid would still have been lowest. Although the state recognized that Oftedal had made an unintended mistake, the request for upward revision was also denied, in part because the Federal Highway Administration would not allow any federal money to be used to cover any state cost over Oftedal's original bid. To avoid losing its substantial bid bond, Oftedal signed the contract under protest for the original amount and petitioned the District Court for equitable relief under 28-2-1611 through an upward revision of the contract sum. The District Court denied relief and granted summary judgment to the state. Oftedal appealed to the Supreme Court, seeking an upward revision to reflect the amount of the error and an order for specific performance of the revised contract. The Supreme Court found that equitable relief was appropriate because of mistake, and remanded to the District Court with instructions to reform the contract to reflect the true intentions of the parties. The mistakes in this case were inadvertent, and even though some negligence might have been inherent in the mistakes, they could not be said to preclude equitable relief when viewed in light of the parties' agreed assessment of the nature of the errors. Negligence of the party creating the mistake is not necessarily a bar to judicial reformation of a contract. Under this section, for the purpose of revising a contract, a court must presume that all parties intended to make an equitable and conscientious agreement, and it could not be presumed that either party intended Oftedal to incur the hardship of supplying $789,000 of work and material to the state without compensation. E.H. Oftedal & Sons, Inc. v. St., 2002 MT 1, 308 M 50, 40 P3d 349 (2002).

U.C.C. Unconscionability Provision — Application to Leases: The Montana Uniform Commercial Code provision relating to unconscionable sales contracts (30-2-302) can, at least by analogy, be applied to lease transactions and should guide the Supreme Court in determining whether a lease is unconscionable. All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

Unconscionability — Leases Between Businessmen: Courts have readily applied the doctrine of unconscionability of contracts as between consumers and businessmen but are reluctant to rewrite the terms of a contract between businessmen themselves. When, as in instant case, all provisions of a lease are agreed to by businessmen on both sides, none of the surrounding circumstances suggest oppression of lessee's freedom to select another lessor, nothing on the record suggests disparity of bargaining power, and lessee selected both the equipment leased and the supplier of the equipment to the lessor and notified lessor of lessee's desire to make the lease, the lease cannot be considered unconscionable. All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

Unconscionability — Success of Unsupported Claim: The mere unsupported claim that equipment lease under which appellants were sued was unconscionable and that a more oppressive lease was hard to imagine could not succeed on appeal from summary judgment for delinquent payments under lease. All-States Leasing Co. v. Top Hat Lounge, 198 M 1, 649 P2d 1250, 39 St. Rep. 425 (1982).

Contract for Deed — Forfeiture — Notice to Persons With Interest: A contract for deed was executed between Morin, the seller, and Roberts, the buyer. Later, Roberts entered into a second contract selling the property to Iverson. The second contract provided that Iverson would assume Roberts' obligation to Morin, and upon completion of Iverson's obligation to Roberts, Roberts would assign his interest in the Morin contract to Iverson. Iverson defaulted on the Morin contract, and Morin sent a notice of default to Iverson but not to Roberts. When Roberts learned of the default he offered to cure. Morin refused the offer, seeking instead to enforce the forfeiture provision of the contract, thereby regaining the property, which had greatly increased in value. The court found that this situation is similar to the purchaser in an executory real estate contract who mortgages his interest. In that case the mortgagee is entitled to notice of forfeiture if the seller knows of the mortgage and the mortgagee has the right to tender payment to the seller necessary to protect his security. Roberts v. Morin, 198 M 233, 645 P2d 423, 39 St. Rep. 892 (1982).

Mineral Rights: Grantors seeking reformation of deeds by which they retained portions of landowners' mineral royalties were not entitled to relief where evidence did not show that deeds contained no provision reserving all mineral and leasing rights in grantors. Voyta v. Clonts, 134 M 156, 328 P2d 655 (1958).

Power of Court to Reform a Contract: The court may make the contract express the real intent of the parties as it existed when the contract was entered into but it may not make an entirely new agreement. In this case, the District Court properly ordered an accounting, scheduled a new option to purchase date, and set up a new payment schedule as these adjustments were necessary to make specific performance possible. However the District Court erred by adding new rights and obligations requiring the plaintiff to execute a promissory note and real estate mortgage. Rogers v. Relyea, 184 M 1, 601 P2d 37 (1979).

Reformation of Terms Entered by Mistake: If the parties to a contract agree upon terms and conditions named by them, and through mistake the writing embodying the agreement signed by them, or either of them, fails to express the agreement as made, or includes therein terms and conditions not agreed upon, the result is that there is no contract between them. Under such circumstances a court of equity will reform the written evidence of the contract so as to make it express the terms of the agreement as actually fixed by the parties. Parchen v. Chessman, 49 M 326, 142 P 631 (1914).

Part 17
Extinction of Contracts — Rescission

Part Case Notes

Party Entitled to Seek Damages for Breach of Terminated Contract for Damages Incurred Prior to Termination: The Whites entered into a construction contract with Longley for the construction of their home. After failing to perform under the terms of the contract, Longley persuaded the Whites to buy him out of the contract for $30,000 and to let him continue to build the home without a contract. Subsequently, Longley failed to build a house that could be occupied. Longley argued that the trial court had incorrectly based part of the damages awarded to the Whites on the original contract, which had been terminated. The Supreme Court held that after the termination the Whites were still entitled to recover for any damages they had suffered prior to the termination and could rely on the terms of that contract in determining their damages. White v. Longley, 2010 MT 254, 358 Mont. 268, 244 P.3d 753.

Rescission of Waiver of Interest Document on Grounds of Fraud: Kindsfather's son purchased some land from Kindsfather pursuant to a contract for deed. When the son was unable to make the payments, the son executed a document waiving the back interest that was owing and Kindsfather signed the document. Kindsfather subsequently died, and the son sought a declaratory ruling that the waiver of interest document was valid and that upon receipt of the unpaid balance of the contract, the bank would release the warranty deed held in escrow for the son. Kindsfather's personal representative opposed the judgment, and the District Court found the document to be invalid and ordered the son to make all payments due to the estate. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision to rescind the document because it was obtained by fraud. The Supreme Court examined each of the nine elements of actual fraud and determined that a prima facie case of actual fraud was established. In re Estate of Kindsfather, 2005 MT 51, 326 M 192, 108 P3d 487 (2005), following Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640 (1993).

Federal Law Regarding Nonliability for Borrower's Payment of Fees to Lender Upon Loan Rescission Inapplicable to Mortgage Broker Fees: Plaintiff helped defendant secure a loan, which defendant subsequently rescinded within the applicable 3-day period pursuant to the federal Truth in Lending Act. Plaintiff sent defendant a bill for its brokerage fee and out-of-pocket expenses incurred in securing the loan commitment, as provided in the brokerage contract and an attendant promissory note. Defendant refused to pay the bill, and plaintiff brought an action to enforce the contract and promissory note, and the District Court enforced the note and ordered defendant to pay the bill. Defendant appealed on grounds that 16 U.S.C. 1635(b) of the Truth in Lending Act and 12 CFR 226.23, Regulation Z, clearly provide that when a consumer rescinds a transaction, the consumer is not liable for any amount, including any finance charge. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court ruling. Although the federal law protects defendant from paying any fees to the lender, it does not address arrangements between a borrower and a mortgage broker, and in fact, portions of Regulation Z at 12 CFR 226.4(a) expressly exclude appraisal and service fees from the definition of a finance charge. Therefore, even though defendant effectively rescinded that mortgage with the lender, the rescission did not affect or alter defendant's obligation to the mortgage broker pursuant to the brokerage contract and promissory note. Mortgage Source, Inc. v. Strong, 2003 MT 205, 317 M 37, 75 P3d 304 (2003).

Unenforceability of Buy-Sell Agreement on Grounds of Impossibility or Impracticality of Performance — Requiring Performance of Contract With Potential for Environmental Degradation Unconstitutional: Cape-France Enterprises (Cape-France) entered a buy-sell agreement with Peed (now deceased) and Moore to purchase some property near Bozeman for a subdivision. Before the subdivision could be completed, water needed to be procured for the site. According to the agreement, as buyers, Peed and Moore were responsible to bring water to the property, but because city water was not available, a well needed to be drilled. However, the presence of a pollution plume was discovered near the land. After the subdivision process was commenced, the Department of Environmental Quality notified Cape-France that: (1) the plume may have advanced under the property; (2) a subdivision would not be approved unless a well was drilled and tested; (3) a well could be drilled, but if testing showed pollution in the water, treatment would be extensive; and (4) if drilling or pumping of the water caused expansion of the pollution, then Cape-France, as owner of the property, would be held liable for cleanup costs. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the District Court held that the buy-sell agreement could be rescinded on the basis of mutual mistake of fact and impossibility or impracticality of performance and that specific performance would not be granted. The Supreme Court affirmed. A court may determine that an act is impossible in legal contemplation when it is not practicable, when the act can be done only at an excessive, unreasonable, and unbargained-for cost. The doctrine of impossibility or impracticability is applied when, aside from the object of a contract being unlawful, the public policy underlying the strict performance of the contract is outweighed by the senselessness of requiring performance. The doctrine is not limited to cases of literal impossibility but may also be applied in cases that present a potential for substantial and unbargained-for damages. In this case, requiring Cape-France to go forward with the performance of the contract when there was a very real possibility of substantial environmental degradation and resultant financial liability for cleanup was not in the public interest or in the interests of the contracting parties and was not in accord with the guarantee of a clean and healthful environment in Art. II, sec. 3, Mont. Const., or the mandate to maintain and improve a clean and healthful environment for present and future generations in Art. IX, sec. 1, Mont. Const. Thus, rescission of the contract was proper. Cape-France Enterprises v. Estate of Peed, 2001 MT 139, 305 M 513, 29 P3d 1011 (2001). See also Smith v. Zepp, 173 M 358, 567 P2d 923 (1977), and Mont. Envtl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 1999 MT 248, 296 M 207, 988 P2d 1236 (1999).

Failure to Timely Enforce Contract Provision Insufficient of Itself to Constitute Waiver — Proof of Waiver — Reasonable Diligence Required of Rescinding Party: Mere failure to take steps to enforce a legal right under a contract in a timely manner is not, by itself, sufficient to constitute proof of waiver. Rather, a party claiming waiver must prove that the language or conduct by the other party showed unequivocally that the party voluntarily and intentionally relinquished the right to receive the full benefit of the contract. (See Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).) Even though a party may be entitled to rescind a contract because of failure of consideration, the rescinding party must take action within a reasonable time upon discovering the facts that enable the rescission. Here, the District Court erred in concluding, without first determining whether the provisions of 28-2-1713 were complied with, that purchasers under a contract could rescind for failure of consideration. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000), following Liddle v. Petty, 249 M 442, 816 P2d 1066, 48 St. Rep. 779 (1991).

Materiality of Claim of Failure of Consideration to Contract Required Before Rescission Available as Remedy — Partial Failure of Consideration — Meltdown of Ice Cream Distributorship Agreement: Under Johnson v. Meiers, 118 M 258, 164 P2d 1012 (1946), a breach that goes to only part of the consideration, that is incidental and subordinate to the main purpose of the contract, and that may be compensated in damages does not warrant rescission. The injured party is still bound to perform that party's part of the contract, and the only remedy for the breach consists of the damages suffered from the breach. By contrast, under Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990), a party may rescind if, through the fault of the other party, consideration fails in whole or in part. In clarifying the disparate holdings, the Supreme Court noted that the term "failure of consideration", as either a claim or an affirmative defense, does not relate to the absence of consideration or whether there is good consideration for the formation of a valid, enforceable contract, but rather the term pertains to the failure of one party's performance, which then suspends or excuses the performance of the other party pursuant to the terms of a valid contract. Failure of consideration is generally synonymous with a material breach of performance of a contract, rather than whether a contract was enforceable because of the absence of the essential element of consideration. Thus, a claim or affirmative defense of failure of consideration that gives rise to the equitable remedy of rescission requires a showing by the claiming party that the other party's failure to perform was, in fact, material to the contract, and whether consideration was sufficient or good is immaterial. To reconcile this holding with 28-2-1711, the court went on to hold that failure of part of a promised performance may warrant rescission, but only if the claiming party proves that the deficient part of the other party's performance was material to the contract. If the failure to perform was not material, rescission is not an available remedy, performance cannot be excused, and the claiming party "may only be entitled to money damages for breach". Here, the District Court erred when it did not determine whether Norwood's failure to assign an ice cream distributor agreement to Service Distributing, Inc. (SDI), was material to the transaction as a whole. Absent that finding, SDI could not as a matter of law rescind the contract and be excused from further performance of its obligation to Norwood, so the case was remanded to determine whether a material breach occurred. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000). See also Flaig v. Gramm, 1999 MT 181, 295 M 297, 983 P2d 396, 56 St. Rep. 710 (1999).

Breach Insufficient to Warrant Rescission: In a contract for sale of real estate, use of words such as "deposit", "depositing", and "held on deposit" prohibited the sellers from spending the earnest money paid by the buyer pending the closing of the sale; however, the sellers' failure to keep earnest money on deposit until the closing did not constitute a material breach of contract. The buyer was entitled to seek contract damages but not rescission. Cady v. Burton, 257 M 529, 851 P2d 1047, 50 St. Rep. 395 (1993), followed in Flaig v. Gramm, 1999 MT 181, 295 M 297, 983 P2d 396, 56 St. Rep. 710 (1999).

Payment Withheld in Anticipation of Breach: When employee sent letter to employer stating terms substantially different from original oral contract, employer withheld employee's pay. Court held that the employer's action was reasonable and in good faith and did not breach the contract. The employer had reasonable grounds to believe the employee would breach the contract and thus give the employer a claim for damages; therefore, the employer was entitled to withhold performance until he received assurance of the employee's intent to fulfill the contract. This is the rule stated in section 251 of the Restatement (Second) of Contracts (1979). Julian v. Mont. St. Univ., 229 M 362, 747 P2d 196, 44 St. Rep. 2046 (1987).

Breach Inadequate to Warrant Rescission — Damages as Remedy: A breach that goes to only part of the consideration, is incidental and subordinate to the main purpose of the contract, and may be compensated in damages does not warrant a rescission of the contract. The injured party is still bound to perform his part of the agreement, and his only remedy for the breach consists of the damages he has suffered therefrom. Halcro v. Moon, 226 M 121, 733 P2d 1305, 44 St. Rep. 504 (1987), citing Johnson v. Meiers, 118 M 258, 164 P2d 1012 (1946), and followed in Garcia v. Schell, 239 M 475, 781 P2d 274, 46 St. Rep. 1844 (1989), and Flaig v. Gramm, 1999 MT 181, 295 M 297, 983 P2d 396, 56 St. Rep. 710 (1999).

Damages Awarded on Theories of Breach of Contract and Rescission: Appellant argued that the District Court award of damages on both theories of breach of contract and rescission was improper, contending that the remedies were mutually exclusive. The Supreme Court noted that restitution under a theory of rescission can, under some circumstances, be a remedy for breach of contract; however, it was clear from the complaint and judgment in this case that the recovery was in damages for breach of contract and as such was properly computed. Hostetter v. Donlan, 221 M 380, 719 P2d 1243, 43 St. Rep. 909 (1986).

Mutual Cancellation: Plaintiff brought an action as personal representative to set aside a deed recorded in defendant's name. Defendant's father entered into a contract for deed with defendant in 1961. Defendant contended he paid off the contract in 1975. In 1965, defendant filed bankruptcy and did not list the land under contract as an asset or the note as a claim against the bankruptcy estate. Defendant's father made payments on the land to the land bank as late as 1977. In 1977, defendant and his wife filed for divorce, and the property was not listed as a marital asset. Defendant's father leased the property in 1978 and 1980, and defendant was not a party to either lease. Defendant recorded a deed to the property in his name in 1981. Defendant's father died in 1981, and plaintiff as personal representative brought the action to set aside the deed. The trial court refused an instruction on mutual cancellation. Plaintiff alleged in its complaint that the contract for deed had been terminated and introduced testimony that the bankruptcy had been the mutual consent terminating the contract. It was error to refuse the instruction as the doctrine of mutual cancellation is well recognized in Montana. NW. Union Trust Co. v. Worm, 204 M 184, 663 P2d 325, 40 St. Rep. 758 (1983).

Failure to Pay Draft Justification for Cancellation of Oil and Gas Lease: Oil and gas leases are to be liberally construed in favor of the lessor, and forfeiture is favored in such leases. Thus, failure of lessee to timely pay a draft executed at the same time as the lease was sufficient justification for cancellation of the lease. Clawson v. Berklund, 188 M 48, 610 P2d 1168 (1980).

Breach of Restrictive Covenant — Effect on Default: When lots within a legal subdivision are sold pursuant to a contract for deed, the sellers' breach of a restrictive covenant, occurring prior to the contracted due date and relating to a 30-foot setback requirement on sellers' adjacent lot, does not excuse the buyer from his duty to make payment by the due date and his right to recover damages is precluded by his failure to make such payment. Reinke v. Biegel, 185 M 31, 604 P2d 308 (1979).

Case Notes

Distributorship Contract — No Termination Date — When Terminable: In deciding an issue never before decided by the court, the Supreme Court, in action by distributor for breach of wine distributorship contract by wine broker who terminated the contract, which had no termination provision, adopted the "modern majority rule" that when a distributorship contract has no termination provision, it is terminable at will only after a reasonable amount of time and upon reasonable notice. The court held that the rule applied where, as in the case at hand, the distributor had made a substantial investment in establishing or furthering the distributorship. The court deferred to the trier of fact on the issue of what a reasonable amount of time is, stating that absent an abuse of discretion the Supreme Court would not interfere. In the present case, the court upheld the lower court's decision that 24 months was a reasonable amount of time. Bronken's Good Time Co. v. J. W. Brown & Associates, 203 M 427, 661 P2d 861, 40 St. Rep. 549 (1983), followed in Moats Trucking Co., Inc. v. Gallatin Dairies, Inc., 231 M 474, 753 P2d 883, 45 St. Rep. 772 (1988).

Rescission of Lease and Option for Failure of Consideration Upheld: In an action for breach of a lease of certain commercial property, the District Court did not err in denying the defendants' claim for damages based upon wrongful rescission and termination of the contract, which also contained an option to purchase. Upon reading the contract, it is clear that a $17,000 check, which was dishonored for nonsufficient funds, was an essential part of the consideration to be received by the plaintiff upon the defendants' exercise of the option. Rescission was promptly accomplished, and when exercised, the contract, including all of the provisions for default in installment payments, was extinguished. Ragen v. Weston, 191 M 546, 625 P2d 557, 38 St. Rep. 456 (1981).

Termination of Joint Venture: A contract for a joint venture may be terminated by the members but only by the mutual consent of all the members or by a proceeding for rescission. Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

Mutual Consent of Parties — Question of Facts: The court did not err in determining that agency-manager contracts were terminated on a specific date since termination by mutual consent is a question of fact for the court and there was substantial evidence to support the court's determination. Standard Ins. Co. v. Sturdevant, 173 M 23, 566 P2d 52 (1977).

Termination of Agreement for Cause: Defendant's going out of the building materials business in good faith for business reasons did not constitute "cause" as the term was used in the termination provision of a franchise agreement with plaintiff because there was no condition forcing termination and sale of assets. J & S Home Realty, Inc. v. Anaconda Co., 172 M 236, 563 P2d 566 (1977).

Mutual Consent of Parties: This section provides that a contract may be extinguished in like manner with any other obligation and also in the manner prescribed by this chapter. Thus by mutual consent the parties to a contract may terminate the contract and all obligations thereunder. Edwards v. Muri, 73 M 339, 237 P 209 (1925).

Promissory Note Canceled: The promissory note was canceled as a matter of law when the holder of the note intentionally removed the signature of the party to be charged. Northwest Plating Co. v. Hoffman, 234 M 360, 763 P2d 44, 45 St. Rep. 1971 (1988).

Unilateral Material Alteration of Contract: After issuance of title insurance policy, insured signed and returned to insurers an agreement that "the second parties [the title companies] shall not be liable for any claim or claims brought directly by first party [insured] as a result of the presence of either of the two ditches on his lands, which ditches were the subject of the above referred to lawsuit", which was a suit relating to ditch rights and easements that had been settled. The insurers had failed to disclose the existence of the ditch rights and easements. Before signing the agreement, the companies inserted "see insert below" and inserted "except that the payment hereunder by [the title companies] shall be deemed to be in full compensation for any reduction in the value of the insured property of [the insured] caused by the existence of the two ditches". In insured's suit against the companies for failure to defend suits against him by the owner of ditch rights and easements, the companies could not use the altered agreement to avoid paying damages caused by their failure to discover and disclose the ditch rights and easements. It was a material alteration which insured had not agreed to. Lipinski v. Title Ins. Co., 202 M 1, 655 P2d 970, 39 St. Rep. 2283 (1982).

Modification of Listing Agreement and Failure to Provide Copy: A seller's alleged verbal consent to a broker's unsubscribed and unexecuted modification of a listing agreement was not a factual issue precluding summary judgment in light of the statutory and decisional law which is uniformly suspicious of such modifications. As a matter of law, the broker's failure to provide the seller with a copy of the listing agreement also supported the granting of summary judgment. Carnell v. Watson, 176 M 344, 578 P2d 308 (1978). See also WRB-West Associates, Inc. v. Madison Addition Inv. Ltd. Partnership, 270 M 498, 893 P2d 340, 52 St. Rep. 329 (1995).

Alteration of Contract: Where State and condemnee had agreed prior to contract to allow condemnee access to newly constructed highway from one particular spot, but State altered written contract giving condemnee no access at all, it was improper to delete all nonaccess clauses in a reformation of the contract and condemnee should have been allowed only the one access route which the parties had agreed to previously. Crissey v. St. Highway Comm'n, 147 M 374, 413 P2d 308 (1966).

Date of Promissory Note: In a suit on a promissory note an allegation of the answer that the date of the note "has been fraudulently changed by the plaintiff" is a mere conclusion and insufficient to tender issue as to an intentional, material alteration by the plaintiff precluding recovery under this section; where the note was written by the plaintiff's agent at the beginning of a new year, it is not error to permit such agent to testify that he wrote "1904" instead of "1905". McDonald v. Klenze, 52 M 142, 157 P 175 (1916).

Effect of Alteration: The legal effect of the alteration of a written contract is to extinguish all the executory obligations of the contract in favor of the party responsible for it, as against the party who does not consent, and the former cannot maintain an action on the contract in either its original or altered form; while the nonconsenting party loses no right, and is not required to rescind or repudiate the contract as it actually was made, he may ignore the change and hold the party at fault to the contract as originally made. Smith v. Barnes, 51 M 202, 149 P 963 (1915).

MISTAKE

Defaulting Buyer Under Unambiguous Written Contract Cannot Rely Upon Expectations Not Covered by Contract to Avoid Contract — Disposition of Downpayment Amounts Paid and Due — County Not Liable for Negligent Misrepresentation as to Recordability of Deeds and Seller's Title Insurer Not Liable for Loss in Marketability: Documents for the sale and purchase of two sections of land unambiguously showed, and it was undisputed, that the resale of 20-acre parcels by the buyer, the immediate acceptance by the county of 20-acre resale deeds of a type that would make subdivision review unnecessary, and the ability to resell without having to undergo subdivision review were not parts of the bargain. The parties knew that these things were contemplated, but the documents did not refer to them or make them a part of the contract. Before the contract was made, the county indicated that it would accept the 20-acre resale deeds. The deal fell through when the county changed its position after the contract was signed. The buyer failed to pay the whole downpayment, and the seller terminated the contract and kept the paid portion of the downpayment. Precontract discussions on the matter must be disregarded as parol evidence because the documents were unambiguous and did not refer to the matter. The buyer was not entitled to rescind the contract and have the paid portion of the downpayment returned based on mutual mistake or failure of consideration. There was no mutual mistake because the parties knew that it was not a certainty that the county would accept the deeds. There was no failure of consideration because the resale, county acceptance of the deeds, and avoidance of subdivision review were not part of the written contract. In addition, the need for a subdivision review would not make the land unmarketable; at most, its market value decreased and it would take longer to sell it. Furthermore, a party in default is not entitled to rescission. The seller was entitled to terminate the contract. The seller was also entitled to keep an amount of the paid portion of the downpayment equal to the amount by which the contract price for the land exceeded the market value of the land at the time of the breach. The seller was not entitled to keep the remainder of the paid portion of the downpayment or to a judgment for the unpaid portion of the downpayment because the contract did not provide for that remedy. The county was not liable in tort to the seller for negligent misrepresentation, and the buyer's title insurance company was not liable to the seller for the loss in the marketability of the land caused by the need for subdivision review. Yellowstone II Dev. Group, Inc. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 2001 MT 41, 304 M 223, 20 P3d 755 (2001), overruled in Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), to the extent that Yellowstone II held that the determination of whether a term in a contract is ambiguous is not a question involving parol evidence.

Mistaken Valuation of Stock Insufficient Grounds for Rescission of Contract: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds of mistake of fact, arguing that both parties had mistakenly valued stock exchanged during the purchase of another business. The District Court could not rescind a validly formed contract simply because Bitterroot undervalued the stock. A mutual mistake as to value is not necessarily sufficient to rescind a contract (see 17A C.J.S. Contracts §149). The District Court did not err in dismissing the affirmative defense of mistake of fact because the law does not protect a business from its improvident valuation of stock. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Ignorance of Defect Precluding Rescission: Houdashelts sold Lutes a business that had a sump system that was believed by Houdashelts to be legal and properly permitted. Lutes sought to rescind the contract because of constructive fraud, based on Houdashelts's failure to disclose the fact that the sump system did not have the proper permits. Houdashelts were excused from disclosure because of their own ignorance. Therefore, no constructive fraud existed and rescission was improper. Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997).

Contract Based Upon Mutual Mistake as to Workers' Compensation Law on Subrogation Rights of Insurer: Brown entered into a settlement agreement with the State Fund for $52,329.17, less $18,666.67 characterized as the "subrogation due the State Fund". Brown then pursued a third-party claim and settled for less than the policy limits. After the Supreme Court's decision in Zacher v. Am. Ins. Co., 243 M 226, 794 P2d 335 (1990), holding that an insurer is not entitled to subrogation unless the claimant is fully compensated for the injury, Brown sued to recover the money withheld by the State Fund. The Supreme Court held that Brown was entitled to rescind the agreement because the parties had made a mutual mistake as to state law that pertains to subrogation rights. However, the Supreme Court refused to award Brown the money retained by the State Fund on the basis that the whole agreement was void and that the lower court would have to determine the amount of money that Brown was entitled to receive. Brown v. Richard A. Murphy, Inc., 261 M 275, 862 P2d 406, 50 St. Rep. 1330 (1993).

No Finding of Fraud or Mistake in Real Estate Transaction — No Right to Rescission: Riveras sought rescission of a real estate contract after testing the water on a ranch they intended to buy and finding the water to be contaminated. Webers contended, but Riveras denied, that they told the Riveras the water would not test out but that the Weber family had been drinking it for years without problems. The District Court, having had the opportunity to observe and judge the credibility and demeanor of the witnesses, resolved the factual dispute in favor of Webers. Being in a superior position to make that finding and absent clear error in the decision, denial of the right to rescind was proper. Weber v. Rivera, 255 M 195, 841 P2d 534, 49 St. Rep. 969 (1992).

Mutual Mistake — Act of Negligent Third Person Not Required: As a matter of law, mutual mistake does not have to be the result of the negligent act of a third person. Wyman v. DuBray Land Realty, 231 M 294, 752 P2d 196, 45 St. Rep. 621 (1988).

Mutual Mistake Regarding Zoning Ordinance — Rescission Proper: When both parties believed, at the time a contract for deed was executed, that a business was in compliance with a zoning ordinance but the business was later found not to comply, it constituted a mutual mistake of fact under 28-2-409 and rescission was therefore proper under 28-2-1711. Carey v. Wallner, 223 M 260, 725 P2d 557, 43 St. Rep. 1706 (1986), affirmed, 229 M 57, 744 P2d 881, 44 St. Rep. 1778 (1987), and followed in Mitchell v. Boyer, 237 M 434, 774 P2d 384, 46 St. Rep. 928 (1989).

Damages Awarded on Theories of Breach of Contract and Rescission: Appellant argued that the District Court award of damages on both theories of breach of contract and rescission was improper, contending that the remedies were mutually exclusive. The Supreme Court noted that restitution under a theory of rescission can, under some circumstances, be a remedy for breach of contract; however, it was clear from the complaint and judgment in this case that the recovery was in damages for breach of contract and as such was properly computed. Hostetter v. Donlan, 221 M 380, 719 P2d 1243, 43 St. Rep. 909 (1986).

Mutual Mistake Must Defeat Object of Contract: Plaintiffs and defendant entered an agreement whereby defendant would lease condominiums from the plaintiffs and would sell plaintiffs her home. The lease of one of the condominiums contained an option for defendant to purchase the unit by forgiving plaintiffs their obligation under the promissory note on the home. Plaintiffs discovered that the floors in the home sloped north at a rate of 5½ inches over 30 feet. Plaintiffs sought to rescind the contract, and defendant sought specific performance. Plaintiffs contended mutual mistake in the making of the contract. The District Court found that the object of the contract was to furnish plaintiffs with a home to live in. This purpose was not frustrated by the unlevel condition, as defendant's family had lived in the house for 10 years. In order for mutual mistake to warrant rescission of a contract, the mistake must be so substantial and fundamental as to defeat the object of the parties in making the contract. Here, the mistake did not affect the object of the parties and rescission did not lie. Woodahl v. Matthews, 196 M 445, 639 P2d 1165, 39 St. Rep. 238 (1982), followed in Wyman v. DuBray Land Realty, 231 M 294, 752 P2d 196, 45 St. Rep. 621 (1988), and in Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990). See also Halcro v. Moon, 226 M 121, 733 P2d 1305, 44 St. Rep. 504 (1987).

Mutual Mistake — Basis for Rescission: Defendants purchased an irregular tract of land and commenced construction of a commercial building. They were contacted by plaintiff concerning purchase of the building. They consulted an attorney and discussed condominiumizing the building. He suggested as a tax matter that defendant should hold the property long enough to qualify for long-term capital gain treatment. An option to purchase with contract for deed was entered. The deeds and contract were not completed, as a survey was needed for a legal description of the property. The contract contained a provision that defendants provide and pave parking lots north and south of the building. The survey was completed and showed that the building encroached on state and county rights-of-way to the north and south. Plaintiffs then sought to rescind the contract and recover their money. The Supreme Court held that the providing of parking lots was material to the contract and that mutual mistake of fact as to the parking lots was an adequate basis for rescinding the contract. They also held that any findings not made could be implied to support the trial court's decision. Berry v. Romain, 194 M 400, 632 P2d 1127, 38 St. Rep. 1434 (1981).

Misunderstanding of Tax Consequences: A misunderstanding by the plaintiff of tax consequences attendant to a sale agreement is not ground for rescission as a mistake of law when the other party is not aware of or under the same misapprehension. Quinn v. Briggs, 172 M 468, 565 P2d 297 (1977).

Mutual Mistake: Where the buyer and the seller, an administrator, were of the opinion that the realty in question belonged to the latter's decedent, the court mistakenly ordering and approving the sale, and the buyer had made part payment and executed a note for the balance due, there was such a mutual mistake and a failure of consideration as justified a rescission of the contract under this section. Rinio v. Kester, 99 M 1, 41 P2d 405 (1935).

FRAUD

No Misrepresentation Regarding Property Encumbrances — Actual and Constructive Notice to Plaintiffs: It was not an error for the District Court to enforce a settlement agreement despite plaintiffs' allegation of misrepresentation by the defendants regarding property encumbrances. The claims of misrepresentation failed since the plaintiffs had actual notice of the mortgages in the purchase agreement on one parcel and in the warranty deed on another parcel. Alternatively, there was no misrepresentation since the mortgages were recorded, which gave the plaintiffs constructive notice. Hinderman v. Krivor, 2010 MT 230, 358 Mont. 111, 244 P.3d 306.

No Finding of Fraud or Mistake in Real Estate Transaction — No Right to Rescission: Riveras sought rescission of a real estate contract after testing the water on a ranch they intended to buy and finding the water to be contaminated. Webers contended, but Riveras denied, that they told the Riveras the water would not test out but that the Weber family had been drinking it for years without problems. The District Court, having had the opportunity to observe and judge the credibility and demeanor of the witnesses, resolved the factual dispute in favor of Webers. Being in a superior position to make that finding and absent clear error in the decision, denial of the right to rescind was proper. Weber v. Rivera, 255 M 195, 841 P2d 534, 49 St. Rep. 969 (1992), followed in Eissinger v. Mullin Trucking, Inc., 263 M 38, 865 P2d 300, 50 St. Rep. 1695 (1993).

Rescission Barred by Laches: The Supreme Court held that plaintiffs' inability to completely restore defendants to their original condition would not alone foreclose rescission as a remedy. Plaintiffs had notice of circumstances that should have put them on inquiry of possible fraud at the time of sale in 1977 and in 1978 when the net income did not reflect earlier representations. Nevertheless, plaintiffs continued to make payments and operate the business without complaint until 1981. The court held that these facts constituted laches, or a failure to use reasonable diligence to rescind promptly on the part of the plaintiffs. Since the time period between notice of possible fraud and filing of a complaint exceeded the 2-year Statute of Limitations for fraud, the District Court erred in permitting the jury to consider rescission as a remedy for the plaintiffs. McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Bank's Fiduciary Duty to Customers It Gives Financial Advice — Real Estate Sales: Wife, whose husband had recently died, signed a contract for a deed to her ranch with Dittman, who signed as "trustee". There were two other purchasers, who did not sign: a person to whom, according to the evidence, wife would not have knowingly sold and the marketing officer of the bank used by the wife and husband for some 24 years. Wife was unfamiliar with real estate and financial affairs and relied upon the advice of various bank officers with regard to the sale of the ranch. This put the bank in a prima facie fiduciary relationship as to the wife. The relationship and its attendant duties extended to the advising officers in their dealings with the wife in regard to sale of the ranch. The marketing officer thus had a duty to fully inform the wife and protect her interests. This duty he breached, and the breach amounted to constructive fraud, where evidence showed that: (1) the contract price and terms were disadvantageous to the wife; (2) the true purchasers were not disclosed to her either by the contract or the marketing officer; (3) the purchasers intended to and began to subdivide and sell the ranch, though the marketing officer knew wife apparently did not wish this, having refused an earlier offer to purchase with right to subdivide; (4) the marketing officer had extensive financial interests involving loans to him from his bank, and an audit of the bank recommended that in view of this his lending authority should be eliminated or curtailed; and (5) the lower court was unimpressed with the way in which wife's attorney in the negotiations represented her interests. The lower court properly ordered the contract for deed rescinded. Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188, 41 St. Rep. 286 (1984).

Constructive Fraud — Requirement of Breach of Duty: Plaintiffs and defendant entered an agreement whereby defendant would lease condominiums from the plaintiffs and would sell plaintiffs her home. The lease of one of the condominiums contained an option for defendant to purchase the unit by forgiving plaintiffs their obligation under the promissory note on the home. Plaintiffs discovered that the floors in the home slope north at a rate of 5½ inches over 30 feet. Plaintiffs sought to rescind the contract, and defendant sought specific performance. Plaintiffs contended that their consent to the contract was obtained through constructive fraud. Constructive fraud requires the breach of a duty. Defendant and several contractors who performed work on the house testified that they were unaware of the condition of the floors. Plaintiffs inspected the house twice, and their professional appraiser was unaware of the condition during his appraisal. Since defendant was unaware of the defect, she was under no duty to disclose. Because defendant had no duty that she could breach, there was no constructive fraud. Woodahl v. Matthews, 196 M 445, 639 P2d 1165, 39 St. Rep. 238 (1982).

Statements of Property Value Not Grounds for Rescission — Trial Court's Decision on Fraud Issue: The defendants in this case owed the plaintiff a sum of money, and the plaintiff agreed to accept a piece of land as partial satisfaction. The plaintiff never inspected the property until the settlement agreement was executed. Later the plaintiff found he could not sell the parcel for nearly the amount of the debt. The plaintiff then sought rescission because of the defendants' alleged misrepresentations of the nature and value of the property. On review, the Supreme Court held that statements of property value are opinions and do not constitute a proper basis for rescission. It is solely the trial court's decision whether fraud was perpetrated on an innocent purchaser. The Supreme Court noted that the plaintiff's business acumen and the nature of his relationship with the defendants greatly weakened his claim. Dolson Co. v. Imperial Cattle Co., 191 M 357, 624 P2d 993, 38 St. Rep. 306 (1981).

Defrauded Purchaser in Default — No Waiver of Right to Rescind: A purchaser who has been defrauded by a seller in the course of making a contract for sale of real property does not waive his right to rescind the contract even if purchaser is in default as to payments on the property. It would be incongruous to hold that when the purchaser decided to rescind rather than to bring the payments up to date that purchaser waived his right to rescind; purchaser would then be left without a remedy. Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980).

Fraud — Rescission by Purchaser in Default: A vendor's fraud vitiates a contract of sale from its inception, and a purchaser in default may seek rescission. Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980).

Material Misrepresentations in Sale of Real Property — Damages Inadequate: Where seller misrepresents the condition of premises to be sold to the extent that over $27,000 in repairs would be needed to bring the premises up to the condition represented and where repairs would result in a prolonged period during which premises could not be used for business, the misrepresentation is material and damages, as opposed to rescission, would be inappropriate. Moschelle v. Hulse, 190 M 532, 622 P2d 155, 37 St. Rep. 1506 (1980).

False Representations: The sellers of a business falsely represented the profitability of the business and its standing with suppliers and wholesalers to prospective buyers. The buyers relied on and had a right to rely on the truth of the representations and were induced to purchase the business because of the false representations. Upon learning of the falsity of the representations that had induced them to purchase the business, the purchasers had the right to rescind the contract for deed for the purchase of the business. Lumby v. Doetch, 183 M 427, 600 P2d 200 (1979).

Reliance on Fraudulent Representations: Fraud is not established unless the plaintiff proves he relied on the truth of the representations made to him, and where the evidence showed that the plaintiffs relied upon their own investigations and those of a realtor hired by them and not the representations made by the defendant, there was no reliance and no cause of action for fraud. Waller v. Heid, 170 M 501, 554 P2d 1331 (1976).

Compliance With Contract: Rescission of contract alleging fraudulent misrepresentations as to taxes and insurance was properly denied where sellers had paid taxes and procured insurance according to the terms of the sale contract. Dunlap v. Nelson, 165 M 291, 529 P2d 1394 (1974).

Failure to Pass Title: The purchaser of an automobile was entitled to rescind chattel mortgages given for purchase of the car where it was misrepresented by the seller and the seller and the assignee of the chattel mortgages failed to pass title to the buyer. Sonnek v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 140 M 503, 374 P2d 105 (1962), explained in Safeco Ins. Co. of Am. v. NW. Mut. Ins. Co., 142 M 155, 382 P2d 174 (1963).

Insufficient Pleadings: Where defendant in an action to recover the purchase price of personal property in his answer pleaded that the representation of plaintiff that he had title to the property was false but did not allege that plaintiff knew it to be false, that it was made in a manner not warranted by the information possessed by the seller, that it was made with intent to deceive, that the buyer believed it to be true or relied upon it, and that he was deceived by it and misled to his prejudice, the pleading was insufficient to warrant rescission of the contract on the ground of fraud. Courtney v. Gordon, 74 M 408, 241 P 233 (1925).

Election of Remedies: Neither the remedy afforded by this section, giving a party to a contract the right to rescind on the ground of fraud, among others, nor that granted by 28-2-1611, under which he may have the contract reformed on the same ground, is exclusive, each being independent of the other; hence the defrauded party may elect to pursue either remedy. Campana v. Dobry, 69 M 240, 221 P 540 (1923).

Valueless Security: The buyer of a promissory note secured by mortgages on real and personal property, subject to prior liens which were foreclosed by their holders, rendering the security valueless but through no fault of the seller of the note, had no cause of action for rescission (no fraud or deceit having been practiced upon him) under any of the provisions of this section. Simeon v. Klenze, 66 M 341, 213 P 440 (1923).

Fraud in Inducement: If false representations were held out to plaintiff as an inducement for the execution of notes in payment of a subscription for corporate stock upon which it acted, the obligation becomes a nullity and the subscriber may rescind. Equity Cooperative Ass'n v. Milling Co., 63 M 26, 206 P 349 (1922).

Land Contract — Remedies: Where a contract for the purchase of land was procured through false representations whereby the vendee has been deceived and defrauded, he has an election of remedies: he may stand upon the contract and sue for damages or rescind the contract but cannot pursue both. Smith v. Christie, 60 M 604, 201 P 1011 (1921).

Material Misrepresentations: A misrepresentation made by the owner of a ranch to its purchaser that a barn and a spring in close proximity thereto inclosed with a fence were a part of the property sold was material, and sufficient ground for rescission. Fontaine v. Lyng, 61 M 590, 202 P 1112 (1921), distinguished in Estabrook v. Sonstelie, 86 M 435, 284 P 147 (1930).

FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION

Defaulting Buyer Under Unambiguous Written Contract Cannot Rely Upon Expectations Not Covered by Contract to Avoid Contract — Disposition of Downpayment Amounts Paid and Due — County Not Liable for Negligent Misrepresentation as to Recordability of Deeds and Seller's Title Insurer Not Liable for Loss in Marketability: Documents for the sale and purchase of two sections of land unambiguously showed, and it was undisputed, that the resale of 20-acre parcels by the buyer, the immediate acceptance by the county of 20-acre resale deeds of a type that would make subdivision review unnecessary, and the ability to resell without having to undergo subdivision review were not parts of the bargain. The parties knew that these things were contemplated, but the documents did not refer to them or make them a part of the contract. Before the contract was made, the county indicated that it would accept the 20-acre resale deeds. The deal fell through when the county changed its position after the contract was signed. The buyer failed to pay the whole downpayment, and the seller terminated the contract and kept the paid portion of the downpayment. Precontract discussions on the matter must be disregarded as parol evidence because the documents were unambiguous and did not refer to the matter. The buyer was not entitled to rescind the contract and have the paid portion of the downpayment returned based on mutual mistake or failure of consideration. There was no mutual mistake because the parties knew that it was not a certainty that the county would accept the deeds. There was no failure of consideration because the resale, county acceptance of the deeds, and avoidance of subdivision review were not part of the written contract. In addition, the need for a subdivision review would not make the land unmarketable; at most, its market value decreased and it would take longer to sell it. Furthermore, a party in default is not entitled to rescission. The seller was entitled to terminate the contract. The seller was also entitled to keep an amount of the paid portion of the downpayment equal to the amount by which the contract price for the land exceeded the market value of the land at the time of the breach. The seller was not entitled to keep the remainder of the paid portion of the downpayment or to a judgment for the unpaid portion of the downpayment because the contract did not provide for that remedy. The county was not liable in tort to the seller for negligent misrepresentation, and the buyer's title insurance company was not liable to the seller for the loss in the marketability of the land caused by the need for subdivision review. Yellowstone II Dev. Group, Inc. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 2001 MT 41, 304 M 223, 20 P3d 755 (2001), overruled in Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), to the extent that Yellowstone II held that the determination of whether a term in a contract is ambiguous is not a question involving parol evidence.

Reciprocal Rights and Obligations Considered Sufficient Consideration to Sustain Shareholders' Agreement: Following his termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay on grounds of insufficient consideration, contending that the essential consideration for the shareholders' agreement was the exchange of stocks of equal value—an argument based on the premise that the stock exchange and the shareholders' agreement were one agreement. However, the shareholders' agreement was enforceable independent of the stock exchange between the parties, and the creation of reciprocal rights and obligations among the shareholders was sufficient consideration to sustain the shareholders' agreement; thus, the District Court did not err in concluding that the consideration was sufficient. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Materiality of Claim of Failure of Consideration to Contract Required Before Rescission Available as Remedy — Partial Failure of Consideration — Meltdown of Ice Cream Distributorship Agreement: Under Johnson v. Meiers, 118 M 258, 164 P2d 1012 (1946), a breach that goes to only part of the consideration, that is incidental and subordinate to the main purpose of the contract, and that may be compensated in damages does not warrant rescission. The injured party is still bound to perform that party's part of the contract, and the only remedy for the breach consists of the damages suffered from the breach. By contrast, under Van Hook v. Baum, 245 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990), a party may rescind if, through the fault of the other party, consideration fails in whole or in part. In clarifying the disparate holdings, the Supreme Court noted that the term "failure of consideration", as either a claim or an affirmative defense, does not relate to the absence of consideration or whether there is good consideration for the formation of a valid, enforceable contract, but rather the term pertains to the failure of one party's performance, which then suspends or excuses the performance of the other party pursuant to the terms of a valid contract. Failure of consideration is generally synonymous with a material breach of performance of a contract, rather than whether a contract was enforceable because of the absence of the essential element of consideration. Thus, a claim or affirmative defense of failure of consideration that gives rise to the equitable remedy of rescission requires a showing by the claiming party that the other party's failure to perform was, in fact, material to the contract, and whether consideration was sufficient or good is immaterial. To reconcile this holding with this section, the court went on to hold that failure of part of a promised performance may warrant rescission, but only if the claiming party proves that the deficient part of the other party's performance was material to the contract. If the failure to perform was not material, rescission is not an available remedy, performance cannot be excused, and the claiming party "may only be entitled to money damages for breach". Here, the District Court erred when it did not determine whether Norwood's failure to assign an ice cream distributor agreement to Service Distributing, Inc. (SDI), was material to the transaction as a whole. Absent that finding, SDI could not as a matter of law rescind the contract and be excused from further performance of its obligation to Norwood, so the case was remanded to determine whether a material breach occurred. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000). See also Flaig v. Gramm, 1999 MT 181, 295 M 297, 983 P2d 396, 56 St. Rep. 710 (1999).

Immaterial Breach — Suspension of Performance Not Justified: Neighbors constructed a well on one's property. They shared the costs of construction and agreed that the plaintiffs would share in maintenance costs by installing and maintaining a yard light for the benefit of both lots. When the plaintiffs failed to maintain the light, the defendants shut off the plaintiffs' water. The District Court terminated the well agreement. The Supreme Court held that the lower court erred in terminating the agreement because failure to maintain the light was an immaterial breach. Flaig v. Gramm, 1999 MT 181, 295 M 297, 983 P2d 396, 56 St. Rep. 710 (1999).

Alleged Lack of Permit for Business — Legal Consideration: Lutes contended that the contract that he entered with Houdashelts for sale of an engine rebuilding business was void for failure of consideration because the sump system in the business did not have the proper permits and was therefore illegal. The District Court rejected the contention that the system was illegal. The Supreme Court held that the parties had each received good consideration in the simple sale of the business and that rescission was thus improper. Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997).

Contract for Deed — No Right of Buyer to Suspend Performance for Failure of Consideration Not Attributable to Sellers: Petty made the downpayment on a contract for deed that called for conveyance of part of the property to Petty upon downpayment. Petty assumed the property was unzoned. The contract stated that Petty would use the property for a recreational vehicle park and that if after Petty's due diligence Petty could not obtain zoning approval within 30 months after the contract was signed, the purchase price would be reduced by $25,000. The bank that held a preexisting mortgage on the property told Petty it would not release the property until he brought current his payments to the sellers and the bank. Over 30 months passed from the time of the downpayment until the sellers filed suit, during which time Petty made no payments to the sellers or the bank and did not obtain zoning approval. Petty did not request a deed until 27 months after making the downpayment. Petty was not entitled to suspend performance for failure of delivery of the deed and transfer of the property because he was accountable, not the sellers. The award of damages to the sellers was affirmed. Liddle v. Petty, 249 M 442, 816 P2d 1066, 48 St. Rep. 779 (1991), followed in Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000).

Rescission Inapplicable Absent Total Voidness: Plaintiffs, whose home flooded, claimed they were entitled to rescission due to a partial or complete failure of consideration, based in part on slightly reduced property values subsequent to the flood. However, the applicable provision of this section requires that a party may rescind if consideration becomes entirely void. The lessened appraised values were made in apprehension that the property might flood again; therefore, the District Court ruling that there was not an adequate failure of consideration was properly based on evidence and law. Van Hook v. Baum, 254 M 407, 800 P2d 151, 47 St. Rep. 1883 (1990).

Breach of Implied Warranty of Habitability Not Based on Fault: The plaintiffs brought an action for specific performance when the defendants quit making house payments and demanded rescission of a contract for deed. The defendants argued for rescission, alleging that the plaintiffs had breached the implied warranty of habitability. The plaintiffs, a husband and wife, contended that the warranty did not apply to them because they were not "builder-vendors" as contemplated by Montana case law. The Supreme Court held that the warranty did apply because the plaintiffs had built and sold two other houses prior to the one sold the defendants and though the plaintiffs were only amateur builders, the theory behind the warranty is not to discern fault but to place liability on the one most able to prevent the harm. Pracht v. Rollins, 239 M 62, 779 P2d 57, 46 St. Rep. 1513 (1989).

Licensing Requirement as Partial Failure of Consideration in Sale of Business — Rescission Proper: When the seller warranted in a special provision of a contract for deed that no license was required to operate a business and that no restrictions or license would be required as a result of change of ownership and seller later defaulted under these terms when it was discovered that a license was required but denied, it constituted a partial failure of consideration under 28-2-801 because seller did not transfer a going business and buyer was unable to operate the kind of business intended at the time of purchase. Rescission was therefore proper under 28-2-1711. Carey v. Wallner, 223 M 260, 725 P2d 557, 43 St. Rep. 1706 (1986), affirmed, 229 M 57, 744 P2d 881, 44 St. Rep. 1778 (1987).

Inability to Record Deed — Basis for Rescission of Contract: Plaintiffs purchased land from the defendants. The description of the land in the deed to defendants and in the notice of real estate contract, both of which were filed with the county, were identical. When the plaintiffs tried to convey the land to a third party, using the same description, the county refused to record the deed, relying on a 1981 Attorney General's opinion which had been issued subsequent to the prior filings. The District Court granted summary judgment for the plaintiffs, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the plaintiffs could not get a recordable title without suing for rescission or suing the county to require recording, the defendants could not deliver a marketable title to the plaintiffs and plaintiffs were entitled to rescission. McCarthy v. Timberland Resources, Inc., 219 M 278, 712 P2d 1292, 42 St. Rep. 2016 (1985).

Alteration of Oral Contract — Rescission — Damages: Plaintiffs had an oral agreement with defendants to pay one-half of defendants' purchase price under defendants' written contract for deed for purchase of certain real property with the understanding that plaintiffs' names would be added to the title as copurchasers. Without plaintiffs' consent, defendants made written assignment of their interests under the written contract to a third party, retaining a life estate to themselves. Plaintiffs refused to make further payments and sued for damages and to quiet title in themselves. The District Court denied plaintiffs' claims and in effect found plaintiffs to be the breaching party. The Supreme Court found plaintiffs were entitled to rescission and reversed the District Court decision. Defendants' assignment while retaining a life estate constituted a material alteration of the oral agreement to which plaintiffs had not consented. Defendants' breach entitled plaintiffs to recover money they had paid on the contract with interest. Forsythe v. Elkins, 216 M 108, 700 P2d 596, 42 St. Rep. 680 (1985).

Action to Set Aside Quitclaim Deed — No Failure of Consideration Proved: The plaintiff, son of a deceased rancher, received 24½% of the surface rights to his father's ranch in accordance with the terms of an estate plan established for the benefit of the plaintiff and his brothers, the defendants. Upon leaving the ranch, plaintiff executed one quitclaim deed to his mineral interest in 1977 and one quitclaim deed to his surface interest in 1968 in exchange for a promise that the defendants would hold him harmless on a promissory note. The District Court did not err (in a subsequent challenge by the plaintiff to the validity of the quitclaim deeds) in declaring both deeds to be valid and denying the plaintiff any interest in the ranch. The facts and law do not support the plaintiff's contention that there was a failure of consideration for his signing the two quitclaim deeds. First, 28-2-1711 is not applicable, because under 70-1-502 consideration for the transfer of real property is not required. Second, the facts of the case show that the plaintiff was indemnified for signing the two deeds by the defendants' agreement to hold the plaintiff harmless on the promissory note. That is sufficient consideration. Turley v. Turley, 199 M 265, 649 P2d 434, 39 St. Rep. 1336 (1982).

Rescission of Lease and Option for Failure of Consideration Upheld: In an action for breach of a lease of certain commercial property, the District Court did not err in denying the defendants' claim for damages based upon wrongful rescission and termination of the contract, which also contained an option to purchase. Upon reading the contract, it is clear that a $17,000 check, which was dishonored for nonsufficient funds, was an essential part of the consideration to be received by the plaintiff upon the defendants' exercise of the option. Rescission was promptly accomplished, and when exercised, the contract, including all of the provisions for default in installment payments, was extinguished. Ragen v. Weston, 191 M 546, 625 P2d 557, 38 St. Rep. 456 (1981).

Rescission of Landfill Operation Contract — Operator Unlicensed: The county refuse board contracted with the appellant to operate a landfill. Because of his own fault and disregard, the appellant failed to comply with the statutory and contractual requirements to obtain a license to operate the landfill. As a result of this failure, the Department of Health Solid Waste Management Bureau began refusing to lift sanitary restrictions on proposed subdivisions in the area. The refusal in effect prevented the approval of those subdivisions for solid waste disposal and thereby exposed the County Commissioners to potential liability. When the County Commissioners chose to terminate the appellant's contract, there was a failure of consideration through the fault of the defendant, resulting in an alteration of the Commissioners' position to their prejudice. Consequently, the trial court acted properly in rescinding the contract. Ryan v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 190 M 273, 620 P2d 1203, 37 St. Rep. 1965 (1980).

Substantial Failure of Consideration: Trial court's finding of substantial failure of consideration in mobile home sale was upheld and rescission by buyer allowed. Compton v. Alcorn, 171 M 230, 557 P2d 292 (1976).

Failure of Consideration for Any Cause: Under this section party may rescind contract when consideration for his obligation fails in whole or in part through fault of party as to whom he rescinds, or if such consideration, before it is rendered to him, fails in material respect from any cause. Brown v. First Fed. S & L Ass'n of Great Falls, 154 M 79, 460 P2d 97 (1969), overruled, to the extent that this case holds that no recovery can be allowed for an injury that results from an intervening act of a third party, in Estate of Strever v. Cline, 278 M 165, 924 P2d 666, 53 St. Rep. 576 (1996).

Failure to Register: Chattel mortgages given for the purchase of an automobile were without consideration where vendor failed to register transfer under 61-3-201 which was necessary to pass title to the buyer. Sonnek v. Universal C.I.T. Credit Corp., 140 M 503, 374 P2d 105 (1962), explained in Safeco Ins. Co. of Am. v. NW. Mut. Ins. Co., 142 M 155, 382 P2d 174 (1963).

Rescission of Partnership Agreement Barred by Laches: Rescission of a partnership agreement lies under this section where consideration fails, but where there was no such failure upon creation of the relationship but mere breaches in manner of operation after the relationship was established it may not be resorted to. Where defendant refused for several years to deliver to the partnership two pairs of foxes as part of the consideration to be furnished by him, plaintiff's complaint impliedly shows, on its face, laches, and plaintiff's choice to affirm the agreement instead of promptly rescinding it is hence subject to general demurrer. Lommasson v. Hall, 111 M 142, 106 P2d 1089 (1940).

Failure to Deliver Possession: Partial failure of consideration of a contract though ground for rescission does not support a plea of entire failure thereof; therefore evidence, in an action by a chattel mortgagor to enjoin the sale of sheep under a mortgage given to secure the rental of a tract of grazing land comprising 800 acres, that defendant lessors were unable to deliver possession of 320 acres thereof, held by another under a prior lease, was insufficient to support an allegation of entire failure of consideration for the contract of lease. Nelson v. Davenport, 86 M 1, 281 P 537 (1929).

Personal Property Sale: A buyer cannot rescind a sale of personal property on the ground of failure of consideration until he has been disturbed in his possession or otherwise suffered damages. Courtney v. Gordon, 74 M 408, 241 P 233 (1925).

Executory Contract Required: Subsection (4) of this section authorizing rescission if consideration for the contract fails in a material respect from any cause applies only to executory, not executed, contracts, i.e., where there has been a change in the situation causing the consideration to fail between the time of its making and its execution. Simeon v. Klenze, 66 M 341, 213 P 440 (1923).

MUTUAL AGREEMENT

Notice of Rescission Required: As part of a subdivision, the developers and the county reserved from the dedication a 1-foot strip of land adjacent to the exterior boundary. The reservation could be voided by the County Commission in the public interest for the purpose of ensuring good traffic circulation. A dispute arose between the developers and adjoining landowners over the use of subdivision streets. The County Commissioners, acting on the advice of the County Surveyor and a deputy county attorney, unilaterally rescinded the reservation agreement. Although the resolution rescinding the agreement was filed with the Clerk and Recorder, the developers claimed no actual knowledge and the resolution did not appear in the official county file concerning the subdivision. The Supreme Court, relying on Small v. Coca-Cola Bottling Co., 134 M 168, 328 P2d 124 (1958), held that although written notice is not required to rescind, both parties must assent to and be aware of the rescission in order for it to be effective. Notice had to be received by the developers for the rescission to be effective, and the jury should have been so instructed. Smith v. Moran, 215 M 31, 693 P2d 1246, 42 St. Rep. 152 (1985).

Oral Cancellation of Insurance Policy: The lower court properly found that defendant's policy had been canceled by mutual oral agreement, leaving plaintiff liable for the entire loss on its policy issued to the insured. Nat'l Indem. Co. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 176 M 137, 576 P2d 733 (1978).

Exclusive Listing Agreement: In the instant case there was no mutual assent as is required for the effective rescission of a contract. McDonald & Co. v. Fishtail Creek Ranch, 175 M 53, 572 P2d 195 (1977).

Oral Termination: A written lease for term of years may be terminated by an oral agreement provided the conduct of the parties is consistent with such an agreement. Rodgers v. Saunders, 144 M 424, 396 P2d 817 (1964).

Mutual Consent to Termination: The parties to an executory written agreement may terminate it at any time by mutual consent independently of any express agreement so provided, and it is immaterial whether the termination is characterized as abandonment, cancellation, mutual rescission, or waiver, and may be established by parol evidence. However, mutual cancellation of the contract must be clearly expressed and shown, and acts and conduct of the parties to be sufficient must be clear, convincing, and inconsistent with the existence of the contract. W. River Equip. Co. v. Holzworth Constr. Co., 134 M 582, 335 P2d 298 (1959). See also Jorgensen v. Trademark Woodworks, LLC, 2018 MT 291, 393 Mont. 381, 431 P.3d 29.

Characterization Immaterial: The parties to an executory written contract could by mutual consent terminate it independently of any express agreements so providing, and it is immaterial whether such termination is characterized as an abandonment, cancellation, mutual rescission, or waiver, and the effect of such termination was to relieve the parties from going forward under such written contract. Eggers v. Gen. Refrigeration Co., 123 M 205, 210 P2d 636 (1949); Kester v. Nelson, 92 M 69, 10 P2d 379 (1932).

Written Contract Rescinded by Oral Consent: Under this section rescission of a contract may be had by mutual consent and a written contract may be rescinded by mutual consent not expressed in writing. Barnard-Curtiss Co. v. Maehl, 117 F2d 7 (9th Cir. 1941).

Mutual Consent — Allegation in Answer Sufficient: The parties to an executory contract of sale of real property may terminate it by mutual consent independently of any provision in the contract permitting them to do so; hence, an allegation in defendant's answer to a complaint for the specific performance of the contract that plaintiff had informed him that if the abstract furnished was not satisfactory the deal would be called off and that he accepted the offer to terminate the contract, was sufficient to show a mutual rescission of the contract a good defense, and was proof against a general demurrer (demurrer abolished, former Rule 7(c), M.R.Civ.P., now superseded) and motion to strike. Ogg v. Herman, 71 M 10, 227 P 476 (1924).

GENERAL

Waiver of Contract Rights — Late Payments Not Considered Breach Based on Prior Acceptance: The uninsured employers' fund (UEF) sought indemnity from an employer that did not have workers' compensation insurance using a monthly payment arrangement that was agreed to by the parties. The UEF accepted four late payments before turning the employer over to collections, at which point the employer sued UEF for breach of contract. The Supreme Court held that UEF waived its right to terminate the contract based on late payment when it accepted late payments without objection. Consequently, it was a breach of contract for the UEF to turn the employer over to collections and the employer was entitled to damages. Elk Mtn. Motor Sports, Inc. v. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2012 MT 261, 367 Mont. 36, 289 P.3d 165.

Validity of Voluntary Easement Affirmed: The Permanns requested that Urick grant an easement across Urick's property for the Permanns to go camping and move cattle, and Urick agreed. When Urick's sons discovered that the voluntary easement had been granted, they persuaded Urick to rescind the easement. Urick requested that the Permanns convey the easement back to her. They refused. Urick filed suit and then subsequently died. Urick's son Gliko, as trustee of Urick's estate, brought an action against the Permanns seeking to have the easement rescinded, citing mutual mistake, constructive fraud, undue influence, and lack of consideration. The District Court held that the easement was valid, and Gliko appealed. The Supreme Court considered each of Gliko's rescission arguments in turn. The language of the easement was simple and unambiguous, so there was no mutual mistake. Urick had testified by deposition that no misleading statements were made relating to the easement, so there was no constructive fraud. There was no confidential relationship between Urick and the Permanns, Urick was not possessed of weakness of mind, and no advantage was taken of Urick's necessities or distress, so there was no undue influence. Last, there was no evidence that consideration was meant to be given, so lack of consideration was not a valid ground for rescission. The District Court was affirmed. Gliko v. Permann, 2006 MT 30, 331 M 112, 130 P3d 155 (2006).

Absence of Evidence of Rescission, Release, Waiver, or Accord and Satisfaction of Contract — Reversal Warranted: Plaintiffs owned shares in defendant's corporation and sought to sell the shares back to the corporation. The corporation sent a letter offering to purchase the shares for $64,933.60, and plaintiffs were instructed that to accept the offer, they were to sign the back of the stock certificate and mail it to the corporation. Plaintiffs did so, but included with the certificate a letter stating that by accepting the offer, plaintiffs reserved their rights under federal and state law. The corporation found the language unacceptable and declined to purchase the shares, instead returning the certificate to plaintiffs. Concerned about possessing a signed stock certificate, plaintiffs ultimately visited the corporation and surrendered the endorsed certificate in exchange for a new one. Plaintiffs then brought a breach of contract suit claiming $64,933.60 in damages, asserting that the corporation had breached its offer to repurchase the stock. The corporation denied that a contract offer existed, arguing that plaintiffs' reply was not an acceptance but rather a counteroffer, and asserted that even if a contract did exist, plaintiffs had waived their rights under it by forfeiting the endorsed certificate in favor of a new one and by failing to immediately assert their rights under the contract. A jury found that the corporation had breached its contract, causing damages in the amount of $64,933.60, but then entered a verdict for the corporation on grounds that the corporation had proved at least one of its affirmative defenses of rescission, release, waiver, or accord and satisfaction. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that only in rare cases should a jury verdict be set aside but reversed the verdict nevertheless on grounds that, even drawing all legitimate inferences in favor of the corporation, there was a complete absence of probative evidence supporting any of the corporation's affirmative defenses. The case was remanded for entry of judgment of $64,933.60 in favor of plaintiffs. Benson v. Diverse Computer Corp., 2004 MT 114, 321 M 140, 89 P3d 981 (2004), followed in Harland v. Anderson Ranch Co., 2004 MT 132, 321 M 338, 92 P3d 1160 (2004).

Federal Law Regarding Nonliability for Borrower's Payment of Fees to Lender Upon Loan Rescission Inapplicable to Mortgage Broker Fees: Plaintiff helped defendant secure a loan, which defendant subsequently rescinded within the applicable 3-day period pursuant to the federal Truth in Lending Act. Plaintiff sent defendant a bill for its brokerage fee and out-of-pocket expenses incurred in securing the loan commitment, as provided in the brokerage contract and an attendant promissory note. Defendant refused to pay the bill, and plaintiff brought an action to enforce the contract and promissory note, and the District Court enforced the note and ordered defendant to pay the bill. Defendant appealed on grounds that 16 U.S.C. 1635(b) of the Truth in Lending Act and 12 CFR 226.23, Regulation Z, clearly provide that when a consumer rescinds a transaction, the consumer is not liable for any amount, including any finance charge. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court ruling. Although the federal law protects defendant from paying any fees to the lender, it does not address arrangements between a borrower and a mortgage broker, and in fact, portions of Regulation Z at 12 CFR 226.4(a) expressly exclude appraisal and service fees from the definition of a finance charge. Therefore, even though defendant effectively rescinded that mortgage with the lender, the rescission did not affect or alter defendant's obligation to the mortgage broker pursuant to the brokerage contract and promissory note. Mortgage Source, Inc. v. Strong, 2003 MT 205, 317 M 37, 75 P3d 304 (2003).

Dispute Over Contract to Deliver Log Home — No Requirement That Seller Provide Name of Third Party Boom Truck Operator — Rescission Proper Remedy for Material Breach of Contract: Anderson agreed to purchase a log home from Eschenbacher. The home was designed to be constructed on Anderson's homesite. Eschenbacher drafted the purchase contract, which provided that Eschenbacher would act only as a manufacturer, not as a building contractor, and also required Anderson to coordinate and ensure availability of a boom truck to assemble the structure at the site. Anderson contacted a third party to supply a boom truck instead of using Eschenbacher's truck. Eschenbacher then refused to deliver the logs unless Anderson supplied the name of the other boom truck operator. Both parties sued for breach of contract. The District Court concluded that Anderson was under no duty to provide Eschenbacher with the name of the boom truck operator, and the Supreme Court agreed. The contract clearly placed the responsibility for acquiring a boom truck with Anderson, but did not require Eschenbacher to use it, because other language required Anderson to pay any expenses incurred by Eschenbacher for waiting once the logs were delivered, if, for instance, the boom truck that Anderson provided was inadequate. Construing the contract most strongly against the drafter, Eschenbacher, the court found that Eschenbacher could easily have inserted provisions in the contract regarding specifications of an adequate boom truck, but he did not. Eschenbacher materially breached the contract by refusing to deliver the logs until the boom truck dispute was settled. The contract did not specify a remedy; thus, the District Court did not err in granting Anderson rescission of the contract. Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Lack of Justification in Relying on Allegedly False Information — Claim of Negligent Misrepresentation Properly Dismissed: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds of negligent misrepresentation, alleging that Bitterroot relied on Knutson's allegedly false information regarding the value of stock acquired through purchase of another company. However, the definition of negligent misrepresentation set out in St. Bank of Townsend v. Maryann's, Inc., 204 M 21, 664 P2d 295 (1983), requires that the party asserting that defense was justified in relying on the allegedly false information. In this case, Spencer, majority shareholder and president of both Bitterroot and the company that was acquired, knew the respective values of both companies and their stocks and knew that the book values were disparate at the time of the transaction. Thus, Spencer's assertion that he was misled by Knutson was neither credible nor supported by the record, and the District Court correctly dismissed Spencer's claim of negligent misrepresentation. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Misvaluation of Corporate Stock Not Constituting Breach of Fiduciary Duty: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds that Knutson breached his fiduciary duty to Bitterroot, arguing that Knutson's mistaken valuation of stock acquired during the purchase of another business constituted a breach of that duty. Bitterroot did not contend that Knutson acted in bad faith, but only that he was wrong about the stock value. Applying the standard in 35-1-443 (now repealed), the Supreme Court found that Knutson's inaccurate stock valuation did not constitute a breach of fiduciary duty and that the District Court did not err in dismissing Bitterroot's claim that Knutson breached his fiduciary obligation. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000). See also 18A Am. Jur. 2d Corporations § 451 and 18B Am. Jur. 2d Corporations § 1705.

Truth Regarding Value of Stock Discoverable by Party Claiming Estoppel — Defense Not Available: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds of equitable estoppel, arguing that stock had been mistakenly valued during the purchase of another business, that Spencer, majority shareholder and president of both Bitterroot and the company that was acquired, relied on Knutson's valuation to Spencer's detriment, and that Spencer was unaware of factors that Knutson failed to consider. Spencer may have been mistaken about the value of the stock, but he was in a position to discover all the information necessary to value it and participated in its valuation. The truth regarding the stocks' value was as discoverable to Spencer as to anyone else, and the District Court did not err in dismissing Bitterroot's defense of equitable estoppel. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000), following Elk Park Ranch, Inc. v. Park County, 282 M 154, 935 P2d 1131 (1997).

Failure to Timely Enforce Contract Provision Insufficient of Itself to Constitute Waiver — Proof of Waiver — Reasonable Diligence Required of Rescinding Party: Mere failure to take steps to enforce a legal right under a contract in a timely manner is not, by itself, sufficient to constitute proof of waiver. Rather, a party claiming waiver must prove that the language or conduct by the other party showed unequivocally that the party voluntarily and intentionally relinquished the right to receive the full benefit of the contract. (See Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).) Even though a party may be entitled to rescind a contract because of failure of consideration, the rescinding party must take action within a reasonable time upon discovering the facts that enable the rescission. Here, the District Court erred in concluding, without first determining whether the provisions of 28-2-1713 were complied with, that purchasers under a contract could rescind for failure of consideration. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000), following Liddle v. Petty, 249 M 442, 816 P2d 1066, 48 St. Rep. 779 (1991).

Specification of Acreage Quantities by Approximation Indicative of Sale of Property in Gross: Language in a deed conveyed property described as "about 7 acres" and "approximately 7 acres". The actual legal description of the property was omitted from the chain of title beginning in 1950 and was not included in any subsequent deed, although the property was resold two more times. In a quiet title action, the District Court ruled that the size of the parcel was unimportant because the property had been conveyed in gross, with each party taking the risk of the actual quantity varying, so the exact quantity was immaterial. The Supreme Court agreed. Although words of estimation alone do not necessarily create a sale in gross, the plain meaning of the words "about" and "approximately" indicated that the parties did not intend to convey a precise number of acres, and the specification of acreage quantities, when qualified by words of approximation, rendered the acreage quantities merely descriptive rather than material to the agreement, thus indicating a sale in gross. Because the conveyance was a sale in gross, the variation in acreage was not grounds for rescission, nor did the acreage discrepancies in the relevant conveyances raise a genuine issue of material fact precluding summary judgment because the grantor's acreage-consistent description of the property boundaries controlled over the inconsistent acreage estimates in the conveyances. Cedar Lane Ranch, Inc. v. Lundberg, 1999 MT 299, 297 M 145, 991 P2d 440, 56 St. Rep. 1207 (1999), following Hardin v. Hill, 149 M 68, 423 P2d 309 (1967), and Turner v. Ferrin, 232 M 146, 757 P2d 335, 45 St. Rep. 946 (1988).

Equipment Rental Agreement Not Mutually Rescinded: Carl Weissman & Sons (CWS) agreed to rent a rock drill to D&L Thomas Equipment (D&L). A clause in the rental agreement required D&L to inspect the drill and notify CWS within 10 days specifying any defects and provided that if CWS was not notified, the drill would be conclusively presumed to have been accepted in its condition at the time of receipt. D&L contended that there were problems with the drill immediately after it was received, but did not notify CWS in writing within the 10-day period specified in the rental agreement. A fax sent by CWS expressed regret that the machine didn't work out and requested that the drill not be returned pending diversion to another location. D&L asserted that the fax constituted proof that the agreement had been canceled. A contract may be rescinded if all the parties consent and if mutual cancellation is clearly expressed and acts and conduct of the parties are clear, convincing, and inconsistent with the existence of the contract. In this case, the fax and the actions of the parties did not amount to a clear expression of the intent necessary to establish mutual rescission. Carl Weissman & Sons v. D&L Thomas Equip. Corp., 1998 MT 213, 290 M 433, 963 P2d 1263, 55 St. Rep. 896 (1998).

Rescission Not Allowed When Return to Precontract Status Not Possible: Lutes sought to rescind a contract based on the fact that he mistakenly believed that the sump system in a business that he purchased had the proper permits. The District Court correctly concluded that rescission was not proper because rescission would not restore Houdashelts, the property sellers, to their precontract position. Houdashelts had sold Lutes a profitable business with a working sump system, permitted or not, and, upon repossession, received back a business that was losing money, that had a dwindling customer base, and that had a large pollution problem that was caused by Lutes. Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997).

Mutual Mistake of Any Material Fact as Warranting Rescission of Workers' Compensation Settlement: South injured her back on the job and underwent surgery twice to correct the problems. She entered into a full and final compromise settlement agreement with her insurer. The agreement listed seven jobs that both parties felt were acceptable for South to do. One of the jobs was massage therapy. South began training as a massage therapist but began experiencing back pain again, forcing her to quit the training and to undergo back surgery a third time. South then petitioned the Workers' Compensation Court to rescind the settlement agreement on grounds of mutual mistake of fact. The court denied her petition, treating the current problem as a new and different injury. The Supreme Court clarified Kienas v. Peterson, 191 M 325, 624 P2d 1 (1980), in holding that under fundamental contract principles for rescission, a mutual mistake regarding the nature or extent of a claimant's injury is not the only mutual mistake sufficient to set aside a final settlement agreement. Rather, if a party can show a mutual mistake of any material fact that impacts the contract to such an extent that the intended bargain of the parties is defeated, the contract may be rescinded. The operative question is whether a mutual mistake existed that justified rescission, without limitation to how or when the mistake was made. Even though the parties were not mistaken regarding the nature and extent of South's injury at the time that the contract was formed, both parties mistakenly believed that massage therapy was an appropriate job for South to pursue, and she relied on that fact to her detriment. It was error for the Workers' Compensation Court to fail to consider South's contention of mutual mistake regarding the propriety of the job approved for her to do; thus, she was entitled to rescission of the settlement agreement. South v. Transp. Ins. Co., 275 M 397, 913 P2d 233, 53 St. Rep. 196 (1996).

Modification Proper Despite Wife's Limited Capacity: After the parties' divorce, the husband, Arthur, was given an opportunity to retire early from the railroad. He contacted his ex-wife, Shirley, and the parties modified the divorce settlement to allow him to take early retirement. At the hearing to modify the decree, Shirley's attorney argued that the modification was inequitable and that Shirley had been diagnosed with a schizoaffective disorder so that she was unable to give an informed consent to the modification. The Supreme Court held that the evidence indicated that Shirley was better off under the new agreement and that the evidence also showed that the modification negotiations between the parties were amiable and that Shirley had consulted with her adult children and parents prior to signing the agreement. In re Marriage of Brownell, 263 M 78, 865 P2d 307, 50 St. Rep. 1714 (1993).

Challenge of Validity of Release on Basis of Unconscionability — Summary Judgment Improper: Plaintiff signed a release for personal injuries with an insurance company in exchange for $8,900. Plaintiff later sued insureds, who were granted summary judgment after pleading the affirmative defense of release. However, a release is governed by contract law and may be rescinded for the same reasons that allow rescission of a contract. Therefore, the validity of a release may be challenged on the basis of unconscionability. The Supreme Court reversed the grant of summary judgment after finding the release was unconscionable based on: (1) plaintiff's dire financial situation, lack of education and legal advice, and vulnerability; (2) substantial uncertainty as to the extent of injury and future prognosis at the time of settlement; and (3) haste in executing the release. Taken together, the circumstances raised an issue of fact whether justice was done, precluding summary judgment. Kelly v. Widner, 236 M 523, 771 P2d 142, 46 St. Rep. 591 (1989).

Commission as Evidence of Fiduciary Relationship — Rescission by Principal: The District Court did not err in relying on the explicit definition of the word "commission" in finding that a real estate agent who was granted a commission for the sale of a resort while intending to be one of the ultimate purchasers was acting in a fiduciary capacity in his relationship with the principal. Because the relationship existed, the sales agreement was voidable and subject to rescission by the principal. Boyne, U.S.A., Inc. v. Mallas, 236 M 305, 769 P2d 1235, 46 St. Rep. 380 (1989).

Variation in Acreage of Land Sold in Gross — Not Grounds for Rescission: Generally when land is sold in gross, a variation in acreage from what the parties had contemplated is not grounds for rescission. A bulk real estate transaction in which plaintiffs purchased "96.73 acres, more or less" was found to be a sale in gross, and a 6% acreage variation was held immaterial. Turner v. Ferrin, 232 M 146, 757 P2d 335, 45 St. Rep. 946 (1988), citing Hardin v. Hill, 149 M 68, 423 P2d 309 (1967), and followed in Cedar Lane Ranch, Inc. v. Lundberg, 1999 MT 299, 297 M 145, 991 P2d 440, 56 St. Rep. 1207 (1999).

Valid Release of Insurance Claims as Binding: Plaintiff injured in an automobile accident received $4,362.85 for medical expenses, lost wages, car rental costs, headaches, and inconvenience. In return for the settlement payments, the adjuster obtained a general liability release discharging the insurance company "from all claims, demands, damages, actions, causes of action or suits of any kind or nature whatsoever . . . [for] all injuries, known or unknown". Plaintiff sent a thank you note to the adjuster to express her pleasure with the "settlement and prompt service" but also retained an attorney on the case who attempted to obtain rescission of the release after receiving a copy of plaintiff's medical report. Rescission was denied upon a finding that plaintiff executed a valid release of all claims and that the terms of the agreement and release were clear and unambiguous. Plaintiff was bound by the settlement terms. Hanson v. Oljar, 231 M 272, 752 P2d 187, 45 St. Rep. 602 (1988).

Costs Provided by Contract Allowable Despite Tortious Nature of Claim: In an action by plaintiff to rescind a contract for sale of real property because of alleged fraud, misrepresentation, undue influence, and unconscionability, the award of attorney fees and costs that the contract provided to the successful defendant, relating to his defense and counterclaim of wrongful occupation by the plaintiff, was proper notwithstanding the contention that the action sounded in tort and not in contract (citing Winer v. Jonal Corp., 169 M 247, 545 P2d 1094 (1976)). The underlying action was based on a contract dispute. Westlake v. Osborne, 230 M 364, 750 P2d 444, 45 St. Rep. 277 (1988).

Completion of Survey Not Condition Precedent: Buyer breached buy-sell agreement, claiming he is entitled to rescission because of sellers' refusal to permit a survey of the real property prior to closing of the sale. The court properly held that there is no language in the contract indicating completion of a survey to be a condition precedent to closing. Because the sellers had performed all material conditions precedent, they are entitled to specific performance. Hillstrom v. O'Neil, 226 M 452, 736 P2d 126, 44 St. Rep. 795 (1987).

Alteration of Oral Contract — Rescission — Damages: Plaintiffs had an oral agreement with defendants to pay one-half of defendants' purchase price under defendants' written contract for deed for purchase of certain real property with the understanding that plaintiffs' names would be added to the title as copurchasers. Without plaintiffs' consent, defendants made written assignment of their interests under the written contract to a third party, retaining a life estate to themselves. Plaintiffs refused to make further payments and sued for damages and to quiet title in themselves. The District Court denied plaintiffs' claims and in effect found plaintiffs to be the breaching party. The Supreme Court found plaintiffs were entitled to rescission and reversed the District Court decision. Defendants' assignment while retaining a life estate constituted a material alteration of the oral agreement to which plaintiffs had not consented. Defendants' breach entitled plaintiffs to recover money they had paid on the contract with interest. Forsythe v. Elkins, 216 M 108, 700 P2d 596, 42 St. Rep. 680 (1985).

Laches Defense Unavailable — First Raised on Appeal: Laches could not be raised for the first time on appeal as a defense to action for rescission of contract for the sale of a ranch because it is an affirmative defense that must be set forth in the answer. Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188, 41 St. Rep. 286 (1984).

Exemplary Damages: In an action to rescind a contract to purchase an automobile, there was no requirement that plaintiff show malice, oppression, or fraud on the part of the seller in order to recover exemplary damages under 30-14-133. T & W Chevrolet v. Darvial, 196 M 287, 641 P2d 1368, 39 St. Rep. 112 (1982).

Waiver of Right of Rescission: After purchasing automobile from defendant, plaintiff learned of a substantial dangerous defect in the automobile. Plaintiff promptly notified defendant of defect and during week following defendant's inspection of automobile gave notice of rescission of purchase contract. Court held plaintiff acted properly and in a timely fashion in rescinding the contract. T & W Chevrolet v. Darvial, 196 M 287, 641 P2d 1368, 39 St. Rep. 112 (1982).

Failure to Make Contract for Deed Payments: Where buyer of real estate under contract for deed failed to make two monthly payments, notice of default was sent to his address by registered mail as required by the contract, and buyer did not claim the notice at the post office when he knew it was there or make payment, the lower court properly terminated the contract and granted possession of the property to sellers. Hares v. Nelson, 195 M 463, 637 P2d 19, 38 St. Rep. 2036 (1981), followed in Wise v. Sebena, 248 M 32, 808 P2d 494, 48 St. Rep. 309 (1991).

No Rescission When Prior Breach: The plaintiff in a breach of contract action had hired a second contractor to finish building a basement after the first contractor had breached. The defendants argued that the plaintiff had thereby rescinded the contract and that they were thereby entitled to the reasonable value of the work performed to that point. The Supreme Court noted that the trial court decision was based on a prior breach of contract by the defendants and therefore concluded the argument lacked merit. Carriger v. Ballenger, 192 M 479, 628 P2d 1106, 38 St. Rep. 864 (1981).

Contracts — Defaulting Party's Right to Accounting — Contract Entire or Divisible: To determine whether or not a party defaulting on a contract is entitled to an accounting (either contractually or equitably), it must be determined first whether the contract was entire or severable. This depends very largely on contractual terms and on the intention of the parties disclosed by those terms. As a general rule, a contract is entire when by its terms, nature, and purpose it contemplates and intends that each and all of its parts are interdependent and common to one another and to the consideration. A contract contemplating the feeding of cattle by one party until 80% graded "choice", followed by sale and splitting of the proceeds with the supplier of the cattle, was held clearly intended to be entire and nonseverable. The feeder's default and abandonment completely frustrated the purpose, intent, and terms of the joint venture agreement. The feeder thereby forfeited any right it may have had to an accounting under the contract. When the joint venture was destroyed by abandonment by one of the joint venturers, equity would not compel an accounting because a wrongdoer may not take advantage of his own wrong. Roundup Cattle Feeders v. Horpestad, 184 M 480, 603 P2d 1044 (1979), distinguishing Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

Impossibility of Performance of Contract: A joint venture was formed, the contract contemplating the feeding of cattle by one party until 80% graded "choice", followed by sale and splitting of the proceeds with the supplier of cattle, who was the second party. A drop in cattle prices which caused the feeder to lose his financing was not a case of commercial impossibility for two reasons. First, in order for commercial impossibility to excuse performance of a contract, the parties thereto must have had no reason to foresee the impossibility at the time they contracted. Fluctuation in cattle prices is foreseeable prior to the breach. On the contrary, a contract against the feeder for damages was upheld. Second, in order for commercial impossibility to excuse performance, the contractual duties must be impossible for anyone to perform. Subjective (personal) impossibility does not inhere to the nature of the act to be performed and does not excuse nonperformance. A loss of financing is personal impossibility. Roundup Cattle Feeders v. Horpestad, 184 M 480, 603 P2d 1044 (1979), distinguishing Murphy v. Redland, 178 M 296, 583 P2d 1049 (1978).

Tender of Performance — Real Estate Contract: Where time is not of the essence, a vendor is not entitled to rescind a real estate buy/sell contract without first tendering performance on his part, such as by tendering a deed and demanding performance by the purchaser and allowing a reasonable time to elapse. Ingalls v. Brady, 180 M 443, 591 P2d 200 (1979).

Franchise Agreement: The court decided that duties of a franchisor by necessary implication were conditions precedent if construing them as covenants or concurrent duties would leave a franchisee without an adequate remedy for a breach of those obligations by franchisor. United Campgrounds, U.S.A. v. Stevenson, 175 M 17, 571 P2d 1161 (1977).

Plaintiff's Duty of Care — Reasonable and Cautious Businessman: In an action for rescission of a contract plaintiff was under a legal duty to execute the sale agreement with the prudence and care of a reasonable and cautious businessman. When the evidence shows a failure to exercise such care, plaintiff cannot obtain relief from a court of equity on the ground of unilateral mistake of fact. Quinn v. Briggs, 172 M 468, 565 P2d 297 (1977).

Expression of Opinion: Sellers' representation that motel was "capable" of producing certain income was an expression of opinion and would not warrant rescission of contract. Beierle v. Taylor, 164 M 436, 524 P2d 783 (1974).

Failure to Furnish Bill of Sale: Sellers' failure to furnish bill of sale for motel furnishings which resulted in no damage to the buyer cannot be the basis for rescission. Beierle v. Taylor, 164 M 436, 524 P2d 783 (1974).

Where Notice of Rescission Stipulated: Where a particular form of notice, or notice for a given length of time, is stipulated for in contract, exact compliance therewith is necessary, and giving of prescribed notice is absolutely an essential prerequisite to rescission or cancellation of contract. Tomsheck v. Doran, 126 M 598, 256 P2d 583 (1953).

Party Seeking Rescission Must Be Free From Fault: This section authorizing rescission of a contract for failure of consideration contemplates that the party seeking rescission must himself be free from fault; where it appeared that the buyer of automobiles under his contract was given the option to fix the time of delivery at "buyer's option when possible" but did not exercise the option until it was impossible for the seller to make delivery of the model specified, he could not make his own neglect the basis for rescission, and judgment in his favor was reversed. Polich Trading Co. v. Billings Hudson Terraplane Co., 114 M 446, 137 P2d 661 (1943).

Defective Title as Grounds for Rescission:

The purchaser under an executory land contract is not entitled to rescind on the ground of failure of title in the vendor so long as the latter is not in default. Wilson v. Corcoran, 73 M 529, 237 P 521 (1925).

One may in good faith lawfully contract to sell land to which he has not perfect or any title, and the fact that his title is imperfect does not authorize the purchaser to rescind the contract; if at the time he is required to make conveyance the vendor is ready, able, and willing to convey the title he contracted to convey, he is not in default. Wilson v. Corcoran, 73 M 529, 237 P 521 (1925).

Distinction Between Cancellation and Rescission: Where purchaser of land under a contract of sale failed to pay installments as they became due, the vendor, seeking cancellation of contract as a cloud upon his title, was not required to allege in his complaint that he had restored or offered to restore partial payments theretofore made as he would have been compelled to do in an action to rescind the contract. Suburban Homes Co. v. North, 50 M 108, 145 P 2 (1914). See also Oscarson v. Grain Growers Ass'n, Inc., 84 M 521, 277 P 14 (1929).

When Rescission Available: A rescission is available where a contract has been made and the consent of the party seeking it actually had, but given by mistake or obtained through duress, menace, fraud, or undue influence. Michalsky v. Centennial Brewing Co., 48 M 1, 134 P 307 (1913).

Compliance With Rules Required: Under this section and 28-2-1713, a complainant undertaking to rescind a contract of purchase of stock, under which he paid certain money and demanding a return of the money, is not entitled to rescission where the existence of none of the grounds of rescission is shown and complainant has not complied with the prescribed rules governing rescission. Cotter v. Butte & Ruby Valley Smelting Co., 31 M 129, 77 P 509 (1904).

Attorney General's Opinions

Early Termination and Renewal of Contract Between Trustees and Superintendent Held Proper: A board of trustees and a District Superintendent may mutually terminate a 3-year employment contract prior to the expiration of its term and enter into another 3-year contract identical to the first except for date of expiration, without violating 20-4-401. 41 A.G. Op. 30 (1985).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Transfer of Property by Elderly Parents to Children in Consideration for Support and Maintenance — Applicability of Grantor-Support Theory Rather Than Principles of Contractual Rescission: The parents granted property to their children on the condition that the children would provide support and maintenance for their parents. When the children breached the agreement, the parents sought to rescind the agreement. The District Court rescinded the agreement, and on appeal, the children contended that the formalities of this section should apply. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that under these circumstances, the equitable principles inapplicable to ordinary conveyances did not apply. Rather, the court applied the equitable principles of the grantor-support theory of rescission set out in De Atley v. Streit, 81 M 382, 263 P 967 (1928). Under De Atley, a court may rescind a grantor-support agreement on numerous grounds, including failure of consideration, fraud in the transaction, or breach of a condition precedent. The children asserted that the theory did not apply because the parents had other means of support and were not under hardship. However, the agreement was rescinded because of the children's breach of their duty, not because of the parents' relative means or hardship. The children effectively excluded their father from decisionmaking at the family company, restricted the parents' traditional use of corporate funds for living expenses, closed the corporate checking account without notice to the parents, resulting in loss of the parents' health insurance premiums, refused to reimburse the parents for their assisted living, and cut off their long-distance telephone line. The children's actions were a material breach of the grantor-support agreement, and the District Court properly rescinded the agreement. Hjartarson v. Hjartarson, 2006 MT 273, 334 M 212, 147 P3d 164 (2006).

Formal Notice Not Always Requisite to Rescission of Contract: Formal notice of rescission is not always a requisite to rescinding a contract. Rather, it is only necessary that the party electing to rescind make a timely communication of that intention in some manner. The bringing of a prompt action is generally considered sufficient. Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001), following Bozdech v. Mont. Ranches Co., 67 M 366, 216 P 319 (1923).

Failure to Timely Enforce Contract Provision Insufficient of Itself to Constitute Waiver — Proof of Waiver — Reasonable Diligence Required of Rescinding Party: Mere failure to take steps to enforce a legal right under a contract in a timely manner is not, by itself, sufficient to constitute proof of waiver. Rather, a party claiming waiver must prove that the language or conduct by the other party showed unequivocally that the party voluntarily and intentionally relinquished the right to receive the full benefit of the contract. (See Pipe Indus. Ins. Fund Trust v. Consol. Pipe Trades Trust, 233 M 162, 760 P2d 711, 45 St. Rep. 1392 (1988).) Even though a party may be entitled to rescind a contract because of failure of consideration, the rescinding party must take action within a reasonable time upon discovering the facts that enable the rescission. Here, the District Court erred in concluding, without first determining whether the provisions of this section were complied with, that purchasers under a contract could rescind for failure of consideration. Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000), following Liddle v. Petty, 249 M 442, 816 P2d 1066, 48 St. Rep. 779 (1991).

Chocolate Inventory Destroyed — Contamination Exclusion Inapplicable: After discovering that a worker had been exposed to hepatitis, the owners of Helena's Parrot Confectionery (the Parrot) immediately alerted the city health department. When the state Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) subsequently placed an embargo on all candy, the Parrot, without testing for contamination, voluntarily destroyed its existing inventory and submitted a claim for the loss to its insurance company. Citing the high probability of contamination and the contamination exclusion in the insurance contract, the District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the insurance company. Adopting the contamination definitions in Am. Cas. Co. of Reading, Pa. v. Myrick, 304 F2d 179 (5th Cir. 1962), Hi-G, Inc. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 391 F2d 924 (1st Cir. 1968), and Auten v. Employers Nat'l Ins. Co., 722 SW 2d 468 (Tex. App. 1987), the Supreme Court reversed, holding that absent proof of "actual" contamination, the contamination exclusion does not bar coverage for the Parrot's losses. Duensing v. Traveler's Co., 257 M 376, 849 P2d 203, 50 St. Rep. 316 (1993).

Contract for Deed — No Right of Buyer to Suspend Performance for Failure of Consideration Not Attributable to Sellers: Petty made the downpayment on a contract for deed that called for conveyance of part of the property to Petty upon downpayment. Petty assumed the property was unzoned. The contract stated that Petty would use the property for a recreational vehicle park and that if after Petty's due diligence Petty could not obtain zoning approval within 30 months after the contract was signed, the purchase price would be reduced by $25,000. The bank that held a preexisting mortgage on the property told Petty it would not release the property until he brought current his payments to the sellers and the bank. Over 30 months passed from the time of the downpayment until the sellers filed suit, during which time Petty made no payments to the sellers or the bank and did not obtain zoning approval. Petty did not request a deed until 27 months after making the downpayment. Petty was not entitled to suspend performance for failure of delivery of the deed and transfer of the property because he was accountable, not the sellers. The award of damages to the sellers was affirmed. Liddle v. Petty, 249 M 442, 816 P2d 1066, 48 St. Rep. 779 (1991), followed in Norwood v. Serv. Distrib., Inc., 2000 MT 4, 297 M 473, 994 P2d 25, 57 St. Rep. 8 (2000).

Duty of Party Rescinding to Act Promptly:

Purchasers bought a ranch in June 1986 but never offered to tender the property back, did not complain of fraud or misrepresentation in the sale until filing suit in late 1987, and treated the property as their own before and even subsequent to the suit. The statutory requirements of rescission were not met. Schweigert v. Fowler, 240 M 424, 784 P2d 405, 47 St. Rep. 1 (1990).

Rescission of a partnership agreement lies where consideration fails, but where there was no such failure upon creation of the relationship, but mere breaches in manner of operation after the relationship was established, it may not be resorted to; where defendant refused for several years to deliver to the partnership two pairs of foxes as part of the consideration to be furnished by him, for propagating silver foxes, plaintiff's complaint impliedly shows on its face, laches, and plaintiff chose to affirm the agreement instead of promptly rescinding it, hence subject to general demurrer. Lommasson v. Hall, 111 M 142, 106 P2d 1089 (1940).

One who bought what at the time he deemed a right to make immediate homestead entry of public land, but which subsequently proved to be no more than a possessory right on unsurveyed land, and with such knowledge entered the land as a homestead when declared open to settlement, made two partial payments under his agreement, and then, after expiration of 2 years, brought an action to rescind and recover back his payments, was not entitled to prevail. Hills v. Johnson, 52 M 65, 156 P 122 (1916).

Conduct Constituting Waiver of Right to Rescind: The District Court properly concluded that plaintiffs waived any right to rescind through conduct that was inconsistent with an intent to rescind, including: (1) encumbering the property with a deed of trust and assignment of contract for deed on the same day the notice of intent to rescind was sent; (2) continued use and occupancy of the property; and (3) disposal of items of personal property transferred under the contract after notice of rescission. Garcia v. Schell, 239 M 475, 781 P2d 274, 46 St. Rep. 1844 (1989).

Restore Value Received: The purchasers, who were allowed to rescind a real estate contract based upon mutual mistake of the parties, may recover the value of their equity in real property conveyed by them to the sellers as partial consideration for the contract subsequently rescinded. Brunner v. LaCasse, 234 M 368, 763 P2d 662, 45 St. Rep. 1978 (1988).

Rescission Barred by Laches: The Supreme Court held that plaintiffs' inability to completely restore defendants to their original condition would not alone foreclose rescission as a remedy. Plaintiffs had notice of circumstances that should have put them on inquiry of possible fraud at the time of sale in 1977 and in 1978 when the net income did not reflect earlier representations. Nevertheless, plaintiffs continued to make payments and operate the business without complaint until 1981. The court held that these facts constituted laches, or a failure to use reasonable diligence to rescind promptly on the part of the plaintiffs. Since the time period between notice of possible fraud and filing of a complaint exceeded the 2-year Statute of Limitations for fraud, the District Court erred in permitting the jury to consider rescission as a remedy for the plaintiffs. McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986), followed in Benson v. Pyfer, 240 M 175, 783 P2d 923, 46 St. Rep. 2033 (1989).

Compromise and Settlement — No Grounds for Rescission: Parties to a real estate transaction executed a promissory note in compromise and settlement of a dispute over the property. The sellers filed a complaint to recover on the promissory note. The defendants asserted two affirmative defenses seeking rescission of the note. The District Court granted plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment. The Supreme Court affirmed and held that the record substantiated that the note was supported by adequate consideration. The defendants did not timely rescind the note. There was no evidence that the plaintiffs could be restored to substantially the same position as if the note had not been made, and no issue of material fact precluded entry of summary judgment. Todd v. Berner, 214 M 263, 693 P2d 506, 41 St. Rep. 2462 (1984).

Rescission of Release — Facts Not Requiring Tender: Plaintiff was severely burned after a truck driven by an employee of H. Pierce Manufacturing Co. ran into the rear of her 1970 Ford Mustang, which caught fire. Plaintiff retained James Reno to represent her. Reno began negotiations with Pierce's insurer, St. Paul Fire and Marine Co. At the time Pierce was insured with St. Paul for up to $100,000 and with an excess carrier, Atlantic Co., for up to $2 million. Reno did not inquire as to what the excess carrier's coverage limits were. Reno and the adjuster agreed to a settlement entered by plaintiff for $300,000. Two separate documents consisting of the combined release and indemnification agreements and a subrogation agreement were executed. Reno agreed with the insurers to also pursue their interests against Ford. The insurers later retained independent counsel, and Reno filed an action against Ford. Plaintiff sought to rescind the release. Usually a party seeking to rescind must restore everything of value which they have received under the contract. Here, plaintiff received only $125,000 of the $300,000 settlement, however, and because of the severity of the injury and the acknowledged culpability of the driver and Pierce, plaintiff was entitled to rescind without tendering the settlement sum. Abell v. Ford Motor Co., 39 St. Rep. 1347 (D.C. Mont. 1982) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Exemplary Damages: In an action to rescind a contract to purchase an automobile, there was no requirement that plaintiff show malice, oppression, or fraud on the part of the seller in order to recover exemplary damages under 30-14-133. T & W Chevrolet v. Darvial, 196 M 287, 641 P2d 1368, 39 St. Rep. 112 (1982).

Waiver of Right of Rescission: After purchasing automobile from defendant, plaintiff learned of a substantial dangerous defect in the automobile. Plaintiff promptly notified defendant of defect and during week following defendant's inspection of automobile gave notice of rescission of purchase contract. Court held plaintiff acted properly and in a timely fashion in rescinding the contract. T & W Chevrolet v. Darvial, 196 M 287, 641 P2d 1368, 39 St. Rep. 112 (1982).

Mutual Mistake — Basis for Rescission: Defendants purchased an irregular tract of land and commenced construction of a commercial building. They were contacted by plaintiff concerning purchase of the building. They consulted an attorney and discussed condominiumizing the building. He suggested as a tax matter that defendant should hold the property long enough to qualify for long-term capital gain treatment. An option to purchase with contract for deed was entered. The deeds and contract were not completed, as a survey was needed for a legal description of the property. The contract contained a provision that defendants provide and pave parking lots north and south of the building. The survey was completed and showed that the building encroached on state and county rights-of-way to the north and south. Plaintiffs then sought to rescind the contract and recover their money. The Supreme Court held that the providing of parking lots was material to the contract and that mutual mistake of fact as to the parking lots was an adequate basis for rescinding the contract. They also held that any findings not made could be implied to support the trial court's decision. Berry v. Romain, 194 M 400, 632 P2d 1127, 38 St. Rep. 1434 (1981).

Effect of Rescission: A technical "rescission" of a contract has the legal effect of entitling each of the parties to be restored to the condition in which he was before the contract was made so far as that is possible, and in determining whether a rescission took place, the courts look not only to the language of the parties but to all the circumstances. Cruse v. Clawson, 137 M 439, 352 P2d 989 (1960).

Divisible Contract Susceptible of Partial Rescission: A contract for installment of furnace, pipes, air ducts, etc., was a divisible one and susceptible of partial rescission and court erred in ruling that the contract was indivisible and in failing to restore every part the purchaser failed in his attempted rescission and was therefore liable for the balance due on the plant. O'Keefe v. Routledge, 110 M 138, 103 P2d 307 (1940).

Restoration Such as Is Reasonably Possible: The object of this section and 28-2-1716, requiring one rescinding a contract to make compensation or restoration, is to place the other party in status quo, i.e., to place him in the same position he was in at the time of the execution of the contract, but absolute and literal restoration is not required, it being sufficient if the restoration be such as is reasonably possible or as may be demanded by the equities of the case. O'Keefe v. Routledge, 110 M 138, 103 P2d 307 (1940), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986), and in Carey v. Wallner, 223 M 260, 725 P2d 557, 43 St. Rep. 1706 (1986).

When Restoration Unnecessary:

Under this section one seeking rescission of a contract must restore or offer to restore to defendant everything of value received under it on condition that the latter shall do likewise. Where plaintiff's tender was refused and defendant threatened to declare a forfeiture unless the balance due was paid, it appearing further that defendant was without right to sell the property involved, it may not be said that plaintiff by remaining in possession waived his right to rescission. Rinio v. Kester, 99 M 1, 41 P2d 405 (1935).

The requirement of this section that before a party can rescind a contract he must restore or offer to restore to the other party everything of value received under it was sufficiently met by an allegation in a taxpayer's complaint that articles purchased under a fraudulent contract by defendant school trustees were in the school building and could be restored to the seller by the court's decree, the rule being that where restoration has been rendered impossible through no fault of plaintiff he may have relief, particularly if the court by its decree is able to bring about restoration. School District v. Richards, 62 M 141, 205 P 206 (1922).

Duty of Party Rescinding to Act Promptly — Fraud:

Where a vendee deems himself entitled to rescission of a land contract on the ground of fraud he must under this section act promptly upon discovery of the facts constituting fraud; if he had information of the facts, no matter from what source received, which if pursued would have resulted in knowledge, it will be held the equivalent of knowledge and failure to act thereon constitutes laches fatal to the action. Lasby v. Burgess, 88 M 49, 289 P 1028 (1930), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Where the plaintiff seeks to rescind a contract on the ground of fraud the defendant is entitled to know when he discovered the facts constituting the fraud; a just ground for rescission may be lost by laches. Ott v. Pace, 43 M 82, 115 P 37 (1911).

The right to set aside a deed to mining property on the ground of fraud may be barred by laches in prosecuting a suit therefor, notwithstanding that the plaintiffs reside in a foreign country and are ignorant of our language and institutions. Streicher v. Murray, 36 M 45, 92 P 36 (1907).

Waiver of Right to Rescind:

Right to rescind a land contract on the ground of breach by the vendor for failure to deposit in escrow state land certificates at a certain time was waived by the purchaser by remaining in possession some 6 years after breach and doing no more than insisting from time to time that the vendor make the deposit. Friedrichsen v. Cobb, 84 M 238, 275 P 267 (1929).

While a party seeking to avoid a contract on the ground of the fraud must rescind promptly on discovery of the fraud or he will be deemed to have ratified it and waived his right to rescind, where the purchasers of farm machinery soon after discovery of defects notified the seller and were repeatedly assured that they would be remedied but without result, the delay in rescinding caused by such promises was justified and did not amount to a waiver of their right to rescind. Advance-Rumely Thresher Co., Inc. v. Wenholz, 80 M 82, 258 P 1085 (1927).

By continuing in possession of ranch property for more than 5 months after commencement of suit to rescind, the vendee waived his right of rescission under this section making it incumbent upon a party desiring to rescind to tender back possession and to keep the tender good by removal from the premises. Fontaine v. Lyng, 61 M 590, 202 P 1112 (1921). See also Beebe v. James, 91 M 403, 8 P2d 803 (1932).

Return to Status Quo: The effect of an agreement of rescission is to undo the contract. Rescission includes the idea of restoration of both parties to their status quo and the return by each to the other of the consideration given and received. Hollingsworth v. Ruckman, 72 M 147, 232 P 180 (1924).

Duty of Party Rescinding to Restore Property:

Under this section one desiring to rescind a contract must act promptly upon discovery of the facts which entitle him to rescind if he is aware of his right to rescind. He must restore or offer to restore to the other party everything of value which he has received from him under the contract. Smith v. Christie, 60 M 604, 201 P 1011 (1921). See also Silfvast v. Asplund, 93 M 584, 20 P2d 631 (1933); Beebe v. James, 91 M 403, 8 P2d 803 (1932); Williams v. Hefner, 89 M 361, 297 P 492 (1931); St. Onge v. Blakely, 76 M 1, 245 P 532 (1926); Edwards v. Muri, 73 M 339, 237 P 209 (1925); Rowe v. Emerson-Brantingham Implement Co., 61 M 73, 201 P 316 (1921).

A person injured by the fraudulent acts of another may elect to rescind or may affirm the transaction and sue for damages. In order to state a cause of action for rescission it is necessary for the complaining party to allege that he has restored to the other party everything of value which was received under the contract, or that he has offered to make restitution upon condition that the offending party do likewise unless it is made to appear that the latter is unable or positively refuses to do so. Como Orchard Land Co. v. Markham, 54 M 438, 171 P 274 (1918).

Duty of Party Rescinding to Act Promptly — Discovery of Facts:

Mistakes of law and mistakes of fact are, as possible bases for rescission, in pari materia; there is not, either as to the duty of discovery or the time of commencing suit, any distinction between them. Brundy v. Canby, 50 M 454, 148 P 315 (1915).

As to either a mistake of law or a mistake of fact, laches may arise from a culpable neglect to discover, but a court is not required to impute laches from a delay in discovery for a period of less than 9 months, merely because the mistake is one of law. Brundy v. Canby, 50 M 454, 148 P 315 (1915).

Whether a case is or is not one of laches depends upon circumstances affecting the party who seeks relief as well as the party against whom relief is sought; where the circumstances are such as to excuse a failure to discover, where also the situation of the parties has not changed, no occasion is offered to apply the doctrine of laches. Brundy v. Canby, 50 M 454, 148 P 315 (1915).

The prompt action required by this section is to occur after discovery. Brundy v. Canby, 50 M 454, 148 P 315 (1915).

To authorize the rescission of a contract of purchase, the buyer must, upon the discovery of facts authorizing a rescission, act promptly; the question of promptness is one for the jury. Hillman v. Luzon Cafe Co., 49 M 180, 142 P 641 (1914).

Pleading:

The rules prescribed by this section touching rescission are inapplicable to an action to enforce an immediate forfeiture of a contract of purchase for the vendee's failure to make any deferred payment, where the contract provides that such failure shall work an immediate forfeiture; hence it is not necessary for the complaint in such last-named action to set out facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action for the rescission of a contract. Fratt v. Daniels-Jones Co., 47 M 487, 133 P 700 (1913).

Where in a suit to rescind a contract for the sale of real estate the merits of the controversy were tried, plaintiffs introducing evidence that they had restored to defendants everything received from the latter under the contract though the complaint failed to allege that plaintiffs had placed defendants in status quo, as required by this section, the pleading will on appeal be treated as amended in this respect. Post v. Liberty, 45 M 1, 121 P 475 (1912).

Where one party to a contract is seeking its rescission, he must act promptly upon discovering the facts that entitle him to rescind; hence if he seeks to rescind on the ground of fraud he must act with reasonable promptness after discovering the fraud, and his complaint should show when the discovery was made; otherwise it is vulnerable to a special demurrer on the ground of being ambiguous, unintelligible, and uncertain. Ott v. Pace, 43 M 82, 115 P 37 (1911).

28-2-1714. When rescission may be adjudged.

Case Notes

Rescission of Waiver of Interest Document on Grounds of Fraud: Kindsfather's son purchased some land from Kindsfather pursuant to a contract for deed. When the son was unable to make the payments, the son executed a document waiving the back interest that was owing and Kindsfather signed the document. Kindsfather subsequently died, and the son sought a declaratory ruling that the waiver of interest document was valid and that upon receipt of the unpaid balance of the contract, the bank would release the warranty deed held in escrow for the son. Kindsfather's personal representative opposed the judgment, and the District Court found the document to be invalid and ordered the son to make all payments due to the estate. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's decision to rescind the document because it was obtained by fraud. The Supreme Court examined each of the nine elements of actual fraud and determined that a prima facie case of actual fraud was established. In re Estate of Kindsfather, 2005 MT 51, 326 M 192, 108 P3d 487 (2005), following Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 258 M 286, 852 P2d 640 (1993).

Punitive Damages Instruction — Malice: The court did not err in giving an instruction on implied malice that advised the jury that it is not necessary to show actual malice to recover punitive damages or in giving an instruction on punitive damages when it was clear from the record and a pretrial order that plaintiffs were bringing this case in tort, separate and distinct from any action arising out of contract. Harrington v. Holiday Rambler Corp., 176 M 37, 575 P2d 578 (1978).

28-2-1715. When rescission may be adjudged for mistake.

Case Notes

Rescission Not Allowed When Return to Precontract Status Not Possible: Lutes sought to rescind a contract based on the fact that he mistakenly believed that the sump system in a business that he purchased had the proper permits. The District Court correctly concluded that rescission was not proper because rescission would not restore Houdashelts, the property sellers, to their precontract position. Houdashelts had sold Lutes a profitable business with a working sump system, permitted or not, and, upon repossession, received back a business that was losing money, that had a dwindling customer base, and that had a large pollution problem that was caused by Lutes. Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997).

Restore Value Received: The purchasers, who were allowed to rescind a real estate contract based upon mutual mistake of the parties, may recover the value of their equity in real property conveyed by them to the sellers as partial consideration for the contract subsequently rescinded. Brunner v. LaCasse, 234 M 368, 763 P2d 662, 45 St. Rep. 1978 (1988).

Compromise and Settlement — No Grounds for Rescission: Parties to a real estate transaction executed a promissory note in compromise and settlement of a dispute over the property. The sellers filed a complaint to recover on the promissory note. The defendants asserted two affirmative defenses seeking rescission of the note. The District Court granted plaintiffs' motion for summary judgment. The Supreme Court affirmed and held that the record substantiated that the note was supported by adequate consideration. The defendants did not timely rescind the note. There was no evidence that the plaintiffs could be restored to substantially the same position as if the note had not been made, and no issue of material fact precluded entry of summary judgment. Todd v. Berner, 214 M 263, 693 P2d 506, 41 St. Rep. 2462 (1984).

Doctrine of Restoration: The whole doctrine of restoration under this section and 28-2-1713 is equitable and requires merely that the party against whom rescission is adjudged shall be no worse off than before the contract. Brundy v. Canby, 50 M 454, 148 P 315 (1915).

28-2-1716. Power of court to require party rescinding to do equity.

Case Notes

Rescission Appropriate When Parties Cannot Agree on Exact Calculation of Damages — Literal Restoration Not Required by Section: Property owners and a builder entered an agreement for the construction of a home. The relationship between the parties deteriorated, and the property owners sued for breach of contract and other claims, with the builder denying the claims and asserting counterclaims. The District Court properly determined that the contract had been mutually rescinded. The builder asserted that rescission was improper because it was impossible to fully restore each party to their precontract position given that the parties disagreed as to the final accounting due. The builder also claimed that the District Court's calculation of damages did not account for the builder's intellectual capital, such as expertise and connections. The Supreme Court held that the literal restoration is not required under 28-2-1716 and that it was sufficient that the District Court had balanced the equities of each party's position by compensating the builder for labor and materials it provided and giving the owners a credit for the labor and materials they were owed. Jorgensen v. Trademark Woodworks, LLC, 2018 MT 291, 393 Mont. 381, 431 P.3d 29.

Federal Law Regarding Nonliability for Borrower's Payment of Fees to Lender Upon Loan Rescission Inapplicable to Mortgage Broker Fees: Plaintiff helped defendant secure a loan, which defendant subsequently rescinded within the applicable 3-day period pursuant to the federal Truth in Lending Act. Plaintiff sent defendant a bill for its brokerage fee and out-of-pocket expenses incurred in securing the loan commitment, as provided in the brokerage contract and an attendant promissory note. Defendant refused to pay the bill, and plaintiff brought an action to enforce the contract and promissory note, and the District Court enforced the note and ordered defendant to pay the bill. Defendant appealed on grounds that 16 U.S.C. 1635(b) of the Truth in Lending Act and 12 CFR 226.23, Regulation Z, clearly provide that when a consumer rescinds a transaction, the consumer is not liable for any amount, including any finance charge. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court ruling. Although the federal law protects defendant from paying any fees to the lender, it does not address arrangements between a borrower and a mortgage broker, and in fact, portions of Regulation Z at 12 CFR 226.4(a) expressly exclude appraisal and service fees from the definition of a finance charge. Therefore, even though defendant effectively rescinded that mortgage with the lender, the rescission did not affect or alter defendant's obligation to the mortgage broker pursuant to the brokerage contract and promissory note. Mortgage Source, Inc. v. Strong, 2003 MT 205, 317 M 37, 75 P3d 304 (2003).

Equity Requires Payment of Prejudgment Interest: Plaintiffs, who rescinded contracts conveying real property, were entitled to prejudgment interest under the equitable theory. They had been deprived of their money for more than 8 years to date of judgment, while defendants received or were able to receive profits from the use of the land for nearly all those years. The act of one plaintiff in allowing another person to cut hay on the land did not constitute exercise of possession of the property sufficient to deny award of prejudgment interest. Brunner v. LaCasse, 234 M 368, 763 P2d 662, 45 St. Rep. 1978 (1988).

Reduction to Present Value of Amount Due Over Time: Court ordered contract for sale of ranch rescinded at request of seller. The buyers had already resold parts of the ranch to third parties at sums to be paid over a period of time and totaling $171,000. The lower court ordered that the full $171,000 due first buyers over time be tendered by first buyers to first seller as a setoff against the money first buyers had paid to first seller, which court ordered first seller to return to first buyers. The ordered setoff was erroneous as to amount, and the case was remanded for a determination of the present value of the $171,000, which figure would be the proper setoff. Deist v. Wachholz, 208 M 207, 678 P2d 188, 41 St. Rep. 286 (1984).

Absolute Restoration to Former Status Not Required — Horse Sale Rescission: The sale item, a mare, while in the possession of the seller and upon transferral to the buyer was with foal. The mare foaled while in the possession of the buyer and subsequently was bred by the buyer and was with foal a second time up through the time of trial. In adjudging a rescission of the contract for sale of the mare, the District Court was proper in allocating to the seller the mare with the unborn second foal and to the buyer the first foal plus the purchase price and the cost of keeping the mare and first foal. Here, even though complete restoration is not possible, the seller is not placed in a worse position by receiving the mare with a different foal. Restoration as contemplated within the meaning of this section does not mean absolute and literal replacement of the parties to their former position. Such restoration as is reasonably possible and demanded by the equities of the case is sufficient. (Citing O'Keefe v. Routledge, 110 M 138, 103 P 307 (1940).) Scott v. Hjelm, 188 M 375, 613 P2d 1385, 37 St. Rep. 1219 (1980). (Dissent by J. Sheehy.)

Restoration Such as Is Reasonably Possible: The object of this section and 28-2-1713, requiring one rescinding a contract to make compensation or restoration, is to place the other party in status quo, i.e., to place him in the same position he was in at the time of the execution of the contract, but absolute and literal restoration is not required, it being sufficient if the restoration be such as is reasonably possible or as may be demanded by the equities of the case. O'Keefe v. Routledge, 110 M 138, 103 P2d 307, 148 ALR 409 (1940), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986).

Allowance of Interest in Discretion of Court as "Justice May Require": While under this section the trial court may in an action for rescission of a contract require the party to whom the relief is granted to make restoration to his opponent, it is not incumbent upon it to allow or disallow interest in accordance with the strict rules of law applying to ordinary transactions, but may allow it to the vendor on certain items and to the vendee on others as "justice may require". Silfvast v. Asplund, 99 M 152, 42 P2d 452 (1935), explained in Brunner v. LaCasse, 234 M 368, 763 P2d 662, 45 St. Rep. 1978 (1988).

Reimbursement Upon Rescission: On rescission of an executory contract for the purchase of livestock, the buyer is entitled to the money paid as part of the purchase price and to be reimbursed for expenses for feed and care of the animals incurred prior to and within a reasonable time after rescission. Apple v. Edwards, 92 M 524, 16 P2d 700, 87 ALR 179 (1932).

Part 21
Payment of Construction Contractors and Subcontractors

Part Compiler's Comments

Effective Date: This part is effective October 1, 1999.

Applicability: Section 12, Ch. 470, L. 1999, provided: "[This act] applies to contracts agreed to on or after July 1, 1999."

Part Case Notes

Substantial Evidence to Support Award of Damages: In an action by the plaintiff contractor to foreclose a construction lien against the defendant homeowners, the District Court awarded contract damages to the plaintiff for $8,317 in contractor's fees, work completed, and materials used. The defendants appealed, arguing the District Court awarded damages to the plaintiff in error. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the parties had formed an enforceable contract with sufficient consideration between them, even though the contract consisted of a written construction estimate from the plaintiff that did not include some important terms. The Supreme Court found there was sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to its contractor fee for driveway work, based on an oral modification to the agreement and the defendants' payment of contractor fees for other work, and found there was also sufficient evidence that the plaintiff was entitled to additional money related to labor and materials supplied for masonry and stonework. Vintage Constr., Inc., v. Feighner, 2017 MT 109, 387 Mont. 354, 394 P.3d 179.

Additional Costs Subcontractor's Responsibility: Given the nature of a fixed price contract, which generally places all responsibility for additional costs on the subcontractor, the District Court did not err in denying the subcontractor's claim for additional compensation when the subcontractor failed to submit written change orders in accordance with the contract or otherwise failed to establish oral agreements providing for payment of additional costs. Total Indus. Plant Serv., Inc. v. Turner Indus. Group, LLC, 2013 MT 5, 368 Mont. 189, 294 P.3d 363.

Waiver of Right to Object to Construction Contract Arbitration Provisions — Arbitration Properly Compelled: Plaintiff contracted to construct a pipeline and widen a road for defendant, but disputes arose regarding contract performance. The contract provided that disputes be settled by arbitration. Plaintiff notified defendant requesting arbitration, but defendant indicated a desire to settle the dispute through nonbinding mediation rather than arbitration in order to avoid fees. Subsequent settlement offers by defendant were refused, and plaintiff again requested arbitration. Following additional unsuccessful negotiation, plaintiff filed suit to enjoin arbitration, and defendant moved to stay litigation and compel arbitration. The District Court concluded that the contractual arbitration provisions were unambiguous and that by insisting on arbitration, plaintiff waived any legal objection to the arbitration provisions. Plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. To establish a knowing waiver, the party asserting waiver must demonstrate the other party's knowledge of the existing right, acts inconsistent with that right, and resulting prejudice to the party asserting waiver. Here, plaintiff, through counsel, clearly had knowledge of its contractual rights regarding arbitration and litigation; letters from plaintiff's counsel were totally inconsistent with the right to object to arbitration; and the subsequent delay in resolving the matter and the additional cost to defendant in having to defend the arbitration provisions in District Court and on appeal were clearly prejudicial to defendant. The District Court correctly concluded that plaintiff waived the right to object to arbitration and properly compelled arbitration. VanDyke Constr. Co., Inc. v. Stillwater Min. Co., 2003 MT 279, 317 M 519, 78 P3d 844 (2003), followed, regarding elements of waiver, in R.C. Hobbs Enterprises, LLC v. J.G.L. Distrib., Inc., 2004 MT 396, 325 M 277, 104 P3d 503 (2004).

2003 Amendment: Chapter 274 in definition of owner inserted second sentence allowing an owner to contractually designate another person to represent the owner for certain purposes; deleted former definition of owner's representative that read: ""Owner's representative" means an architect, engineer, or other person who represents the owner and is designated in the contract as the person representing the owner for the purposes of the administration or oversight of the performance of the construction contract"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

2003 Amendment — Code Commissioner Correction: Chapter 274 in (1)(a) at beginning deleted "If a contractor performs a construction contract according to the terms of the contract and requests, either directly to the owner or to owner's representative, payment for performance of the contract, the owner shall pay the contractor, within 30 days after receipt by the owner or the owner's representative of the request for payment, for work performed or materials provided in accordance with the contract"; inserted (1)(a) requiring that unless an alternative billing cycle is established, construction contracts define a monthly billing cycle; inserted (1)(b) providing that unless an alternative billing cycle is established, a request for payment is considered approved within 21 days unless the request for payment is disapproved; inserted (1)(c) concerning disapproval of a request for payment; inserted (1)(d) allowing an owner to withhold an amount sufficient to pay direct expenses; inserted (1)(e) requiring an owner to furnish a written statement specifying a condition for which approval of the payment is being withheld; inserted (1)(f) requiring payment within 7 days of approval unless an alternative billing cycle is established; inserted (1)(g) requiring an owner to notify a subcontractor who has not been paid of a progress payment or final payment made to the general contractor; inserted (1)(h) providing that payment is not required unless the contractor provides the owner a billing statement or estimate for work performed or material supplied; in (2) at beginning increased from 3 working days to 7 days the time within which a contractor must pay a subcontractor for work performed or materials provided; inserted (2)(b) providing that payment is not required unless the subcontractor provides a billing statement or invoice; inserted (2)(c) allowing the general contractor to disapprove the request for payment based on a written claim of certain conditions; in (3)(a) at beginning increased from 3 working days to 7 days the time within which a subcontractor must pay another subcontractor the amount due for work performed or materials provided; inserted (3)(b) providing that payment is not required unless the subcontractor provides a billing statement or invoice; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2003.

As introduced, [section 1] of House Bill No. 438 (Ch. 274, L. 2003) amended this section by inserting an exception clause at the beginning of (1)(a), (1)(b), and (1)(f), referencing [section 2] of the bill (codified as 28-2-2115), which established an alternative billing cycle. House Bill No. 438 was subsequently amended by adding a new [section 1], amending 28-2-2101, but the internal reference to [section 2] in this section was not revised to reflect that amendment. Pursuant to sec. 138, Ch. 114, L. 2003, the code commissioner corrected the reference in the exception clause at the beginning of (1)(a), (1)(b), and (1)(f) of this section to reflect the original intent of House Bill No. 438 to provide an exception for an alternative billing cycle in 28-2-2115.

Applicability: Section 7, Ch. 274, L. 2003, provided: "[This act] applies to construction contracts entered into on or after October 1, 2003."

2009 Amendment: Chapter 254 in (2) in first sentence after "30 days" deleted "plus 3 working days"; in (3) after "Acceptance of" deleted "progress payments or"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 244 in (3) deleted former first sentence that read: "Interest is not required to be paid pursuant to this section unless the owner, contractor, or subcontractor, as appropriate, has been notified of the requirements of this section at the time the request for payment is made." Amendment effective October 1, 2005.

Interest Assessment on Construction Lien Not Applicable to Residential Construction Improvements Less Than $400,000 — Remand: As a discovery sanction and because the total cost of plaintiff's residential construction project exceeded $400,000, the District Court assessed interest against plaintiff on defendant's construction lien. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. Although the total construction project cost exceeded $400,000, defendant's construction lien was based on improvements totaling only $16,763.81. The exception to the interest assessment clearly did not apply to the contract between the parties, nor could plaintiff be assessed interest as a discovery sanction based on a statute that did not apply. Weimar v. Lyons, 2007 MT 182, 338 M 242, 164 P3d 922 (2007).

Posttrial Motions to Amend Judgment, to Limit Punitive Damages, and for Attorney Fees Properly Denied: In a construction contract case, defendants filed numerous posttrial motions, including motions to amend the judgment, to limit the punitive damages award, and for attorney fees and costs. The motions were denied, and defendants appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The motion to amend the judgment was unsupported by any authority. The motion to limit punitive damages was based on the statutory limit of 3% of net worth enacted by the 2003 Legislature, effective October 1, 2003, but the cause of action accrued prior to October 1, 2003, and the statutory limit did not apply retroactively. For the motion for attorney fees and costs to be granted, defendants would have to have been the prevailing party in the action, but defendants failed to provide any argument explaining how they were the prevailing party. Accordingly, the District Court did not err in denying the posttrial motions. Murphy Homes, Inc. v. Muller, 2007 MT 140, 337 M 411, 162 P3d 106 (2007).

28-2-2105. Prevailing party entitled to costs and attorney fees.

Case Notes

Sufficient Evidence Required to Show Issue of Material Fact — Contracts: The plaintiff entered into a contract with the defendant to provide the defendant with crushed aggregate material from his gravel pit. The defendant no longer needed the aggregate material and refused to pay the final invoices. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly granted summary judgment to the plaintiff because the defendant failed to present sufficient evidence to establish that an issue of material fact existed regarding the amount of material extracted by the defendant. In addition, the Supreme Court awarded reasonable attorney fees, trial costs, and appeal costs to the plaintiff under 28-2-2105 and remanded the case to determine the fees and costs. Moore v. Goran, LLC, 2017 MT 208, 388 Mont. 340, 400 P.3d 729.

No Error in Denial of Untimely Motion to Amend Arbitration Award Containing Mathematical Error in Calculation of Attorney Fees: Defendant filed a motion under former Rule 59(g), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), to modify an arbitrated award of attorney fees that was $110,000 higher than the amount claimed by plaintiff's counsel. The District Court denied the motion and the Supreme Court affirmed on grounds that the award was time barred. Although a motion to amend an award is proper to modify an arbitration award that contains a mathematical error, the motion must be filed within 90 days of delivery of a copy of the award to the applicant pursuant to 27-5-313, or a correction may be requested of the arbitrator pursuant to 27-5-217. Defendant never requested a change of the award by the arbitrator and failed to challenge the calculation until more than 1 year after the award. Thus, even though the award was significantly inflated because of the mathematical error, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion under former Rule 59(g) to alter or amend the judgment. Dick Anderson Constr., Inc. v. Monroe Constr. Co., LLC, 2009 MT 416, 353 M 534, 221 P3d 675 (2009).

The Supreme Court reversed and remanded. Although the total construction project cost exceeded $400,000, defendant's construction lien was based on improvements totaling only $16,763.81. Contractual Term Forbidding Construction Delay Pending Dispute Resolution — Failure to Approve Proposed Change Order Different From Failure to Make Monthly Progress Payments: A contractor argued that a provision of the contract that prohibited the contractor from delaying work pending the resolution of "any" and "all" disputes, including change orders submitted by the contractor, was void under 28-2-2116. The District Court disagreed. The court noted that the contract also contained an explicit exception to the prohibition in cases where monthly progress payments were not made. The District Court disagreed with the contractor's contention that a change order is the same as a monthly progress payment, and the Supreme Court affirmed on appeal. JEM Contracting, Inc. v. Contract for Project Management of Repairs and Remediation Not Subject to Statutory Contract Requirements: When the written contract had an express purpose of environmental remediation and repairs, contemplated a two-phase remediation process consisting of the repairs and the reconstruction of a main house, and instructed the plaintiff to facilitate hiring a general contractor to reconstruct the main house, the District Court properly concluded that the plaintiff was a project manager rather than a general contractor under the contract. The contract was not subject to the statutory requirements under this section, and the plaintiff was entitled to the expectancy damages that arose when the defendant breached the contract. Flathead Management Partners, LLC v. Jystad, 2019 MT 289, 398 Mont. 121, 454 P.3d 679.

Contract to Build Home Not in Writing — Contract Void — Quantum Meruit Award Proper: The plaintiff sued the defendant, whom he had hired to build a home, after the defendant had filed a lien against the home because the plaintiff refused to pay the final invoice. The plaintiff claimed that the lien was invalid because the parties' agreement was not in writing, in violation of 28-2-2201. The District Court denied the plaintiff summary judgment, ordered the plaintiff to pay the invoice, and awarded the defendant attorney fees. The plaintiff appealed, arguing that the District Court had erred in awarding damages in equity because 28-2-2201 required the defendant's absolute forfeiture of damages. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed the award, holding that even though the contract between the parties was void, the statute did not preclude an award of equitable damages. Mandell v. Ward, 2016 MT 205, 384 Mont. 377, 377 P.3d 1228.

District Court Conclusion That Claims Were Inseparable for Calculation of Attorney Fee Award in Error — Remanded to Assess Reasonable Fees: The plaintiff sued the defendant he had hired to build a home after the defendant had filed a lien against the home because the plaintiff refused to pay the final invoice. The plaintiff claimed that the lien was invalid because the parties' agreement was void as it was not reduced to writing in violation of 28-2-2201. The District Court agreed that the contract was void but still ordered the plaintiff to pay the invoice under the theory of quantum meruit. The District Court also awarded the defendant attorney fees. The District Court concluded that the claims in contract and in equity against the defendant were inseparable and therefore awarded the defendant nearly all of his attorney fees. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the award of attorney fees, holding that the claims were not inseparable, and remanded the matter for the District Court to order a reasonable amount of fees. Mandell v. Ward, 2016 MT 205, 384 Mont. 377, 377 P.3d 1228.

CHAPTER 3
INTERPRETATION OF CONTRACTS

Chapter Case Notes

Doctrine of Election of Remedies Inapplicable — Position of Blameless Party After Contractual Breach — Making Whole but No More: The plaintiff brought a suit for damages 6 years after the defendants breached a contract to buy the plaintiff's interests in Dealerspan, LLC, a software company, resulting in the defendants' forfeiture of their interests in Dealerspan. Defendants argued that the doctrine of election of remedies barred damages because the plaintiff elected to pursue forfeiture and thus had rescinded the contract. However, the subject of the contract was the sale of the plaintiff's interests, and the forfeiture of the defendants' interests in Dealerspan did not return the parties to their original positions before executing the contract, so the forfeiture and contractual damages were not inconsistent. Nevertheless, the contract was not designed to place the plaintiff in a better position under the defendants' breach than under the defendants' performance, so the plaintiff could recover only damages covering the difference between the contract purchase price and the value of the forfeited interests, subsequent profits from the business, and profits from selling Dealerspan's physical assets. Bottrell Family Investments Ltd. Partnership v. Diversified Financial, Inc., 2015 MT 185, 379 Mont. 504, 352 P.3d 620.

Title Policy Ensured Right of Access, Not "Legal Access" — No Coverage Under Clear Language of Title Policy: The plaintiffs purchased title insurance for real property they acquired. The policy insured against loss or damage from "lack of a right of access to and from the land". Later, the plaintiff learned that although they had access to the property from permissive, adjacent landowners, they did not have what they considered "legal access" to the property. The plaintiffs filed suit against the title company, arguing that the policy required the title company to provide them legal access to the property, such as a recorded easement dedicated to their use. The title company argued that the plaintiffs had access to their property and that the policy did not provide for any certain kind of access. The District Court agreed and granted the title company summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the language of the policy was clear in insuring against loss from not having "a right of" access and that the plaintiffs clearly had a right of access based on easements filed earlier. James v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 MT 325, 377 Mont. 264, 339 P.3d 420.

Interpretation of "Occupying" in Insurance Contract — Reasonable Connection Test — District Court Affirmed: When an employee of another subcontractor backed over him with a concrete truck, the foreman of a concrete finishing company was dragged up to 50 feet by the truck and later died from his injuries. His estate sought medical payments under the concrete truck's policy.

The insurer denied the claim, contending that the policy's definition of "occupying" included only those who were "in, upon, getting in, on, out or off" the vehicle and thus the foreman was not occupying the vehicle at the time of the accident. The District Court agreed and granted summary judgment in favor of the insurer. The estate appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that under the "reasonable connection" test, the foreman was not an occupant of the concrete truck because he was not associated with the truck for any purpose other than the accident. Estate of Richerson v. Cincinnati Ins. Co., 2011 MT 266, 362 Mont. 324, 264 P.3d 1087.

Diesel Fuel Properly Considered Pollutant for Purposes of Commercial Liability Insurance Policy Exclusion: A petroleum company held commercial liability and property insurance policies that contained a standard absolute pollution exclusion clause disclaiming coverage for spills resulting from pollutants, which were defined to include liquid irritants or contaminants. The company also held a coverage extension that provided coverage for expenses to extract pollutants from land or water. When a diesel fuel spill occurred on the company's property, the company sought insurance reimbursement under the policies and also submitted claims to the Montana Petroleum Tank Release Compensation Board for reimbursement for corrective action costs. The insurer denied the claim, and after the company subrogated the claim to the Board, the Board sought reimbursement from the insurer, but the insurer denied all reimbursement requests, so the Board sued to recover corrective costs from the insurer. The District Court concluded that diesel fuel was a pollutant and that coverage was therefore excluded under the commercial general liability portion of the policy. On appeal, the Board asserted that the court erred in denying coverage, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The terms of the pollution exclusion clause were not ambiguous, and when viewed from the objective perspective of the average consumer, diesel fuel was properly included in the definition of pollutant. The District Court correctly denied coverage under the commercial general liability portion of the policy disclaiming coverage for spills resulting from pollutants. Mont. Petroleum Tank Release Comp. Bd. v. Crumleys, Inc., 2008 MT 2, 341 M 33, 174 P3d 948 (2008).

Application of Banking Standards, Not Livestock Industry Standards, to Loan Transaction Involving Cattle — Bank-Customer Relationship Not Giving Rise to Fiduciary Responsibilities: A bank loaned money to a couple to fund their cattle breeding operation. When the couple failed to make loan payments, the bank brought an action to collect and foreclose, and the couple brought a counterclaim that the bank's actions breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing and the bank's fiduciary duty toward the couple. After the couple paid the amount owing, they became the plaintiffs and the case proceeded on the breach of covenant and fiduciary duty claim. The District Court granted the bank summary judgment on the claim, and on appeal, plaintiffs asserted that the court improperly applied banking standards to the case rather than livestock industry standards, constituting a breach of good faith. The Supreme Court disagreed. In Montana, the relationship between a bank and its customer is generally described as that of debtor and creditor and does not give rise to fiduciary duties except when special circumstances place a bank into the role of adviser. In this case, the bank acted as a creditor and not an adviser, and did not force the cattle sale but simply sought to enforce the repayment provisions of its contract with plaintiffs, so no special circumstances existed. The bank acted in accordance with the contract provisions and comported with prudent banking policy and reasonable commercial standards. It was appropriate for the District Court to apply commercial banking standards to the analysis of the bank's relationship with plaintiffs and plaintiffs' ability to service their loans. Summary judgment for the bank was proper. McCoy v. First Citizens Bank, 2006 MT 307, 335 M 1, 148 P3d 677 (2006).

Buy-Sell Agreement Not Subject to Financing Contingency Absent Specific Contractual Funding Language: A buy-sell agreement stated that the buyer had sufficient funds to close the sale of a ranch and was not relying upon any contingent source of funds unless otherwise stated in the agreement, but there was no third-party financing specified in the agreement. Nevertheless, when the buyer was not able to close the sale for lack of funds, both parties sought to recover the earnest money, and the buyer asserted that the contract language was clear and unambiguous in conditioning the sale on financing. The District Court disagreed, and on appeal, the Supreme Court concurred. The buyer represented that it had sufficient funds, and nowhere in the agreement or in an addendum extending the closing date was it specified that completing financing meant that the buyer had to obtain a loan from a third party. The District Court's award of the earnest money to the seller was affirmed. Sec. Abstract & Title Co. v. Smith Livestock, Inc., 2006 MT 265, 334 M 172, 146 P3d 732 (2006).

Failure of Insurer to Pay Within Sixty-Day Period Specified in Insurance Contract — No Error in Interpretation of Contract: An insurance contract required the insurer to pay for a loss within 60 days after the insurer received proof of loss and: (1) the parties reached an agreement; (2) there was a final judgment; or (3) the insured filed an appraisal with the insurer. The insured sought money damages because the claim was not paid within the 60-day period following the joint appraisal, which resulted in plaintiffs' alleged mental anguish and emotional distress. However, given a lengthy dispute over the amount of damages, the significant disparity between estimates, and plaintiffs' rejection of the joint appraisal, the District Court found that the agreement contemplated by the contract that would trigger the 60-day payment period was never reached. Plaintiffs appealed on grounds that the District Court misinterpreted the contract. The Supreme Court affirmed. The rejected joint appraisal did not constitute an agreement. Because the contractual requirements for the 60-day payment period were not met, the District Court did not err when it declined to conclude that the insurer should have made payment within 60 days of the joint appraisal. Nelson v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2003 MT 101, 315 M 268, 68 P3d 689 (2003).

Allowance for Suspension Without Pay Contained in Policies Covered by Employment Manual — Suspension Proper: A doctor was suspended without pay by a health care facility for failing to sign outstanding warrants. The doctor contended that the suspension was improper because the employment contract allowed for suspension without pay only under specific circumstances, none of which were present in this case. However, the employment contract also contained a provision requiring the doctor to follow the facility policies and procedures, and that reference clearly incorporated the facility's employment manual into the employment contract. The employment contract was not inconsistent with the employment manual, nor was the disciplinary procedure used by the facility to suspend the doctor inconsistent with the employment contract. Thus, the District Court correctly held that the doctor was properly suspended without pay and that the suspension did not violate the employment contract. The doctor's claim for wages during the suspension also failed absent evidence of the hours worked and the ability to calculate the value of those hours. Marias Healthcare Serv., Inc. v. Turenne, 2001 MT 127, 305 M 419, 28 P3d 491 (2001).

Contested Ownership of Independent Business — Standard of Review of Judgment on Pleadings: Hedges claimed ownership of an independent Melaleuca business, allegedly acquired through a written transfer of the business by Johnson, the former owner, before Johnson's death. As corepresentatives of Johnson's estate, the Woodhouses claimed ownership of the same business by virtue of a residuary devise in Johnson's will. The uncontroverted facts in the pleadings served as the factual basis for the parties' competing motions for judgment on the pleadings. A movant for judgment on the pleadings must establish that no material fact exists and that movant is entitled to judgment as a matter of law, and pleadings are to be construed in the light most favorable to the nonmoving party, whose allegations are taken as true. The conclusions of law standard of review is applied. The District Court properly looked to Johnson's Melaleuca contract, which required that Melaleuca accept signed and acknowledged forms in respect to transfer of a business during a business owner's lifetime and approve the transfer in writing. The contractual restrictions on assignment of a Melaleuca contract were not met by Johnson's written transfer of the business to Hedges, and the court correctly concluded that Johnson's assignment was not valid. Judgment on the pleadings for Woodhouses was affirmed. Hedges v. Woodhouse, 2000 MT 220, 301 M 180, 8 P3d 109, 57 St. Rep. 905 (2000).

Plain Language of Policies Providing Insurance on Rental Car Construed — Primary Versus Excess Coverage: Hudson used a credit card to rent a 1995 Ford Mustang convertible from P.C. Rental, Inc. (P.C.). Three days later, Hudson lost control of the car, resulting in damages rendering the vehicle a total loss. At the time of the accident, P.C. had a commercial lines policy through Empire Fire and Marine Insurance Company (Empire) that included liability and physical damage coverage. Hudson did not own a vehicle and was not covered under a personal policy, but auto rental insurance was provided by the company whose credit card Hudson used for the rental. Empire paid P.C. the agreed actual cash value of the vehicle, minus a $1,000 policy deductible, then sold the damaged vehicle for salvage and received an additional $1,108. The credit card company, Visa U.S.A. (Visa), also paid P.C. about $7,800 to cover P.C.'s deductible and lost rental fees. P.C. then brought a breach of contract action against Hudson for failing to return the vehicle in the same condition in which it was rented, as required by the rental agreement. Hudson alleged that Chase Manhattan Bank (Chase), as issuer of the credit card, was responsible for damages sustained to the rental car under the terms of the rental insurance. Hudson subsequently filed for bankruptcy and assigned all rights in the third-party action against Chase to P.C. P.C. then amended the complaint to include the credit card company as defendant, alleging that the rental insurance provided coverage on a 24-hour basis for damage to a car rented with the credit card up to the full value of the car. Visa denied P.C.'s allegations regarding the rental insurance, alleged that Visa had met its obligations under the policy by covering P.C.'s deductible and lost rental fees, and moved for summary judgment, which was granted. The District Court concluded that Hudson was an insured under the liability policy provided to P.C. by Empire and thus Empire was not entitled to subrogate against its own insured. The court determined that because both policies provided damage coverage for the same vehicle, it was necessary to look to the "other insurance" clauses of the policies. The Empire policy stated that its coverage was primary, while the Visa policy stated that its coverage was excess coverage, so Empire was not entitled to recover any of the amount that it paid to P.C. from Visa. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Given the nature of the coverage available, no determination of whether Hudson was an insured under Empire's physical damage coverage was necessary or possible under the policies. The District Court did not err when it concluded that, based on the clear language of the policies, P.C.'s physical damage coverage was primary and Visa's rental insurance was excess. P.C. Rental, Inc. v. Chase Manhattan Bank, 2000 MT 106, 299 M 315, 998 P2d 1168, 57 St. Rep. 430 (2000).

Tender of Payment of Attorney Fees Conditioned on Release of Files Upheld — Right of Patent Assignee to Files Upheld — Construction of Agreement as Assignment and Not License of Patent: Millhollin invented a device to align conveyor belts, which he called a "belt trapper". Millhollin also entered into an agreement with The Conveyor Company (TCC), in which Millhollin gave TCC the exclusive right to make, use, and sell the belt trapper in the United States and foreign countries and in which, in return, TCC agreed to pay Millhollin royalties and other amounts. After deciding that the fees charged by Conover, Millhollin's lawyer, for certain work in connection with the patents were too high, TCC tendered Conover the balance of his fees, conditioned upon Conover turning over his files in the matter to TCC. Millhollin then sent TCC a notice of its default on the contract. After no action was taken by TCC to cure the default, Millhollin declared the agreement terminated and filed a declaratory judgment action. The District Court held that TCC had the right to tender payment conditioned upon receipt of the files. Citing Advance-Rumely Thresher Co., Inc. v. Hess, 85 M 293, 279 P 236 (1929), and 28-1-1211, the Supreme Court held that a tender of payment may be conditional as long as the condition is one that the tenderer has a right to insist upon. The Supreme Court then analyzed the relationship between TCC and Millhollin as set forth in the written agreement between them and found that the agreement transferred by assignment all of Millhollin's rights in the belt trapper to TCC. Consequently, the Supreme Court held that the files in the hands of Conover were property belonging to TCC and that TCC could therefore withhold payment to Conover conditioned upon release of those files without breaching its agreement with Millhollin. Millhollin v. The Conveyor Co., 1998 MT 41, 287 M 377, 954 P2d 1163, 55 St. Rep. 136 (1998).

Application of Procuring Cause Doctrine to Exclusive Listing Agreements: The procuring cause doctrine, which permits a broker to show that the broker's part of the contract was performed and that the principal reaped a benefit from the efforts, is not confined to consideration of nonexclusive listing agreements. It applies in all situations unless the parties agree otherwise in the listing contract. Lane v. Smith, 255 M 218, 841 P2d 1143, 49 St. Rep. 974 (1992), clarifying Flinders v. Gilbert, 141 M 442, 378 P2d 385 (1963), and followed in Hall & Hall, Inc. v. Hyde, 264 M 190, 870 P2d 1362, 51 St. Rep. 257 (1994).

Unambiguous Contract — No Interpretation Needed: When the words of a contract are clear, certain, and unambiguous, the language alone controls and there is nothing for the courts to interpret or construe. In the construction of contracts, the courts may look not only to the language employed but also to the subject matter and the surrounding circumstances and may avail themselves of the same light that the parties possessed when the contract was made. The District Court did not err when it found that the term "concrete" included, specifically, precast concrete panels. Morning Star Enterprises, Inc. v. R.H. Grover, Inc., 247 M 105, 805 P2d 553, 48 St. Rep. 112 (1991), followed in Nyquist v. Nyquist, 255 M 149, 841 P2d 515, 49 St. Rep. 927 (1992).

No Express Warranties Found in Repair Contracts, Protective Covenants, and Preliminary Declaration: The plaintiffs, a condominium owners' association and its individual members, sued Big Sky of Montana Realty, Inc., the successor in interest of Big Sky of Montana, Inc., for breach of express warranties in failing to originally construct and later repair construction defects in fireplaces in the Deer Lodge Condominiums at Big Sky, Montana, in accordance with applicable fire and building codes. The plaintiffs based their claim of express warranty upon the repair contracts, claiming that the contracts called for the repairs to be done according to applicable plumbing, electrical, and building codes. Plaintiffs also based their claim of express warranty on protective covenants that require compliance with the same codes and on the preliminary declaration for the condominiums that required compliance with those codes. The plaintiffs contended that the declaration ran with the land because it had to be recorded. The District Court granted the defendants' motion for summary judgment, dismissing Big Sky of Montana Realty, Inc. The Supreme Court held that the District Court correctly found that no express warranties existed. Ass'n of Unit Owners of Deer Lodge Condominium v. Big Sky of Mont., Inc., 245 M 64, 798 P2d 1018, 47 St. Rep. 1814 (1990).

Termination of Contract Not Sole Remedy: The Supreme Court, relying on its holding in Glacier Campground v. Wild Rivers, Inc., 184 M 543, 597 P2d 689 (1978), ruled that the language of the contract between the parties was not ambiguous and did not limit the plaintiffs to termination as their only remedy for the defendants' breach of contract. Belue v. Gebhardt, 240 M 358, 784 P2d 396, 46 St. Rep. 2192 (1989). See also Kaufman Bros. v. Home Value Stores, Inc., 2012 MT 121, 365 Mont. 196, 279 P.3d 157, in which the Supreme Court reaffirmed the principle that under a conditional sales agreement, plaintiffs are entitled to invoke one of two inconsistent remedies: either to affirm the contract and sue for the balance of the purchase price or to terminate the contract, retain the money paid, and repossess the property, the election of one precluding the election of the other; the court concluded that the plaintiffs' breach of contract action was precluded under the election of remedies doctrine because the plaintiffs elected to terminate the contract.

Bank Claim to Property Alleged as Fixtures — Inferior to Owners' Property Rights: Mills took out a loan to acquire personal property to be used in a roller-skating facility, including a removable heating system, and paid off the loan about 18 months later. Mills later sold the roller-skating facility, including the heating system, to Davises. The transaction was financed through the Little Horn State Bank. The contract provided that in case Davises defaulted, possession of the real and personal property would return to Mills and Davises would retain no further interest. Davises defaulted and entered an agreement and release with the bank whereby the property was deeded to the bank in consideration of the bank satisfying the mortgage debt. Mills later offered to sell the heating system to the bank, but the bank refused and advised Mills that the bank claimed the property as fixtures pursuant to Davises' mortgage, whereupon Mills removed the heating system. However, because Mills were at all times the owners of the personal property, the bank obtained no more interest than that held by Davises. Therefore, the bank's claim to the heating system as fixtures was inferior and subject to the property rights of Mills. Little Horn St. Bank v. Mill, 233 M 372, 760 P2d 91, 45 St. Rep. 1563 (1988).

Performance Combined With Terms — Valid Contract: An agreement for development of a mineral interest did not include every item that might have been included with respect to operational aspects; however, the parties performed under the agreement for 3 years. The Supreme Court cited Wilkerson v. School District, 216 M 203, 700 P2d 617, 42 St. Rep. 745 (1985), in holding that a contract is not invalid simply because it does not contain all the provisions or conditions the parties might have incorporated into it. Therefore, performance under the agreement, combined with the actual terms provided, demonstrated the existence of a valid contract. Somont Oil Co., Inc. v. Nutter, 228 M 467, 743 P2d 1016, 44 St. Rep. 1685 (1987).

Tenant's Estate in Land — Tenant's Share in PIK Benefits: An oral lease granted two-thirds of crops grown to the tenant Popp. The land was later included in the federal payment in kind program (PIK), but in the absence of a written lease, the payments were made to landlords Frank and Gountanis rather than to Popp. The District Court awarded two-thirds of the PIK benefits to Popp. On appeal, Frank questioned whether a lease which required a percentage of crops to go to the tenant but which did not contemplate later federal benefits required the tenant to share in those benefits when the fruits of his labor did not create any entitlements under the federal program. The Supreme Court, in affirming the award, held that Popp had an estate interest in the land for the duration of his tenancy and that the award to Frank and Gountanis was in derogation of Popp's interest. Popp v. Gountanis, 221 M 267, 718 P2d 340, 43 St. Rep. 801 (1986).

Irrigation Contract — Interpretation of Limitations on Water Usage: Where the plaintiff irrigator brought an action against an irrigation company, claiming the company had violated its contract with the plaintiff by failing to provide him with sufficient water to irrigate his land, the District Court did not err in holding that it was the plaintiff who violated the contract since there was substantial evidence showing that the blockage of the irrigation ditch by the plaintiff resulted in the plaintiff's taking of more than the 400 miner's inches of water a year allowed by the contract. The District Court did err, however, in prohibiting the plaintiff from diverting water by pumping and from irrigating land not historically irrigated. There was no language in the contract restricting the method of irrigation or the number or location of acres to be irrigated. As long as the plaintiff used no more water than his contractual entitlement, the District Court could not limit the means or place of irrigation. Griffel v. Cove Ditch Co., 207 M 348, 675 P2d 90, 41 St. Rep. 1 (1984).

"Occupying" Defined — Motor Vehicle Insurance Coverage: Sayers rode in Galetti's vehicle to Storm's vehicle, which was stalled, with the intention of jump starting it. At the time of the accident, the Galetti vehicle and the Storm vehicle were facing each other and Sayers was between the two vehicles leaning under the hood of the Storm vehicle. An uninsured motorist struck the rear of the Storm vehicle, propelling it forward into the Galetti vehicle and severely injuring Sayers. The Supreme Court held that Sayers was occupying Galetti's vehicle under Galetti's insurance policy's definition of occupying and that Sayers was entitled to stack the uninsured motorist limits of liability on the insurance policies covering automobiles not involved in the accident. Sayers and Galetti each had two vehicles covered by uninsured motorist provisions, and Storm had three vehicles covered by uninsured motorist provisions. Sayers v. Safeco, 192 M 336, 628 P2d 659, 38 St. Rep. 814 (1981), distinguished in Chilberg v. Rose, 273 M 414, 903 P2d 1377, 52 St. Rep. 1038 (1995), and followed in Estate of Richerson v. Cincinnati Ins. Co., 2011 MT 266, 362 Mont. 324, 264 P.3d 1087. Sayers was followed and Chilberg was distinguished in Farmers Alliance Mut. Ins. Co. v. Holeman, 1998 MT 155, 289 M 312, 961 P2d 114, 55 St. Rep. 601 (1998).

Jury Instruction on Procuring Cause — Real Estate Listing: Defendant contended it was error for the court to give instructions on procuring cause in a case involving payment of a real estate commission. The instructions given were contractual interpretation instructions taken almost verbatim from Montana statutes. A contract is to be construed so as to make it definite, operative, and reasonable; words are to be understood in their usual sense, and technical words are to be interpreted in the sense used in the business to which they relate. In this case, the court did just that. In addition, because the instructions set forth the actual law of Montana for the construction of contracts, they are part of the contract itself. Barrett v. Ballard, 191 M 39, 622 P2d 180, 37 St. Rep. 2038 (1980).

No Factual Issue of Waiver Under Contractual Consent to Assignment Clause — Summary Judgment Proper: The Nicholsons entered a contract option with J.G.L. Distributing (JGL) that gave JGL 5 years to purchase the Nicholsons' property. The option contained a consent to assignment clause that required JGL to obtain the Nicholsons' written consent before assignment to a third party. JGL subsequently assigned an interest in the property to plaintiff but did not notify the Nicholsons. Plaintiff spent money improving the property but missed a payment. The Nicholsons then notified JGL that the option expired and that they intended to sell the property to someone else. Plaintiff sued JGL and the Nicholsons, JGL counterclaimed against plaintiff and filed cross-claims against the Nicholsons, the Nicholsons counterclaimed against JGL, and all three parties moved for summary judgment. The District Court dismissed plaintiff's claim because plaintiff was not a party to the contract. The court also held that the consent to assignment clause was valid and enforceable, but that even though JGL breached the agreement by not notifying the Nicholsons of the assignment and by missing a payment, the breach was not material and did not serve to terminate JGL's right to exercise the option. The court then concluded that forfeiture would be too harsh a remedy, excused the forfeiture, and granted JGL 20 days to pay the Nicholsons the full purchase price. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiff failed to show a genuine issue of material fact that the Nicholsons waived their rights under the consent to assignment clause. The breach of contract by JGL was incidental rather than material, so the District Court's holding that forfeiture would be too harsh was not erroneous. Thus, the District Court correctly applied the antiforfeiture statute when it granted JGL equitable relief under 28-1-104 because JGL's breach was not grossly negligent, willful, or fraudulent. It was only when the Nicholsons discovered that they could sell the property at a greater profit that they acted to strictly enforce the timely payment provision of the contract, so application of the antiforfeiture statute was appropriate to avoid an unjust result. R.C. Hobbs Enterprises, LLC v. J.G.L. Distrib., Inc., 2004 MT 396, 325 M 277, 104 P3d 503 (2004). See also Erban v. Monforton, 227 M 531, 740 P2d 677 (1987), Norwood v. Serv. Justiciable Controversy Required:
The Supreme Court applied the rationale in Hardy v. Krutzfeldt, 206 M 521, 672 P2d 274 (1983), in holding that plaintiff's request for a declaratory judgment regarding the legality of closing school board meetings to the public amounted to a request for an advisory opinion that would have no impact on present or future rights of the parties. Because plaintiff did not seek to void the meetings, a justiciable controversy did not exist and a declaratory judgment action could not be maintained. Flesh v. Bd. of Trustees, 241 M 158, 786 P2d 4, 47 St. Rep. 161 (1990).

When a declaratory judgment had been sought on the issue of whether a right of first refusal of real property was invalid under the rule against perpetuities, it should have been dismissed by the District Court because no justiciable controversy existed. Relying on Hardy v. Krutzfeldt, 206 M 521, 672 P2d 274, 40 St. Rep. 1823 (1983), the Supreme Court noted that in this case there was no pending sale or offer for sale or purchase or offer to purchase the affected property. Neither had a third party challenged the clause's application to him. Parker v. Weed, 220 M 49, 713 P2d 535, 43 St. Rep. 162 (1986).

The parties were all heirs of Robert Hardy. He created trusts that became operative upon his death. The trusts were terminated, and the heirs entered negotiations for the division of a ranch making up the corpus of the trust. An agreement was entered dividing the ranch into seven tracts. The agreement provided that prior to the sale of any tract the other six heirs were to be given the right of first refusal. If all declined and a contract was entered into with a third party, all six had the right to meet the offer, with the first to accept to be given priority. The plaintiffs filed a complaint for declaratory relief seeking to have the provisions on first refusal declared an unreasonable restraint on alienation. The District Court granted summary judgment to defendants. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded with instructions to dismiss. The court held that there was no justiciable controversy as no attempts had been made to sell any of the tracts. The court held that the Uniform Declaratory Judgments Act could not be used as a platform for the courts in Montana to plunge into indefinite, amorphous ponds of contract interpretation. Hardy v. Krutzfeldt, 206 M 521, 672 P2d 274, 40 St. Rep. 1823 (1983), relied on in Parker v. Weed, 220 M 49, 713 P2d 535, 43 St. Rep. 162 (1986).

Finding of Perpetual Contractual Obligation Invalid: A contract between the city of Billings and an adjoining county water district does not, as the District Court found, bind the parties to a perpetual obligation until the consent of both parties to terminate the contract is obtained. The Supreme Court found that the life of the contract is indefinite, not perpetual, and may be terminated by the Public Service Commission if the Commission finds such action necessary and within its jurisdiction over rates and service. Billings v. P.S.C., 193 M 358, 631 P2d 1295, 38 St. Rep. 1162 (1981).

28-3-101. Rules of interpretation to be uniform.

Case Notes

Influence of Parties' Course of Conduct: In extended litigation, the city of Billings and the police union differed on interpretation of a contract. Regarding a dispute on interpreting a contract provision, the District Court granted summary judgment to the city based on extrinsic evidence of intent and course of conduct. The Supreme Court affirmed that decision, explaining that course of conduct is entitled to controlling weight if there is ambiguity. Watters v. Billings, 2019 MT 255, 397 Mont. 428, 451 P.3d 60.

Error to Deny Jury Trial on Plaintiffs' Claims for Breach of Contract — Interpretation: Appellants, as developers, entered into subdivision improvement agreement with respondent city. The court held that it was error for trial court to deny appellants a jury trial on their claims for breach of contract based on allegations that the parties either failed to attach like meanings to the word "crossing" (to be installed over a city drain) or, alternatively, that the crossing to be constructed under SID is not comparable to the one contemplated by the parties at time of entering agreement. If, as here, contract term is ambiguous, intention of parties is left to jury. A claim of differing uses of the word "crossing" puts the existence, as well as meaning, of the present contract at issue for a jury determination. Gray v. Billings, 213 M 6, 689 P2d 268, 41 St. Rep. 1910 (1984).

Contract Remedies: In the absence of a contractual provision expressly limiting the remedies available, a party may pursue any remedy that law or equity affords, as well as the remedies specified in the contract. Glacier Campground v. Wild Rivers, Inc., 182 M 389, 184 M 543, 597 P2d 689 (1978).

Reservation of Oil and Gas Rights: Where a deed of land contained a clause following the description of the land which said "including one-half of all oil and gas rights owned by the parties", it must be considered that it was the intention of the parties to exclude from the deed the other one-half interest in the oil and gas and that such one-half remained with the grantor. Wyrick v. Hoefle, 136 M 172, 346 P2d 563 (1959).

28-3-102. What law and usage to govern interpretation.

Case Notes

Choice of Law — Nonbeneficiary Third Party Cannot Assert Defenses and Counterclaims Arising From Contract: The defendant set up Limegrove Corporation for tax purposes, and he informally ran the day-to-day operations. Limegrove's sole shareholder was a trust for the defendant's children. To secure a property loan for a Montana-based property to be held by Limegrove, the defendant signed a promissory note and a term loan agreement, both subject to New York law, and Limegrove and the plaintiff bank signed a trust indenture security agreement subject to Montana law. Because judicial foreclosures must occur where the property is located, the parties correctly agreed that the subsequent foreclosure action on the property was governed by Montana law, but the parties disagreed on which state governed the defendant's defenses and counterclaims. Because the defendant was not a party to the trust indenture, his defenses and counterclaims could not arise from it, and because New York law did not offend Montana public policy, the District Court did not err in concluding that New York law governed the defendant's defenses and counterclaims. HSBC Bank USA, N.A. v. Anderson, 2017 MT 257, 389 Mont. 106, 406 P.3d 416.

Ohio Law Governs Employment Contract Claim — Subject Matter Jurisdiction Not Necessarily Precluded — Reversed to Consider Application of Doctrine Forum Non Conveniens: The plaintiff was an Ohio resident who worked for the defendant, a company whose principal place of business was Montana. After he was terminated, the plaintiff filed a wrongful discharge suit against the defendant in Montana. The defendant filed a motion to dismiss for lack of subject matter jurisdiction, which the District Court granted. On appeal, the Supreme Court ruled that although the District Court correctly ruled that Ohio law governed the plaintiff's employment contract claim, it erred in concluding that it therefore lacked subject matter jurisdiction over the claim. The Supreme Court also concluded that, based on the record, it could not determine whether an alternative forum was available for the plaintiff's claim, and it therefore vacated the District Court's dismissal and remanded for consideration of whether dismissal under the doctrine of forum non conveniens was appropriate. Harrington v. Energy West, Inc., 2015 MT 233, 380 Mont. 298, 356 P.3d 441.

No Choice-of-Law Provision in Insurance Contract — Place of Performance "Anywhere in the World" — Montana Law Applied: The parties entered into an insurance contract that did not contain a choice-of-law provision. Instead, the contract provided that the place of performance of the contract was "anywhere in the world". After the plaintiffs filed a lawsuit in Montana, the defendants argued that Washington law applied. The plaintiffs argued that Montana law applied, and the trial court agreed. The District Court concluded that because the suit was filed in Montana by Montana workers, and given the language in the contract, Montana was an anticipated place of performance, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Tidyman's Management Serv. v. Davis, 2014 MT 201, 376 Mont. 72, 330 P.3d 1135.

Insurance Contract Choice of Law Provision — Montana Law Incorrectly Applied to Nevada Policy: The District Court conducted a conflict of law analysis and concluded that Montana law governed Tenas's entitlement to damages for an accident that occurred in Montana under a personal auto policy that Tenas's mother obtained in Nevada. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Nevada was determined to have a materially greater interest than Montana based on the fact that: (1) Nevada was the place of contracting; (2) although Montana represented a place of performance under the policy, place of performance weighed heavily toward Nevada because Tenas and her mother were mere visitors to Montana; (3) Tenas and her mother resided in Nevada, so that state had a greater interest regarding domicile, residence, nationality, place of incorporation, and place of business of the parties; and (4) a policy choice of law provision required application of Nevada law to resolve any disputes. Given Nevada's greater interest, the District Court improperly applied Montana law to the dispute. Tenas v. Progressive Preferred Ins. Co., 2008 MT 393, 347 M 133, 197 P3d 990 (2008). See also Casarotto v. Lombardi, 268 M 369, 886 P2d 931, 51 St. Rep. 1350 (1994), Mitchell v. St. Farm Ins. Co., 2003 MT 102, 315 M 281, 68 P3d 703 (2003), Wamsley v. Nodak Mut. Ins. Co., 2008 MT 56, 341 M 467, 178 P3d 102 (2008), Modroo v. Nationwide Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 2008 MT 275, 345 M 262, 191 P3d 389 (2008), and Newman v. Scottsdale Ins. Co., 2013 MT 125, 370 Mont. 133, 301 P.3d 348.

Forum Selection Clause Valid by Operation of Choice of Law Clause: In a contract containing a paragraph that contained both a choice of law clause for Washington state and a forum selection clause that included Spokane, Washington, the Supreme Court determined that the choice of law clause was valid under the factors set out in Modroo v. Nationwide Mutual Fire Insurance Company, 2008 MT 275, 345 M 262, 191 P3d 389 (2008), and since Washington law recognizes forum selection clauses and Appleway chose Spokane as the venue, Montana venue is improper. Polzin v. Appleway Equipment Leasing Inc., 2008 MT 300, 345 M 508, 191 P3d 476 (2008), followed in San Diego Gas & Electric Co. v. Ninth Judicial District Court, 2014 MT 191, 375 Mont. 517, 329 P.3d 1264.

Challenge to Contract or to Arbitration Clause — When Arbitration Appropriate: Plaintiffs defaulted on a loan with defendant, and nonjudicial foreclosure proceedings were begun. The loan contract contained an arbitration clause, but plaintiffs challenged the validity of the contract as a whole, not the validity of the arbitration clause. On defendant's motion, the District Court ordered arbitration, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court held that under federal law, when a complaint specifically challenges a contract arbitration clause, the doctrine of severability set out in Prima Paint Corp. v. Flood & Conklin Mfg. Co., 388 US 395 (1967), in conjunction with the Federal Arbitration Act, allows a court to hear the challenge. However, when, as here, a complaint challenges a contract as a whole, Prima Paint and Buckeye Check Cashing, Inc. v. Cardegna, 546 US 440 (2006), require a court to grant a motion to compel arbitration if the contract contains an arbitration provision. Thus, despite plaintiffs' contention that the contract itself was void ab initio, the District Court was affirmed. Martz v. Beneficial Mont., Inc., 2006 MT 94, 332 M 93, 135 P3d 790 (2006). However, see Thompson v. Lithia Chrysler Jeep Dodge of Great Falls, 2008 MT 175, 343 M 392, 185 P3d 332 (2008), in which a narrow exception to the Martz rule established that when a party challenges a contract containing an arbitration clause on the ground that the parties never entered a contract, the court, not arbitration, is the appropriate forum to decide whether a contract existed, prior to compelling arbitration.

Contract Interpretation Applicable to Restrictive Covenants — How Ambiguity Resolved — Restrictive Covenants Strictly Construed: General rules of contract interpretation apply to restrictive covenants, and any person having an interest under a restrictive covenant may seek declaratory relief concerning any question of construction arising under the covenant. When a restrictive covenant has been reduced to writing, the intent of the parties is to be ascertained, when possible, from the writing alone, and when the language of a covenant is clear, a court must apply the language as written. Restrictive covenants are strictly construed, and ambiguities in covenants are resolved to allow free use of property. The determination of whether an ambiguity exists in a restrictive covenant is a question of law for a court to decide, but mere disagreement between the parties as to interpretation of a restrictive covenant does not automatically create an ambiguity. Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006). See also Newman v. Wittmer, 277 M 1, 917 P2d 926 (1996), and Toavs v. Sayre, 281 M 243, 934 P2d 165 (1997).

No Contractual Definition of Cause — Discretionary Termination of Professional Sports Team Coach Related to Legitimate Business Needs Warranted: Cole was fired as a professional hockey coach because of the team's poor performance. Cole's 5-year employment agreement contained a clause, drafted by Cole, providing that if Cole was terminated without cause, he would receive 1 year's salary and a bonus. Although the contract did not contain a definition of cause, the District Court found that the termination was without cause. The Supreme Court disagreed. Applying de novo review of the District Court's summary judgment to interpret the employment contract terms in their ordinary and popular sense and construing any uncertainty in the contract language against Cole, who drafted it, the Supreme Court held that discharging the coach of a poorly performing professional sports team was a discretionary decision related to the legitimate needs of the business and constituted cause, so the employer had a legitimate business reason to terminate the coach. Thus, Cole was not entitled to recover under the contract. Cole v. Valley Ice Garden, LLC, 2005 MT 115, 327 M 99, 113 P3d 275 (2005).

Jurisdiction of Montana Courts Over Wrongful Discharge Case Involving Montana Citizen When Montana Law Applies — Dismissal for Lack of Jurisdiction Reversed: Plaintiff was a Montana resident hired by a Florida corporation, which was operated out of Oklahoma, to lay fiber optic cable throughout the country. While working in Indiana, plaintiff had a dispute with a supervisor and was fired. Plaintiff brought an action in Montana, claiming a violation of the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act. The District Court held that under 39-2-912, the Montana courts lacked subject matter jurisdiction and dismissed the claim. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Even though plaintiff never signed a written employment contract, the court held that a contract provision may be broad enough to indicate that an entire contract be governed by the laws of the state governing the particular provision. The fact that the defendant corporation paid income taxes, unemployment insurance premiums, and wages in Montana indicated an intent to be governed by Montana law. The court also concluded that under sections 187 and 188 of Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws (1971), the local law of the state with the most significant relationship to the transaction applies to questions of contract interpretation absent an effective choice of law by the parties. Plaintiff was considered a Montana resident despite the fact that employment required travel to other states, and the court concluded that it was appropriate to apply the Wrongful Discharge From Employment Act to the case even though the Act does not expressly provide for extraterritorial jurisdiction. Montana courts have subject matter jurisdiction in cases involving a Montana resident when Montana law applies, so plaintiff's case should not have been dismissed for lack of subject matter jurisdiction. Law of Place of Performance to Control Contract Legal Construction and Effect: Unless the terms of an insurance contract provide otherwise, the law of the place of performance generally controls a contract's legal construction and effect, and when an insurance contract designates the place of performance to be any state where a claim arises, performance occurs where the insured obtains judgment. It follows that the place of performance is also the place where an insured is entitled to receive benefits, has incurred accident-related expenses, or is entitled to judgment. The policies in question here contemplated that the insurer perform its contractual duty anywhere in the United States, even though the policies were purchased in California. The District Court held that California law applied, but the Supreme Court reversed. Montana was the place of performance pursuant to the policies because Mitchell, the plaintiff insured, was working and living in Montana at the time of the accident, the underinsured tortfeasor's vehicle was insured in Montana, Mitchell's medical expenses were incurred in Montana, Mitchell settled with the tortfeasor's insurers for the policy limit giving rise to an underinsured motorist claim in Montana, and judgment concerning the accident would be rendered and paid in Montana. Mitchell v. St. Farm Ins. Co., 2003 MT 102, 315 M 281, 68 P3d 703 (2003), followed in Wamsley v. Nodak Mut. Ins. Co., 2008 MT 56, 341 M 467, 178 P3d 102 (2008), and Tidyman's Management Serv. v. Davis, 2014 MT 201, 376 Mont. 72, 330 P.3d 1135. See also Restatement (Second) of Conflict of Laws 6 (1971), and Kemp v. Allstate Ins. Co., 183 M 526, 601 P2d 20 (1979).

Question of Fault and Question of Entitlement to Collect Damages Separate: Dill suffered damages after being hit as a pedestrian by a vehicle operated by Jardine. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company (State Farm) provided both liability insurance for Jardine and underinsured motorist coverage for Dill. Meeting all the conditions precedent in the policy, Dill recovered the maximum policy amount from Jardine pursuant to Jardine's policy, then, consistent with the general release executed on Dill's behalf in settling with Jardine, Dill demanded underinsured motorist benefits under Dill's policy, which State Farm refused to pay. The District Court held that Dill's claim against State Farm would not be ripe for adjudication until after Jardine's fault was established and damages assessed in a negligence action. However, the question of whether anyone was at fault and the question of whether an insured is legally entitled to collect damages from an underinsured driver are not the same. A person can be legally entitled to collect damages without first proving fault in court, as Dill did here; conversely, an insured might prove fault on the part of the defendant and yet not be entitled to collect damages. Once an insured demonstrates a legal entitlement to damages, principles of contract law define the coverage afforded by an underinsured motorist policy; tort law is relevant only as far as fault is concerned. Under a writ of supervisory control, the Supreme Court looked to the clear language of the policy and found no issues of fault for a factfinder to resolve. The only questions remaining were whether Dill was legally entitled to collect damages and, if so, in what amount. Regardless of whether anyone was at fault, having already received money from State Farm, Dill was obviously legally entitled to receive damages. Thus, the case was reversed for a trial to determine the amount of damages, if any, that Dill was entitled to under the underinsured motorist policy. Dill v. District Court, 1999 MT 85, 294 M 134, 979 P2d 188, 56 St. Rep. 350 (1999).

Choice of Applicable State Law — Application of Motor Vehicle Insurance Policy Stating Oregon Subrogation Law: Generally, the law of the place where an insurance contract was made governs questions of execution and validity of the contract, while the law of the place of performance controls the legal construction and effect of the contract. In a motor vehicle insurance contract made in Oregon and performed in Montana, a choice of law provision that required application of Oregon subrogation law violated Montana public policy and was unenforceable. Youngblood v. Am. St. Ins. Co., 262 M 391, 866 P2d 203, 50 St. Rep. 1601 (1993).

Motor Vehicle Insurance Policy Governed by Contract Law: The insurer argued that it was not liable to compensate the plaintiff for an injury suffered while in Canada because the plaintiff would not have been able to recover under Canadian tort law. The Supreme Court held that the liability of the insurer was governed by the terms of the contract and those terms were to be construed pursuant to the contract laws of the place in which the contract had been entered. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Estate of Braun, 243 M 125, 793 P2d 253, 47 St. Rep. 1043 (1990), followed in Dill v. District Court, 1999 MT 85, 294 M 134, 979 P2d 188, 56 St. Rep. 350 (1999).

Coverage Denied When Property Destroyed by Arson: The plaintiff left part of her property in her ex-husband's home after their divorce because she had no place to store it. The home and contents had been insured prior to the divorce, and both spouses had been named as insureds on the policy. The ex-husband set fire to the dwelling and committed suicide. The plaintiff filed a claim with the insurance company for her property that was destroyed in the fire. The Supreme Court reversed the lower court and ruled that even though the plaintiff was an innocent coinsured, the contract expressly stated that no losses caused by the intentional act of any insured were covered. Woodhouse v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 241 M 69, 785 P2d 192, 47 St. Rep. 89 (1990), followed in Tyler v. Fireman's Fund Ins. Co., 255 M 174, 841 P2d 538, 49 St. Rep. 958 (1992).

Conflict of Law — Express Contractual Provision Controls: Plaintiff was injured due to a faulty handrail in a missile silo on which he was working. Defendant sought indemnification from the construction company pursuant to a contract between the parties. The contract was executed in Washington and was to be performed in Montana. Under 28-3-102, the contract would be interpreted according to Montana law. However, the contract contained a provision whereby the parties agreed the terms of the contract would be governed by Washington law. When the language of a contract is clear and unambiguous, it is the court's duty to enforce the contract as made by the parties. Therefore, Washington law controlled the issue. Steinke v. The Boeing Co., 525 F. Supp. 234, 38 St. Rep. 1966 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

California Release of Tortfeasor — Montana Law Applicable: The release of a tortfeasor involved in a Montana accident signed in California by a New York resident, is subject to Montana law since the right to sue for the tort accrued in Montana and the release did not specify which law applies. Kussler v. Burlington N., Inc., 186 M 82, 606 P2d 520 (1980).

Conflicts — Place of Performance of Insurance Contract: This section is not a declaration of the rule of lex loci contractus, the law of the place where the contract was made. Rather, it is a declaration that generally a contract is to be interpreted under the rule of lex loci solutionis, the law of the place of performance. Under this statute, it is only when the contract does not indicate a place of performance that the interpretation would fall under the rule of lex loci contractus. Montana was found to be the place of performance of an insurance contract that provided for payment to a person legally entitled to recover because the judgment providing for recovery was obtained in Montana. Montana law was, therefore, applied. Kemp v. Allstate Ins. Co., 183 M 526, 601 P2d 20 (1979).

Assignment: The validity of an assignment must be determined by the law of the place of assignment. Capital Fin. Corp. v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 75 M 460, 243 P 1061 (1926).

Life Insurance Contract: A contract of life insurance made in this state between one of its residents and a foreign company is governed by the laws of this state. Capital Fin. Corp. v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 75 M 460, 243 P 1061 (1926).

Farm Lease: The lease was not void for failing to designate the time and place for a division of the crops provided for, since under this section any uncertainty in that respect was determinable by the custom or usage observed in the vicinity in the light of the surrounding facts and circumstances bearing upon the transaction. McDonald v. McNinch, 63 M 308, 206 P 1096 (1922).

Sale of Sheep: A telegram, "Wire lowest price you will sell the 7,000 S. & W. yearling ewes", and an answering telegram, "Lowest price on S. & W. yearling ewes eleven fifty this subject to immediate acceptance", together with custom and usage and this section and 28-3-201 and 28-3-402, evidenced a complete contract for the sale of the sheep, where defendant's offer was accepted within 24 hours, as against an objection that there was no meeting of the minds of the parties upon the price to be paid for the sheep, in that price could only be determined upon delivery and that the offer was not accepted immediately. Story v. Stanfield, 275 F 401 (1921).

Part 2
General Rules of Interpretation

Part Case Notes

Failure to Notify of Claim Pursuant to Plain Language of Insurance Policy — No Coverage — Summary Judgment Proper: The plaintiffs sued a construction company for faulty construction of their home and were awarded a default judgment in the amount of nearly $2 million after the construction company failed to appear. The plaintiffs then secured a judgment and requested payment from the construction company's insurance company. The insurance company denied coverage on the basis that its insured never provided notice of the claim as required by the insurance policy and that the insured's failure to provide notice resulted in prejudice to the insurance company. The District Court agreed and granted the insurance company's motion for summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the grant of summary judgment, given that the notice requirements in the insurance policy were simple and clear and that by not receiving notice, the insurance company had been deprived of the ability to adequately investigate and litigate the claim against its insured. Steadele v. Colony Ins. Co., 2011 MT 208, 361 Mont. 459, 260 P.3d 145. See also Estate of Gleason v. Cent. United Life Ins. Co., 2015 MT 140, 379 Mont. 219, 350 P.3d 349, expressly adopting the notice-prejudice rule in the first party insurance coverage context. However, see Atlantic Casualty Ins. Co. v. Greytak, 2015 MT 149, 379 Mont. 332, 350 P.3d 63.

Objective Determination of Whether Ambiguity Exists in Contract — Ambiguity Not Created by Disagreement Over Interpretation of Contract Language: The determination whether an ambiguity exists in a contract is made on an objective basis. A conclusion of ambiguity is not compelled by the fact that parties to a document, or their attorneys, have or suggest opposing interpretations of a contract or even disagree as to whether the contract is reasonably open to just one interpretation, nor does ambiguity exist just because a claimant says so. Rather, an ambiguity exists only if the language is susceptible to at least two reasonable but conflicting meanings. In the present case, plaintiffs' backup position was that language in a right-of-way contract was ambiguous, but the three circumstances proffered by plaintiffs, even when considered collectively, did not demonstrate that the contract language was susceptible to at least two reasonable but conflicting meanings. Thus, the trial court did not err in concluding that the language was unambiguous, which was in fact plaintiffs' primary position. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), followed in Wills Cattle Co. v. Shaw, 2007 MT 191, 338 M 351, 167 P3d 397 (2007).

Ambiguity Regarding Whether Settlement Contingent on Alternate Financing — Summary Judgment Improper: Plaintiff sought to foreclose on a loan made to defendant, alleging that defendant's liabilities exceeded the value of the collateral, resulting in default pursuant to the terms of the note. The parties made several attempts to settle the issue, resulting in defendant's payoff to plaintiff, but in an amount that the plaintiff claimed was insufficient. The District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff and ordered enforcement of the settlement agreement. However, a letter memorializing the settlement agreement, when considered with the parties' other correspondence, created an ambiguity regarding whether the settlement was contingent on alternate financing. Because there was more than one reasonable interpretation regarding the parties' intention, the parties' affidavits and testimony were admissible to determine intention and raised an issue of fact that precluded summary judgment. The case was remanded for further proceedings. Stockman Bank v. Potts, 2002 MT 178, 311 M 12, 52 P3d 920 (2002).

Material Misrepresentation on Application for Credit Life and Disability Insurance — Denial of Coverage Warranted: Schlemmer applied to the North Central Life Insurance Company (North Central) for credit life and disability insurance but misrepresented his health history. If he had answered correctly on the application, he would have been ineligible for the insurance. Nevertheless, he averred by his signature that he understood the form and that his application statements were true, so the policy was issued. Schlemmer later filed a claim for disability payments. North Central investigated, found that Schlemmer had been treated within the previous 2 years for hypertension, chronic obstructive lung disease, and disease or disorder of the kidneys, contrary to his statements in the application, and denied the claim and refunded Schlemmer's premiums. Schlemmer sued for damages, claiming that the application and underwriting procedures used by North Central violated 33-18-201, commonly known as the unfair claims settlement practices law, breached the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, and constituted fraud. Schlemmer also maintained that the District Court erred in failing to rule on whether North Central's agent had knowledge of Schlemmer's condition, which might have created a question of material fact. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's rulings that: (1) Schlemmer's claim of ignorance of the contents of the written application could not prevail because the application language was clear and unambiguous and Schlemmer did not deny signing it; (2) Schlemmer materially misrepresented his health on the application; (3) the material misrepresentation was legally sufficient to allow North Central to deny coverage under the policy; and (4) Schlemmer's argument that North Central's agent knew or should have known about Schlemmer's health was mere speculation insufficient to create an issue of fact to defeat North Central's properly supported motion for summary judgment. Further, the Supreme Court declined to consider Schlemmer's argument that the misrepresentation could not serve as a basis to rescind the policy because he did not apply for benefits until more than 2 years after applying for the insurance, pursuant to 33-22-205, because Schlemmer never raised the issue at the District Court level. Schlemmer v. N. Cent. Life Ins. Co., 2001 MT 256, 307 M 203, 37 P3d 63 (2001).

Property Description of "2 Acres, More or Less" Not Ambiguous: A property agreement provided that Tract 1 be "2 acres, more or less". Although the phrase "more or less" may not be particularly precise, it is a phrase commonly understood by its plain and ordinary meaning and is not subject to two interpretations. More or less means "approximately", regardless of whether one party would prefer "less", while the other party "more". The property agreement was clear, unambiguous, and enforceable. Schwend v. Schwend, 1999 MT 194, 295 M 384, 983 P2d 988, 56 St. Rep. 754 (1999).

Gradual Accumulation of Smoke and Soot — "Sudden and Accidental" Construed — Damage Not Covered Under Pollution Exception to All-Risk Homeowner's Policy: During a 4- or 5-week holiday season, the Sokoloskis burned scented candles in their home, which caused a discharge of smoke and soot, damaging their home and belongings. Their insurer denied coverage under a pollution exclusion because smoke and soot were defined as pollutants in the policy. The District Court held that coverage was barred under the exclusion and that the damages were not sudden and accidental. The Supreme Court affirmed on both issues. The very use of the words "sudden" and "accidental" reveals a clear intent to state two separate requirements, so that "sudden" means more than "unexpected". "Sudden", even if it includes the concept of unexpectedness, also encompasses a temporal element because unexpectedness is already expressed by the word "accidental". Having determined that the damage was not sudden, the Supreme Court did not address the additional requirement of being accidental. Under the clear language of the policy definitions and exclusion clause, coverage was properly barred and summary judgment proper. Sokoloski v. Am. W. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 93, 294 M 210, 980 P2d 1043, 56 St. Rep. 392 (1999), citing N. Ins. Co. of N.Y. v. Aardvark Assoc., Inc., 942 F2d 189 (3rd Cir. 1991), and followed in Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Ribi Immunochem Research, Inc., 2005 MT 50, 326 M 174, 108 P3d 469 (2005).

Enforceability of Clear and Unambiguous Contract Language: When the language of a contract is clear and unambiguous, the contract does not require application of the rules of construction and it is a court's duty to enforce the contract as made by the parties. Keller v. Dooling, 248 M 535, 813 P2d 437, 48 St. Rep. 554 (1991).

Injury to Tangible Property Required Before Economic Loss Covered — Plagiarism: After arriving at a settlement agreement based on a charge of plagiarism, an insured sought recovery from his insurance company under a business policy that provided that the company would "pay on behalf of the insured all sums which the insured shall become legally obligated to pay as damages because of bodily injury, property damage or personal injury caused by an occurrence to which the insurance applies". When the insurer refused to pay, the District Court properly granted summary judgment to the company because the charges of plagiarism did not allege direct physical injury to tangible property, but alleged only economic loss. The longstanding rule in Montana is that in order for economic losses to be covered by insurance, a direct physical injury to tangible property must occur. Graber v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 244 M 265, 797 P2d 214, 47 St. Rep. 1595 (1990).

Performance Combined With Terms — Valid Contract: An agreement for development of a mineral interest did not include every item that might have been included with respect to operational aspects; however, the parties performed under the agreement for 3 years. The Supreme Court cited Wilkerson v. School District, 216 M 203, 700 P2d 617, 42 St. Rep. 745 (1985), in holding that a contract is not invalid simply because it does not contain all the provisions or conditions the parties might have incorporated into it. Therefore, performance under the agreement, combined with the actual terms provided, demonstrated the existence of a valid contract. Somont Oil Co., Inc. v. Nutter, 228 M 467, 743 P2d 1016, 44 St. Rep. 1685 (1987).

Ambiguity of Contract Clause — Conclusion of Law: Contract ambiguities are questions of fact, and on appeal the Supreme Court would ordinarily limit their review to the "clearly erroneous" standard of review. The initial determination of whether or not an ambiguity exists is one of law. Thus, the determination by the District Court that a default clause is ambiguous is a conclusion of law freely reviewable. When on review the Supreme Court finds that the clause is not ambiguous, the court is free to rely on its own interpretation of the clause. SAS Partnership v. Schafer, 200 M 478, 653 P2d 834, 39 St. Rep. 1883 (1982).

28-3-201. Interpretation giving effect to contract favored.

Case Notes

Partnership Governed by Partnership Agreement — Jurisdiction: The plaintiff appealed the judgment of the District Court that invalidated her efforts to force out her twin brother from the family's limited liability partnership created to steward the family ranch and property in eastern Montana. The brother counterclaimed on the issue of attorney fees, alleging that the District Court did not have authority to grant the award. Noting that under 35-10-106, the partnership agreement controlled the rights and duties of the partners, the Supreme Court reversed in part, concluding that the District Court erred by holding that the brother's interest was not subject to the buy-out provision of the partnership agreement and, therefore, judicial dissolution was not necessary. The Supreme Court held that, under Rule 6, M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), the District Court did not have jurisdiction to award attorney fees because the award was made more than 60 days after the motion for fees was filed. Thus the Supreme Court reversed the District Court's order awarding attorney fees and remanded for further proceedings. The court affirmed the remainder of the District Court's judgment. Ballou v. Walker, 2017 MT 197, 388 Mont. 283, 400 P.3d 234.

Insurance Company Indemnification Agreement Valid — Partial Summary Judgment on Pleadings Proper: The District Court did not err in granting partial summary judgment on the pleadings to a plaintiff insurance company. The District Court properly limited its decision on partial summary judgment to the issue of whether the indemnity agreements allowed the plaintiff to seek indemnity for appropriate expenses while reserving the issue of damages and the amount of damages for the trier of fact. Moreover, the indemnity agreements did not violate 28-2-701 and 28-2-702 because they did not provide the plaintiff with carte blanche indemnification and the defendant insured was not required to indemnify the plaintiff for any illegal actions. Ohio Farmers Ins. Co. v. Jem Contracting, Inc., 2016 MT 343, 386 Mont. 49, 386 P.3d 613.

Contradicting Clauses in Separate Contracts Construed Against Drafter — Employee Waiver — Health Insurance: The plaintiff health insurance company filed a breach of contract action against the defendant, an employer providing health insurance for its employees. The contracts between the parties required the defendant to cover 75% or more of its employees; however, a subsequent contract allowed the defendant's employees to waive coverage. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant, finding that the two provisions in the contracts were ambiguous and the contract should be interpreted against the drafter. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the contracts must be interpreted as part of the same transaction and that giving effect to both contract provisions is not reasonably practical, that the ambiguity is construed against the drafter, that the newer specific contract controlled over the older general contract, and that the waiver provision was meant to modify the minimum employee participation provision. Mont. Health Network, Inc. v. Great Falls Orthopedic Associates, 2015 MT 186, 379 Mont 513, 353 P.3d 483.

Agreement to "Participate in an Alternative Financing Method" — Void for Lack of Certainty: In anticipation of a subdivision development, property owners entered into a waiver whereby they agreed not to challenge the creation of a special improvement district (SID) for the purpose of making road and intersection improvements. The waiver provided that in the event the improvements were not financed through a SID, the property owners would "participate in an alternative financing method" to reimburse the plaintiff for the improvements. After unilaterally improving the road, the plaintiff sought reimbursement from the bank that had acquired the interest in the property governed by the waiver. The bank refused to pay and argued that the contract was void for lack of certainty. The District Court granted the bank's motion to dismiss and the Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing that there was no mutual consent regarding alternative financing of the improvements. Covenant Inv., Inc. v. First Sec. Bank, 2014 MT 14, 373 Mont. 353, 317 P.3d 197.

Covenants Intended to Remain in Effect Until Rejected by Property Owners — Failure of Sufficient Tract Owners to Vote to Amend Covenants: Subdivision property owners entered covenants that would automatically extend for "successive period" of 10 years. The covenants could also be amended by a two-thirds vote of the owners of the original tracts. Some of the owners contended that the covenant extension language was ambiguous because it was not clear if the covenants would be renewed only for a single 10-year period or for successive 10-year periods. The District Court held that the language was not ambiguous, but rather contained a typographical error, and that successive 10-year periods applied. Plaintiffs appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Taken as a whole the covenant language intended that the covenants remain in effect until affirmatively rejected by the property owners. In this case, five of the eight original tract owners voted to amend the covenants, so without the required two-thirds vote, the covenants remained unamended. Brewer v. Hawkinson, 2009 MT 346, 353 M 154, 221 P3d 643 (2009). See also Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006).

Ambiguous Employment Contract — Question of Parties' Intent Properly Submitted to Jury: West's employment contract contained two different provisions regarding how West would be compensated in the event of termination of employment. The District Court construed the ambiguous clauses against the employer who drafted the contract and submitted the issue to the jury. On appeal by the employer, the Supreme Court examined the contract language and affirmed. The employment agreement was ambiguous on the issue of whether West would be paid trailing commissions or bonuses if West were terminated for cause, so the District Court did not err in ordering that the parties' intent on the issue be submitted to the jury. West v. The Club at Spanish Peaks, LLC, 2008 MT 183, 343 M 434, 186 P3d 1228 (2008), following Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Unambiguous Release of Claims Against Attorney for Malpractice — Parties Bound by Terms of Release: Rich was injured in two automobile accidents and retained attorney Ellingson to represent her in claims against her insurer. The first claim was dismissed when Ellingson failed to serve a timely summons on the insurer after filing the claim. Rich sued Ellingson for malpractice and received a settlement of $175,000 from Ellingson's malpractice insurer. As part of the settlement, Rich signed a release providing that Ellingson was released from any future malpractice claims arising from representation of Rich. Rich's second accident claim was subsequently dismissed when the statute of limitations had run, and Rich again sued Ellingson for malpractice. Ellingson contended that the suit was barred by the release. The District Court agreed and dismissed the claim, and Rich appealed. Considering the document as a whole, the Supreme Court held that the release clearly and unambiguously barred future claims arising from Ellingson's representation of Rich in the multiple actions against Rich's insurer. Rich's latent discontent with the release, without more, was an insufficient basis upon which to premise an alteration of the express, unambiguous agreement. The District Court was affirmed. Rich v. Ellingson, 2007 MT 346, 340 M 285, 174 P3d 491 (2007). See also Hanson v. Oljar, 231 M 272, 752 P2d 187 (1988).

Validity of Forum Selection Language in Employment Contract: A clause in an employment contract provided that in case of disputes, venue for enforcement of the contract would be in the state District Courts of Lewis and Clark County, Montana, or in the district of choice set by the independent contractor. A dispute arose, and plaintiff independent contractor sought to enforce the contract in Lewis and Clark County. Defendant moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, and the motion was granted on grounds that the contract's forum clause did not give the court personal jurisdiction over defendant, a resident of Illinois. Plaintiff appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. As held in May v. Figgins, 186 M 383, 607 P2d 1132 (1980), parties to a contract may agree in advance to submit to the jurisdiction of a given court, and as such, forum selection clauses are prima facie valid and should be enforced unless the resisting party shows that the agreement was not deliberately and understandably made and that the contractual language did not clearly, unequivocally, and unambiguously express a waiver of personal jurisdiction. In this case, the parties knowingly consented to personal jurisdiction in Montana and the forum selection clause was clear and unambiguous. The case was remanded for further proceedings in the Montana court. Milanovich v. Schnibben, 2007 MT 128, 337 M 334, 160 P3d 562 (2007).

Contract Interpretation Applicable to Restrictive Covenants — How Ambiguity Resolved — Restrictive Covenants Strictly Construed: General rules of contract interpretation apply to restrictive covenants, and any person having an interest under a restrictive covenant may seek declaratory relief concerning any question of construction arising under the covenant. When a restrictive covenant has been reduced to writing, the intent of the parties is to be ascertained, when possible, from the writing alone, and when the language of a covenant is clear, a court must apply the language as written. Restrictive covenants are strictly construed, and ambiguities in covenants are resolved to allow free use of property. The determination of whether an ambiguity exists in a restrictive covenant is a question of law for a court to decide, but mere disagreement between the parties as to interpretation of a restrictive covenant does not automatically create an ambiguity. Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006). See also Newman v. Wittmer, 277 M 1, 917 P2d 926 (1996), and Toavs v. Sayre, 281 M 243, 934 P2d 165 (1997).

Agreement to Agree to Future Lease Terms Unenforceable: Defendant agreed to lease plaintiff farmland on a cash per acre basis for 5 years with an option to extend the lease on terms to be determined later. Toward the end of the 5-year lease, defendant offered to sell the land to plaintiff, but plaintiff declined, so defendant sold the land to a third party, and plaintiff filed a complaint alleging breach of the lease agreement. Both parties moved for summary judgment, and the District Court concluded that because the lease extension language constituted an agreement to agree and was vague and unenforceable, defendant was entitled to summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the parties failed to include complete and material terms for determining the duration and payments for another lease term in the negotiation clause, the clause was rendered unenforceable, and specific performance was unavailable to enforce an agreement to agree to material terms in the future. Additionally, damages were not clearly ascertainable and calculation of damages was also untenable under the lease extension, so plaintiff could not recover damages. GRB Farm v. Christman Ranch, Inc., 2005 MT 59, 326 M 236, 108 P3d 507 (2005), following Steen v. Rustad, 132 M 96, 313 P2d 1014 (1957), Riis v. Day, 188 M 253, 613 P2d 696, (1980), and Quirin v. Weinberg, 252 M 386, 830 P2d 537 (1992), and followed in Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Ltd. v. W. Star Trucks, Inc., 2007 MT 48, 336 M 145, 153 P3d 627 (2007).

Dispute Over Contract to Deliver Log Home — No Requirement That Seller Provide Name of Third Party Boom Truck Operator — Rescission Proper Remedy for Material Breach of Contract: Anderson agreed to purchase a log home from Eschenbacher. The home was designed to be constructed on Anderson's homesite. Eschenbacher drafted the purchase contract, which provided that Eschenbacher would act only as a manufacturer, not as a building contractor, and also required Anderson to coordinate and ensure availability of a boom truck to assemble the structure at the site. Anderson contacted a third party to supply a boom truck instead of using Eschenbacher's truck. Eschenbacher then refused to deliver the logs unless Anderson supplied the name of the other boom truck operator. Both parties sued for breach of contract. The District Court concluded that Anderson was under no duty to provide Eschenbacher with the name of the boom truck operator, and the Supreme Court agreed. The contract clearly placed the responsibility for acquiring a boom truck with Anderson, but did not require Eschenbacher to use it, because other language required Anderson to pay any expenses incurred by Eschenbacher for waiting once the logs were delivered, if, for instance, the boom truck that Anderson provided was inadequate. Construing the contract most strongly against the drafter, Eschenbacher, the court found that Eschenbacher could easily have inserted provisions in the contract regarding specifications of an adequate boom truck, but he did not. Eschenbacher materially breached the contract by refusing to deliver the logs until the boom truck dispute was settled. The contract did not specify a remedy; thus, the District Court did not err in granting Anderson rescission of the contract. Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Shareholders' Agreement Enforceable Independent of Stock Exchange — Different Intent Contained in Separate Agreements Separately Enforceable: Following his termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay, contending that an earlier merger transaction and the subsequent shareholders' agreement should be read together and citing Rumph v. Dale Edwards, Inc., 183 M 359, 600 P2d 163 (1979), for the proposition that when construing an agreement that is part of a larger transaction, the intention of the parties must be determined by examining the entirety of the larger transaction. However, Rumph was distinguishable here because all the agreements in question occurred at different times and did not reference or depend upon each other. Each agreement was clear and unambiguous. Under Gerdes v. Omaha Home for Boys, 89 NW 2d 849 (Nebr. 1958), a court may not avoid the language of a complete, unambiguous contract by consolidating it with another writing if the effect of doing so would be to avoid an essential part of the contract. The District Court properly concluded that the shareholders' agreement was enforceable independent of the stock exchange between the parties. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Contract Providing for Both Termination and Renegotiation — Plain Language to Determine Parties' Standing: Paragraph 7 of a contract provided that the contract terminated on June 30, 1996. Paragraph 10 provided for renegotiation of the contract upon 30 days' written notice from either party. The District Court found the provisions to be at odds with each other. The law favors giving effect to each provision of a contract, and courts must interpret contractual provisions so as to allow each provision to be effective. Courts are without authority to insert components in or erase components from unambiguous contract provisions. Upon review, the Supreme Court looked to the plain language in the contract and found that paragraph 10 did not render the contract vague or indefinite; rather, it provided for a continuing contractual relationship if, after notice, a successful renegotiation was accomplished. The District Court erred, and the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Hennen v. Omega Enterprises, Inc., 264 M 505, 872 P2d 797, 51 St. Rep. 369 (1994), followed in Corwin v. Bd. of Pub. Educ., 272 M 14, 898 P2d 1227, 52 St. Rep. 589 (1995).

Interpretation of Repugnancies in Partnership Dissolution Agreement: Plaintiff claimed that one paragraph of a partnership dissolution agreement conveyed all of the first partner's 50% interest to the second partner, while a later paragraph reconveyed the 50% interest back to the first partner. This interpretation would have rendered both paragraphs meaningless and repugnant. To resolve any repugnancy and give effect to both paragraphs, the District Court properly interpreted the first paragraph as conveying a present interest and the later paragraph as an executory promise to convey a future interest. Bretz v. Ayers, 232 M 132, 756 P2d 1115, 45 St. Rep. 936 (1988).

Amount of Rent — Essential Lease Term Requiring Certainty: Appellants signed a lease with an option to renew the lease. Although the appellants properly gave notice of intent to exercise the option, the renewal provision failed for lack of certainty regarding the amount of the rent because a determination of the amount of the rent upon renewal was based on bids from third parties. In this case, there was no such bid and therefore no means of determining the amount of the rent. The renewal provision of the lease was void for lack of certainty regarding the essential term of rent. Riis v. Day, 188 M 253, 613 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 1093 (1980), followed in Nentwig v. United Indus., Inc., 256 M 134, 845 P2d 99, 49 St. Rep. 1172 (1992), and GRB Farm v. Christman Ranch, Inc., 2005 MT 59, 326 M 236, 108 P3d 507 (2005).

Right of First Refusal in Lease: Contract was interpreted as sustaining lessees' right of first refusal of purchase. Tribble v. Reely, 171 M 201, 557 P2d 813 (1976), distinguished in Wymo Land Co. v. Luggie, 1998 MT 50, 288 M 21, 955 P2d 171, 55 St. Rep. 208 (1998).

Reasonable Interpretation: Where the language of the contract is contradictory or ambiguous so that it is susceptible of two constructions, one of which is fair, customary, and such as prudent men would naturally execute, and the other makes the contract inequitable, unusual, or such as reasonable men would not be likely to enter into, the interpretation which makes a rational and probable agreement must be preferred. Davis v. Park Sec. Corp., 117 M 393, 159 P2d 323 (1945).

Operation and Effect:

A contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect; it may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made and the matter to which it relates, and however broad may be its terms, it extends only to those things concerning which it appears that the parties intended to contract, particular clauses being subordinate to its general intent. Custer v. Missoula Pub. Serv. Co., 91 M 136, 6 P2d 131 (1931).

Of two constructions of a contract one of which will render it valid and the other void, the former will be adopted if it can be done without violence to the ascertained intention of the parties. Linse v. Zastrow, 63 M 241, 207 P 119 (1922).

If of two constructions one will render the contract in question valid and the other void, the former should be adopted if it can be done without doing violence to the ascertained intention of the parties. Finley v. School District, 51 M 411, 153 P 1010 (1915).

Guaranty: To construe the guaranty as running to the bank only when in fact the bank did not have any interest in the note or account at the time the guaranty was executed would render the guaranty meaningless and such a construction will not be adopted unless it is compelled by its very terms themselves. Schauer v. Morgan, 67 M 455, 216 P 347 (1923).

Offer and Acceptance: A telegram, "Wire lowest price you will sell the 7,000 S. & W. yearling ewes", and an answering telegram, "Lowest price on S. & W. yearling ewes eleven fifty this subject to immediate acceptance", together with custom and usage and this section, 28-3-102, and 28-3-402, evidenced a complete contract for the sale of the sheep, where defendant's offer was accepted within 24 hours, as against an objection that there was no meeting of the minds of the parties upon the price to be paid for the sheep, in that price could only be determined upon delivery and that the offer was not accepted immediately. Story v. Stanfield, 275 F 401 (9th Cir. 1921).

When Courts Cannot Compel Performance: Where a contract leaves the matter of rates or prices uncertain it cannot be specifically enforced unless they can be made certain by means provided in the contract itself. Thus a contract between a city and a water company under the terms of which the city bound itself to either purchase the company's plant at the end of 20 years or renew the contract for 20 years longer, "upon such terms as are mutually agreed upon at that time" was not specifically enforceable, inasmuch as the courts cannot compel parties to agree or make an agreement for them. Livingston Waterworks v. Livingston, 53 M 1, 162 P 381 (1916).

Role of Court: The contract in question was susceptible to two interpretations, one which would render the contract valid and the other which would render it void. The interpretation upholding the validity of the contract would be adopted if it could be done without doing violence to the ascertained intention of the parties. Finley v. School District, 51 M 411, 153 P 1010 (1915).

28-3-202. Effect to be given to every part of contract.

Case Notes

Breach of Contract Claim — Contract Clear and Unambiguous — Judgment on Pleadings Proper: The parties entered into a contract for the defendants to purchase an airplane from the plaintiff. The contract provided that the defendants would conduct an inspection of the plane; however, they withdrew their offer without inspecting the plane. The plaintiff filed suit alleging breach of contract, and the District Court granted the plaintiff judgment on the pleadings. The defendants appealed, arguing that the language in the contract was ambiguous and that extrinsic evidence should be allowed. The Supreme Court affirmed the judgment on the pleadings, holding that the language in the contract was clear and unambiguous and that the District Court had been correct to exclude extrinsic evidence. Kalispell Aircraft Co., LLC v. Patterson, 2019 MT 142, 396 Mont. 182, 443 P.3d 1100.

Misrepresentation Based on Mistake — Coverage Not Excluded Under Policy: The plaintiff sued the defendant, the insurer of the homeowner from whom she purchased a home. After closing on the home, the plaintiff had found the basement of the home flooded and later learned the homeowner had not disclosed that the basement had previously flooded. The defendant denied coverage to the previous homeowner, claiming that the homeowner had intentionally misled the plaintiff and that intentional misrepresentations were not covered by either the homeowner's home policy or rental policy. The District Court agreed and granted the defendant summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the home policy expressly excluded coverage; however, it reversed and remanded the case to the District Court based on its conclusion that the renter's policy did provide coverage because the homeowner had stated that his misrepresentation to the plaintiff was based on mistake. Huckins v. United Serv. Auto Ass'n, 2017 MT 143, 387 Mont. 514, 396 P.3d 121.

Contradicting Clauses in Separate Contracts Construed Against Drafter — Employee Waiver — Health Insurance: The plaintiff health insurance company filed a breach of contract action against the defendant, an employer providing health insurance for its employees. The contracts between the parties required the defendant to cover 75% or more of its employees; however, a subsequent contract allowed the defendant's employees to waive coverage. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant, finding that the two provisions in the contracts were ambiguous and the contract should be interpreted against the drafter. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the contracts must be interpreted as part of the same transaction and that giving effect to both contract provisions is not reasonably practical, that the ambiguity is construed against the drafter, that the newer specific contract controlled over the older general contract, and that the waiver provision was meant to modify the minimum employee participation provision. Mont. Health Network, Inc. v. Great Falls Orthopedic Associates, 2015 MT 186, 379 Mont 513, 353 P.3d 483.

Genuine Issue of Material Fact Concerning Termination of Written Easement: A written instrument creating an easement provided that if the grantee ceased to use a road or "any segment thereof" for 5 years or longer, the easement would terminate. The successor in interest to the grantee used the easement several times over the years, but the successor in interest to the grantor locked a gate for approximately 10 years and blocked off 40 feet of the easement. The District Court granted summary judgment to the successor in interest to the grantee, but the Supreme Court found that the District Court erred by failing to give meaning to the phrase "any segment thereof" within the written instrument creating the easement, creating an issue of material fact as to whether the easement had terminated. Whary v. Plum Creek Timberlands, L.P., 2014 MT 71, 374 Mont. 266, 320 P.3d 973.

No Breach of Duty to Defend When Insured Fully Defended — Duplicative Counsel by Coinsurer Unnecessary: The parents of a woman who died in a car accident sought compensation from two different insurers of the driver's parents and his estate. The two insurers worked together to ensure that their insureds were defended, although only one of the insurers paid the costs of counsel. As a part of a consent judgment, the rights of the insureds were assigned to the decedent woman's parents. The parents then argued that the insurer who did not pay the costs of defending had breached its duty to defend and was estopped from denying coverage. The District Court agreed and granted the parents summary judgment. The District Court also ordered the insurer to pay the full amount of the consent judgment as well as attorney fees and costs. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, ruling that as long as the insureds were fully defended, the duty to defend did not require both insurers to provide separate counsel when their combined efforts would be duplicative. St. Farm Fire and Cas. Co. v. Schwan, 2013 MT 216, 371 Mont. 192, 308 P.3d 48.

Partnership Agreement — Definition of "Practice of Medicine" — Application to Psychologists: Former partners of a medical clinic sued the clinic, claiming they were entitled to full partnership interest payments under a partnership agreement. The agreement provided for a reduction of partnership interest payments if a former partner continued to engage in the "practice of medicine" within 3 years of disassociation. The plaintiffs, who were psychologists still working in the community, claimed the phrase "practice of medicine" was a technical term that did not include psychologists. The District Court disagreed and concluded that under contract law, the ordinary and plain meaning of the phrase should be followed and that the ordinary meaning of the phrase included the practice of psychology. The plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the clinic. Krajacich v. Great Falls Clinic, LLP, 2012 MT 82, 364 Mont. 455, 276 P.3d 922.

Covenants Intended to Remain in Effect Until Rejected by Property Owners — Failure of Sufficient Tract Owners to Vote to Amend Covenants: Subdivision property owners entered covenants that would automatically extend for "successive period" of 10 years. The covenants could also be amended by a two-thirds vote of the owners of the original tracts. Some of the owners contended that the covenant extension language was ambiguous because it was not clear if the covenants would be renewed only for a single 10-year period or for successive 10-year periods. The District Court held that the language was not ambiguous, but rather contained a typographical error, and that successive 10-year periods applied. Plaintiffs appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Taken as a whole the covenant language intended that the covenants remain in effect until affirmatively rejected by the property owners. In this case, five of the eight original tract owners voted to amend the covenants, so without the required two-thirds vote, the covenants remained unamended. Brewer v. Hawkinson, 2009 MT 346, 353 M 154, 221 P3d 643 (2009). See also Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006).

Genuine Issue of Material Fact Whether Dam Operation Damaged Lakeshore Properties — Summary Judgment Improper — Class Action Vacated: Flathead Lake landowners brought a class action suit against defendant operators of Kerr Dam for operating outside the scope of their easements in a manner that continuously eroded and damaged plaintiffs' lakeshore properties. The District Court rejected plaintiffs' argument that the dam operator was not allowed to affect plaintiffs' properties above an elevation of 2,893 feet, concluding instead that defendants' easements covered entire parcels. The court concluded that erosion, including wave action erosion, was within the scope of the easements and held that any duty defendants had to not cause unreasonable damage to plaintiffs' properties applied only to damage unrelated to use of the easement. Therefore, summary judgment was granted to defendants, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court first agreed that the District Court's contour line theory was correct. The "2,893 feet" clause did not establish the vertical limit argued by plaintiffs because although the dam operators' right to flood, subirrigate, drain, or otherwise affect the shoreline was not unlimited, it was not restricted to a maximum elevation of 2,893 feet at each parcel, but rather extended to whatever part of each parcel was affected when the lake was held at 2,893 feet above mean sea level as measured at the dam. The court also agreed that the right to cause some erosion was necessary to the enjoyment of the right to perpetually flood, subirrigate, and drain and was thus included by implication in the easements. However, further factual development and trial were necessary to address the question of whether the erosion was reasonable, necessary, and within the scope of the easements, which could not be resolved by summary judgment. Additionally, the question of whether defendants breached their obligation to not cause unreasonable damage to the shoreline properties and to not unreasonably interfere with plaintiffs' enjoyment also required further factual development and possibly trial. Therefore, the order certifying the case as a class action was vacated and the case was remanded for further consideration. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2009 MT 286, 352 M 212, 215 P3d 675 (2009).

On remand, the District Court decertified the class as to one defendant and denied the plaintiffs' motion for certification as to another defendant on the basis that the question of whether the erosion caused unreasonable damage to or unreasonably interfered with the plaintiffs' properties required an individual, property-by-property analysis that was improper for class certification. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that class certification to both defendants was proper because the reasonableness of the erosion presents a common question that is incapable of being resolved on a property-by-property basis since an aggregate of the benefits and burdens imposed on all of the shoreline properties must be considered together to determine reasonableness. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2012 MT 318, 368 Mont. 1, 291 P.3d 1209.

Express Lease Provision Required for Survival of Overriding Royalty: An overriding royalty applies only to the lease out of which it was created. In the case of an oil or gas lease or sublease, if a party wishes an overriding royalty to survive the expiration of the lease or sublease, an express provision must be included in the lease or sublease to accomplish survival of the overriding royalty. Ritter v. Bill Barrett Corp., 2009 MT 210, 351 M 278, 210 P3d 688 (2009), following Edward v. Prince, 221 M 272, 719 P2d 422 (1986).

Lack of Express Utility Easements Not Condition Adversely Affecting Title: The buyer of condominium units refused to close on the sale because the sale agreement did not expressly state the existence of utility easements for each parcel. The District Court determined that the lack of express utility easements was not a condition that adversely affected title and held that the buyer breached the contract by refusing to close the sale. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The entire property was part of the sale, including all units and appurtenances. If the buyer wanted each unit to have a stated right to access the utility areas, the buyer could affirmatively grant that right to each unit after acquiring the property. Also, the buyer could have required the express establishment of the easements in a written addendum to the contract to be a condition precedent to closing, but the buyer did not do so. The buyer failed to establish that the absence of individual unit easements was an adverse condition of title that allowed the buyer to refuse to close the sale. Apple Park, L.L.C. v. Apple Park Condominiums, L.L.C., 2008 MT 284, 345 M 359, 192 P3d 232 (2008).

Ambiguity of Contract Raising Genuine Issues of Fact — Summary Judgment Improper: In a dispute over the sale of aircraft, the District Court considered summary judgment motions from both parties, granted summary judgment for plaintiff on claims of breach of contract and express warranty, and denied defendant's summary judgment counterclaim of breach of contract and express warranty. The Supreme Court examined the contract and found ambiguities regarding whether defendant accepted the aircraft "as is" at signing or maintained the right to inspect and reject the aircraft prior to closing, as well as the parties' extension of the closing date. The ambiguities raised genuine issues of material fact regarding breach of contract and express warranty that were not appropriate for summary judgment, and the Supreme Court reversed for trial on the issues. Corporate Air v. Edwards Jet Center, Mont., Inc., 2008 MT 283, 345 M 336, 190 P3d 1111 (2008).

Tort Claims Not Precluded by Contract Claims Arising From Same Event: In a dispute over the sale of aircraft, the District Court considered summary judgment motions from both parties and granted defendant summary judgment on plaintiff's tort claims on grounds that plaintiff had relied on a contract theory of relief and thus elected to be made whole under the contract. Plaintiff appealed on grounds that tort liability can exist with contract liability and that recovery on a contract theory does not necessarily preclude recovery on tort theories such as fraud. Defendant responded that summary dismissal of the tort claims was proper because plaintiff should not be allowed to make a double recovery and that because plaintiff's claims were commercial, tort damages are not available except in rare cases when a separate tort claim arises from the contractual relationship. Without ruling on the validity of the tort claims, the Supreme Court held that consideration of plaintiff's fraud-based claims was not precluded by the fact that plaintiff also made separate contract claims arising out of the same event. The tort claims were required to be considered individually and could not be dismissed under a blanket rationale that the tort claims and contract claims were mutually exclusive. The District Court's summary judgment was reversed, and the issue was remanded for further consideration. Corporate Air v. Edwards Jet Center, Mont., Inc., 2008 MT 283, 345 M 336, 190 P3d 1111 (2008).

Total Compensation in Condemnation to Include Value of Condemned Property and Severance Damages: The city of Whitefish condemned 7,234 square feet of plaintiff's property, but conveyed to plaintiff 10,175 square feet of city property contiguous to plaintiff's lot. The conveyance was intended as severance damages to offset the harm of condemnation. The parties entered an agreement that plaintiff would grant possession of the condemned property to the city and that the city would pay plaintiff $130,000 to convey the 10,175 square foot adjacent lot. The agreement also stated that the parties were unable to agree on the value of the condemned property, the severance damages to plaintiff's remaining property, and the value of the conveyed property. Eventually plaintiff filed a complaint for inverse condemnation and breach of the agreement when the parties were unable to agree on the property values and severance damages. The District Court held that the only issue for the jury was to determine the amount that plaintiff was entitled to for compensation, and the jury was not asked to determine any severance damages owing to plaintiff. The court also disallowed any evidence of the $130,000 payment because that money was considered for severance damages only and could not be considered by the jury in determining plaintiff's compensation for the condemned property. The court further disallowed the city from presenting any evidence regarding the conveyed property because it had not yet been deeded to plaintiff, and absent unity of ownership, the conveyed property could not be considered when determining the fair market value of plaintiff's remaining property after the condemnation. Last, the court determined that plaintiff's "cost-to-cure" damages were noncompensable because plaintiff's access remained the same after condemnation. During trial, various experts presented differing values for the condemned property. The jury ultimately found for plaintiff and held that the city owed $161,000 for the condemned property. The District Court also awarded plaintiff $94,788.23 as litigation expenses. The city appealed, and plaintiff cross-appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court misinterpreted the agreement and improperly limited the issues presented to the jury. The court noted that total compensation in an eminent domain case involves both the value of the condemned property and severance damages, including depreciation suffered as a result of condemnation. In order for the jury to consider all circumstances surrounding the condemnation, a new trial was required, so the case was reversed and remanded. K&R Partnership v. Whitefish, 2008 MT 228, 344 M 336, 189 P3d 593 (2008).

Question Whether Condition Precedent Satisfied and Contract Formed — Remand: The parties negotiated for the purchase of a new vehicle, and the terms of the contract documents set the interest rate at 3.9%. The plain language of the contract was clear that there was no binding contract until the contract terms were accepted by a bank or finance company. A week after negotiations when the bank would not accept the 3.9% rate, the car dealer notified the buyers that they would have to sign new finance papers with a higher annual percentage rate of 4.9%, but the buyers refused. The buyers then sued the dealer, but the District Court compelled arbitration and stayed the proceedings. On appeal, the car dealer asserted that the contract language was not binding to the dealer unless financing was obtained and that the condition precedent applied only to the dealer and not the buyers. The Supreme Court disagreed. The totality of the contract language demonstrated that the condition precedent also applied to the buyers, even though that was not expressly stated. The total sales price and the corresponding finance charge agreed to by the buyers were based on financing at 3.9%, and a change in rate required renegotiation by both parties, so the condition precedent applied to both parties. Because there were questions of disputed fact whether the condition precedent was satisfied and a contract formed, the case was remanded to District Court for further factfinding and discovery. Thompson v. Lithia Chrysler Jeep Dodge of Great Falls, 2008 MT 175, 343 M 392, 185 P3d 332 (2008).

Ambiguity in Collective Bargaining Agreement — Duty to Bargain in Good Faith: The Bonner school district involuntarily transferred and reassigned several teachers, which affected the subjects taught and the teachers' areas of expertise. The Bonner Education Association responded by filing an unfair labor practices claim, alleging that the school district had violated 39-31-305 and 39-31-401 by refusing to bargain for the transfers and reassignments. The school district contended that a management rights provision in the collective bargaining agreement allowed the district to unilaterally transfer and reassign teachers because that right was not limited by explicit provisions elsewhere in the agreement. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the agreement contained two other clauses that provided conflicting provisions. An integration clause, or zipper clause, seemingly waived the Association's statutory right to bargain for teacher transfers and reassignments as terms and conditions of employment, while a professional advantages clause could be interpreted to protect teachers from involuntary transfers and reassignments. These conflicting clauses made the agreement ambiguous as a matter of law. However, 39-31-305 provides a statutory duty to bargain regarding any question arising under a collective bargaining agreement, and 39-31-401 provides that it is an unfair labor practice to refuse to bargain in good faith. Regarding the school district's argument concerning management rights, the court held that requiring collective bargaining has no effect on an employer's fundamental right to manage and operate and does not impose on management the duty to concede to union demands, but only obligates the employer to bargain in good faith, in conformity with the purpose of state employment law. In light of the ambiguity in the collective bargaining agreement in this case, the school district committed an unfair labor practice by refusing to bargain for teacher transfers and reassignments. Bonner School District No. 14 v. Bonner Educ. Ass'n, 2008 MT 9, 341 M 97, 176 P3d 262 (2008).

Unambiguous Release of Claims Against Attorney for Malpractice — Parties Bound by Terms of Release: Rich was injured in two automobile accidents and retained attorney Ellingson to represent her in claims against her insurer. The first claim was dismissed when Ellingson failed to serve a timely summons on the insurer after filing the claim. Rich sued Ellingson for malpractice and received a settlement of $175,000 from Ellingson's malpractice insurer. As part of the settlement, Rich signed a release providing that Ellingson was released from any future malpractice claims arising from representation of Rich. Rich's second accident claim was subsequently dismissed when the statute of limitations had run, and Rich again sued Ellingson for malpractice. Ellingson contended that the suit was barred by the release. The District Court agreed and dismissed the claim, and Rich appealed. Considering the document as a whole, the Supreme Court held that the release clearly and unambiguously barred future claims arising from Ellingson's representation of Rich in the multiple actions against Rich's insurer. Rich's latent discontent with the release, without more, was an insufficient basis upon which to premise an alteration of the express, unambiguous agreement. The District Court was affirmed. Rich v. Ellingson, 2007 MT 346, 340 M 285, 174 P3d 491 (2007). See also Hanson v. Oljar, 231 M 272, 752 P2d 187 (1988).

No Wrongful Discharge Claim When Employment for Specific Term: Plaintiff physician signed a 1-year employment contract with defendant medical center that provided that the employment terms could be extended or renewed by mutual agreement in writing. Although the initial contract expired, plaintiff continued to work by oral agreement for 2 more years. The parties then signed an addendum to the initial contract that set an employment expiration date 6 months later. Plaintiff received a letter 5 days before the expiration date, terminating the employment on the expiration date. Plaintiff filed a wrongful discharge suit, alleging that the termination was unlawful. Defendant moved for summary judgment on grounds that because the addendum provided a specific term of employment, plaintiff had no wrongful discharge claim. The District Court granted summary judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A claim for relief that is predicated on discharge from employment is barred if the employment is for a specific term under a written contract and that term has expired. In this case, the addendum constituted a ratification of the original agreement that constituted a contract for a specific term of employment, and by executing the addendum, the parties ratified the original agreement calling for employment for a specific term. The fact that the termination date was stated in the contract recitals did not void the date, because the recitals were consideration for the agreement and the parties intended that the recitals be part of the agreement. Plaintiff's argument that because he did not read the addendum he should not be held to its terms was also without merit because one who executes a contract is presumed to know its contents. Stowers v. Community Medical Center, Inc., 2007 MT 309, 340 M 116, 172 P3d 1252 (2007).

Lessor Fully Compensated for Loss of Truck Under Rental Agreement — Agreed Value of Truck Inapplicable to Damage Claim: Plaintiff leased a truck to defendant for construction work. The truck had an agreed value of $250,000 and a rental rate of $12,000 a month. While in defendant's possession, the truck was heavily damaged. Plaintiff initially sought to repair the truck, but eventually it was stripped of usable parts, and the remaining shell was sold for $15,000. Plaintiff received $114,500 from its insurer, based on the insurer's calculation that the truck had a $126,000 cash replacement value minus the $2,500 policy deductible owed to plaintiff by defendant and minus a $9,000 salvage value. Plaintiff then sued defendant for the unpaid balance of the agreed value, including the monthly payments because the agreed value had not been paid. The District Court noted that even though the parties did not have a signed, enforceable, written contract, defendant had properly insured the truck pursuant to a reasonable lease term, identifying plaintiff as beneficiary, and held that defendant had no independent obligation to pay damages beyond the deductible. Because plaintiff had recovered all damages to which it was entitled, judgment was entered for defendant, and plaintiff appealed. The Supreme Court found that the language of the rental agreement did not require the lessee to pay the agreed value if the truck was damaged or destroyed, so defendant was not liable for the agreed value. Plaintiff failed to show the actual replacement cost of the truck and failed to establish that the District Court's finding was clearly erroneous, so the court did not err in holding that plaintiff was not entitled to additional compensation for replacing the truck. Additionally, plaintiff did not demonstrate what additional rental payments were owed, so defendant had no further obligation to pay damages for loss of use. The District Court did not err in holding that plaintiff was fully compensated under the rental agreement, and judgment was affirmed. Performance Mach. Co., Inc. v. Yellowstone Mtn. Club, LLC, 2007 MT 250, 339 M 259, 169 P3d 394 (2007).

Easement Limited to Historical Size and Location of Grant: In 1949, plaintiffs' predecessor in interest granted an easement to defendant's predecessor in interest to allow the construction of radio towers on a portion of a 160-acre parcel, conditioned on location and maintenance of the property. Defendant subsequently notified plaintiffs that he intended to expand the radio facilities beyond the original construction site. Plaintiffs sued, asserting that the expansion would encompass property not included in the original grant, while defendant contended that the easement encompassed the entire 160 acres described in the grant, so the facilities could be expanded onto other portions of the parcel or relocated elsewhere within the parcel. The District Court found for plaintiffs, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the rules of contract construction, the grant language clearly limited placement of the radio facilities on a portion of the 160-acre parcel to be chosen by defendant's predecessor in interest. Thus, the easement did not encumber the full 160-acre parcel, but rather was limited in size and location to the historical location of the radio facilities. The original grant also required that wires, ground radial antennas, conduits, and transmission lines be buried to a minimum depth of 12 inches, and the District Court did not err in ordering defendant to bury the equipment pursuant to the maintenance portion of the grant. Anderson v. Stokes, 2007 MT 166, 338 M 118, 163 P3d 1273 (2007).

Y2K Computer Problems Considered Faulty Design and Inherent Vice — Insurance Coverage Precluded by Policy Exclusions: The state filed insurance claims related to remediation of problems associated with the Y2K transition. The claims were denied, and the state sued. The District Court held that the claims were precluded from coverage by policy language that excluded coverage for damage caused by faulty design and inherent vice. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. An inherent vice is an existing defect, disease, or decay or the inherent nature of a commodity that will cause it to deteriorate over time and also means a loss not covered by a policy that is not related to an extraneous cause but to a loss entirely from internal decomposition or some quality that brings about its own injury or destruction and that must be inherent in the property for which recovery is sought. The state's Y2K problem was an excluded inherent vice because the date field was an inherent problem that brought about its own problem. The faulty design and inherent vice policy exclusions were not ambiguous and clearly excluded the claimed losses. Even though the state did not receive copies of the policies, the policies were renewals of existing policies that contained identical coverage provisions and exclusions, so the state could not reasonably claim that it was unaware of the relevant policy terms and exclusions, and the insurer could rely on valid exclusions in the policy when the state had notice of the exclusions. St. v. Allendale Mut. Ins. Co., 2007 MT 83, 337 M 49, 154 P3d 1233 (2007), following Port of Seattle v. Lexington Ins. Co., 48 P3d 334 (Wash. App. 2002), and GTE Corp. v. Allendale Mut. Ins. Co., 372 F3d 598 (3rd Cir. 2004).

Insurance Coverage for Intentional Dumping of Hazardous Waste Denied Under Policy Exclusion: For more than 3 years, defendant disposed of hazardous waste solvents into a sanitary landfill. The solvents migrated into the ground water, and neighbors sued defendant for personal injury and property damages. Defendant sought coverage from plaintiff insurer to remediate the damages and costs for the third-party suits, and the insurer eventually sought a declaration that it owed no duty to provide insurance coverage and defense costs for the environmental claims. Defendant's insurance policy contained a pollution exclusion that barred coverage for environmental damage unless the pollution was sudden or accidental. The District Court granted plaintiff summary judgment, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court applied general rules of contract law, strictly construing the policy provisions in favor of defendant, but affirmed summary judgment absent ambiguity in the policy language. Under the policy, the initial disposal, rather than the migration and any resulting damages, had to be sudden and accidental in order to fall within the pollution exclusion clause. Defendant's routine intentional disposal of waste over a period of years could not be considered sudden or accidental, so defendant was unable to establish that the claims fell within the basic scope of coverage. Thus, plaintiff had no duty to defend defendant, and summary judgment for plaintiff was proper. Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Ribi Immunochem Research, Inc., 2005 MT 50, 326 M 174, 108 P3d 469 (2005). See also Bozeman v. AIU Ins. Co., 272 M 349, 900 P2d 929 (1995), and Makarka v. Great Am. Ins. Co, 14 P3d 964 (Alaska 2000).

No Duty to Defend Property Damage or Fraud Claim When No Property Damage or Fraud Asserted: Defendant contended that plaintiff insurer had a duty to defend and provide coverage under defendant's commercial general liability policy, which provided coverage for property damages. However, the claim did not seek compensation for property damages for physical injury to tangible property, but rather for sums fraudulently paid to defendant based on a breach of contract. Because allegations in the complaint did not set forth facts that brought the event within the policy provisions and specifically excluded coverage for a fraud claim, the insurer had no duty to defend the claim. Generali-U.S. Branch v. Alexander, 2004 MT 81, 320 M 450, 87 P3d 1000 (2004), following Graber v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 244 M 265, 797 P2d 214 (1990).

Coordination of Habendum and Pugh Clauses in Oil and Gas Lease — Shut-In Gas Well Considered Producing Well for Lease Purposes — Lease Extended on Section With Producing Well, Terminated on Undeveloped Sections for Lack of Timely Rental Payments: Plaintiff's oil and gas leases had habendum clauses, which provided that the primary leases would be extended as long as oil or gas was produced or drilling operations continued on any of the leased property, and Pugh clauses, which provided that production would not serve to extend the primary term of a lease unless the lessee paid an annual per-acre rental fee prior to the end of the primary term. By the end of the primary term, plaintiff had only one shut-in well developed on the leasehold. Depending on the habendum clauses, plaintiff concluded that there was not a producing well on the leasehold, so the Pugh clauses did not take effect and rental payments were not required. Depending on the Pugh clauses, defendants concluded that because there were no producing wells on the leasehold and because the rental fee on the shut-in well was 2 days late, all of plaintiff's leases were canceled. In reconciling the clauses, the District Court correctly found that: (1) the Pugh clauses required that rental payments be paid on or before the expiration of the primary term in order to extend leases on undeveloped sections; and (2) because time is of the essence in oil and gas leases and plaintiff did not pay timely rental, the leases expired by their own terms on all sections except the section containing the shut-in well, which was considered a producing well, and that lease would continue under the habendum clause as long as plaintiff used reasonable diligence in marketing the gas. Sandtana, Inc. v. Wallin Ranch Co., 2003 MT 329, 318 M 369, 80 P3d 1224 (2003).

Attempted Sale of Parcel in Violation of Contract — Plantiff Allowed to Block Sale: Defendants contracted to purchase several parcels of property from plaintiff. When defendants ended up in default, defendants decided to sell one of the parcels to pay off part of the contract balance. Plaintiff attempted to block the sale, and the District Court confirmed plaintiff's ability to do so under the terms of the contract. Defendants appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. A provision of the contract allowed the subsequent sale of the parcels by defendants, but only after the principal balance was paid. Because defendants were in default when the attempted sale was made, sale of the tract was not permitted by the terms of the contract. The District Court did not err in holding that plaintiff had a contractual right to block the sale. Weter v. Archambault, 2002 MT 336, 313 M 284, 61 P3d 771 (2002).

Declaration Divided Into Two Parts — Restrictive Covenants Not Enforceable on Property Not Subject to Declaration — Attorney Fee Provisions of One Part Not Enforceable in Other Part: The Milltown Water User's Association's Declaration of Covenants, Conditions, and Restrictions is divided into two parts. Part I provides for the operation and maintenance of the Milltown water system and allows for the award of attorney fees and costs. Part II establishes the Milltown Addition Homeowners' Association (MAHA) and places various restrictive covenants on the use and development of affected properties. MAHA sued to enforce the restrictive covenants in Part II and for monetary damages pursuant to Part II's enforcement provisions. In addition, MAHA sought and was awarded attorney fees and costs under Part I. The appellants appealed the part of the District Court's injunction that enjoined the appellants from keeping junk vehicles on any property that they might own and the award of attorney fees and costs under the declaration. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the District Court order was overly broad and must be narrowed to apply only to property owned by the appellants and subject to the declaration and that MAHA was not entitled to attorney fees and costs under Part I. Milltown Addition Homeowners' Ass'n v. Geery, 2000 MT 341, 303 M 195, 15 P3d 458, 57 St. Rep. 1460 (2000).

Gradual Accumulation of Smoke and Soot — "Sudden and Accidental" Construed — Damage Not Covered Under Pollution Exception to All-Risk Homeowner's Policy: During a 4- or 5-week holiday season, the Sokoloskis burned scented candles in their home, which caused a discharge of smoke and soot, damaging their home and belongings. Their insurer denied coverage under a pollution exclusion because smoke and soot were defined as pollutants in the policy. The District Court held that coverage was barred under the exclusion and that the damages were not sudden and accidental. The Supreme Court affirmed on both issues. The very use of the words "sudden" and "accidental" reveals a clear intent to state two separate requirements, so that "sudden" means more than "unexpected". "Sudden", even if it includes the concept of unexpectedness, also encompasses a temporal element because unexpectedness is already expressed by the word "accidental". Having determined that the damage was not sudden, the Supreme Court did not address the additional requirement of being accidental. Under the clear language of the policy definitions and exclusion clause, coverage was properly barred and summary judgment proper. Sokoloski v. Am. W. Ins. Co., 1999 MT 93, 294 M 210, 980 P2d 1043, 56 St. Rep. 392 (1999), citing N. Ins. Co. of N.Y. v. Aardvark Assoc., Inc., 942 F2d 189 (3rd Cir. 1991), and followed in Travelers Cas. & Sur. Co. v. Ribi Immunochem Research, Inc., 2005 MT 50, 326 M 174, 108 P3d 469 (2005).

Contract Providing for Both Termination and Renegotiation — Plain Language to Determine Parties' Standing: Paragraph 7 of a contract provided that the contract terminated on June 30, 1996. Paragraph 10 provided for renegotiation of the contract upon 30 days' written notice from either party. The District Court found the provisions to be at odds with each other. The law favors giving effect to each provision of a contract, and courts must interpret contractual provisions so as to allow each provision to be effective. Courts are without authority to insert components in or erase components from unambiguous contract provisions. Upon review, the Supreme Court looked to the plain language in the contract and found that paragraph 10 did not render the contract vague or indefinite; rather, it provided for a continuing contractual relationship if, after notice, a successful renegotiation was accomplished. The District Court erred, and the case was reversed and remanded for further proceedings. Hennen v. Omega Enterprises, Inc., 264 M 505, 872 P2d 797, 51 St. Rep. 369 (1994), followed in Corwin v. Bd. of Pub. Educ., 272 M 14, 898 P2d 1227, 52 St. Rep. 589 (1995).

Oil Lease Construed to Make All Provisions Effective: Texaco argued that the one productive well it had drilled was sufficient to extend the lease on all lands covered by the lease for as long as the well produced. The Supreme Court held that the general duration clause in the lease relied on by Texaco was modified by a subsequent provision that limited the lease extension to the 320-acre spacing unit on which the producing well was located. Fed. Land Bank of Spokane v. Texaco, Inc., 250 M 471, 820 P2d 1269, 48 St. Rep. 998 (1991).

Complaint Alleging Events Not Within Policy Coverage — No Duty to Defend: As set out in Atcheson v. Safeco, 165 M 239, 527 P2d 549 (1974), the general rule is that an insurer has a duty to defend when a complaint filed against its insured sets forth facts that bring an event within the policy provisions. However, when the complaint alleges events not within the coverage of the policy and the insurer would not be obligated to indemnify the insured if the complaining party recovered, then the insurer has no duty to defend. Graber v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 244 M 265, 797 P2d 214, 47 St. Rep. 1595 (1990), followed in Brabeck v. Employers Mut. Cas. Co., 2000 MT 373, 303 M 468, 16 P3d 355, 57 St. Rep. 1596 (2000), and Generali-U.S. Branch v. Alexander, 2004 MT 81, 320 M 450, 87 P3d 1000 (2004).

Termination of Lease and Royalty Interest — No Error in Summary Judgment: The District Court did not err in granting a summary judgment when several contracts relating to the same matter and made as substantially one transaction clearly showed that a lease assignment incorporating by reference the exhibit which created an overriding royalty interest in defendant included language that the assignors were owners of the overriding royalty interest of which the defendant received a one-fourth interest and which terminated with the lease. Edward v. Prince, 221 M 272, 719 P2d 422, 43 St. Rep. 805 (1986).

Responsibility for Water and Sewer Hookup Determined by Complete Reading of Contract: The Supreme Court reversed a District Court decision that a subcontractor was obligated to connect water and sewer lines to houses in a project. A complete reading of the contract showed that the subcontractor only had to cap the lines at terminal points. The whole of a contract is to be taken together to give effect to every part if reasonably practicable, each clause helping to interpret the other. Bender v. Rookhuizen, 211 M 366, 685 P2d 343, 41 St. Rep. 1418 (1984). See also Monte Vista Co. v. The Anaconda Co., 231 M 522, 755 P2d 1358, 45 St. Rep. 809 (1988).

Ambiguous Phrase — Entire Contract to Determine Intent: A coal contract was entered on March 31, 1974. In 1976, the Montana Department of State Lands (functions now transferred to Department of Environmental Quality) determined that Decker was precluded under Title 82, ch. 4, part 2, from disturbing a certain portion of land within the mine area contemplated by the contract. It was conceded this would increase mining costs. The contract contained a price adjustment provision that allowed for price adjustments due to new government regulation. Decker contended the nondisturbance determination was a "new regulation" even though the statute under which the Department acted was enacted in 1973. The court in construing "new regulation" looked to the entire contract to determine mutual intent. The court determined, in light of adjustment provisions for all other cost increases, that "new regulation" meant increases required by government action taken after the effective date of the contract. Austin v. Decker Coal Co., 701 F2d 420 (5th Cir. 1983).

Requirement of Annual Amortization Payments Consistent With Purpose of Land Exchange Agreement: Shortly after entering into a land purchase agreement, the parties changed the agreement into a tax-free land exchange agreement. The new agreement gave buyer 3½ years to acquire like-kind property to be exchanged for seller's ranch. The like-kind property was to be purchased with funds placed periodically by buyer in an escrow account. Several years later a dispute arose concerning the nature and timing of the payments. Buyer submitted the questions to the District Court in a declaratory judgment action. The District Court interpreted the contract in a manner generally favorable to seller, and buyer appealed, claiming that the District Court's decision was unreasonable, contrary to the parties' intentions, and improper under the rules of construction of contracts. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the District Court's interpretation had not been unreasonable since: (1) its decision on the timing of the rental payments was reflective of the parties' intentions as shown by their past performance; (2) its decision on the timing of the amortization payments was consistent with the rule of construction requiring that a contract be construed in such a way as to give effect to all of its provisions; and (3) its ruling on the intention of the parties was supported by the evidence. Finally, 28-3-206 did not entitle buyer to have ambiguities construed in his favor; even though buyer claimed that the nature of the agreement was changed solely for seller's benefit, the agreement was prepared by an attorney for both parties, not by one party alone. Lewis v. Murphy, 199 M 368, 649 P2d 740, 39 St. Rep. 1459 (1982).

Amount of Rent — Essential Lease Term Requiring Certainty: Appellants signed a lease with an option to renew the lease. Although the appellants properly gave notice of intent to exercise the option, the renewal provision failed for lack of certainty regarding the amount of the rent because a determination of the amount of the rent upon renewal was based on bids from third parties. In this case, there was no such bid and therefore no means of determining the amount of the rent. The renewal provision of the lease was void for lack of certainty regarding the essential term of rent. Riis v. Day, 188 M 253, 613 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 1093 (1980), followed in Nentwig v. United Indus., Inc., 256 M 134, 845 P2d 99, 49 St. Rep. 1172 (1992), and GRB Farm v. Christman Ranch, Inc., 2005 MT 59, 326 M 236, 108 P3d 507 (2005).

Contract for Joint Purchase of Property — Construction of Contract as a Whole: Where the appellant and respondent entered into an agreement whereby the respondent agreed to loan appellant the down payment for the purchase of real property on a contract for deed, the District Court correctly looked to the clear language of the instrument as a whole to determine the intentions of the parties, and phrases relied on by the appellant would not be taken out of context to reach the result urged by the appellant. Downs v. Smyk, 185 M 16, 604 P2d 307 (1979).

Right of First Refusal in Lease: Contract was interpreted as sustaining lessees' right of first refusal of purchase. Tribble v. Reely, 171 M 201, 557 P2d 813 (1976), distinguished in Wymo Land Co. v. Luggie, 1998 MT 50, 288 M 21, 955 P2d 171, 55 St. Rep. 208 (1998).

Duty of Insurance Company to Defend: Insurance company that had agreed to defend taxidermist against liability for the risks incurred by shipping had a duty to defend him against complaint of customer alleging delivery of substituted animal heads. Atcheson v. Safeco Ins. Co., 165 M 239, 527 P2d 549 (1974).

Indemnity Clause: Printed indemnity clause on back of purchase order was inoperative where typed portion of purchase order merely accepted offer of seller with specific reference to attached modifications and made no mention of indemnity clause. Hoerner Waldorf Corp. v. Bumstead-Woolford Co., 158 M 472, 494 P2d 293 (1972).

Purchase of Liquor License: Where agreement to buy liquor license stated that $9,000 was the consideration for the license, and also, in another part of the agreement, it was stated that the assignee would assume the assignor's lease to certain premises, the agreement was construed to mean that the parties actually intended that both the money and the assumption of the lease were consideration for purchase of the liquor license. Kintner v. Harr, 146 M 461, 408 P2d 487 (1965).

Insurance Contract: In construing an insurance contract effect must be given to every part of the insurance policy. Kansas City Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Clark, 217 F. Supp. 231 (D.C. Mont. 1963), affirmed in 329 F2d 647 (9th Cir. 1964).

Construction of Deeds:

A quitclaim deed and assignment of contract for deed may be construed as security for the payment of a promissory note. Kraus v. Newman, 137 M 388, 352 P2d 261 (1960).

Where a deed of land contained a clause following the description of the land which said "including one-half of all oil and gas rights owned by the parties", it must be considered that it was the intention of the parties to exclude from the deed the other one-half interest in the oil and gas and that such one-half remained with the grantor. Wyrick v. Hoefle, 136 M 172, 346 P2d 563 (1959).

General Language Prevails: Mere isolated tracts, clauses, and words will not be allowed to prevail over the general language utilized in the instrument. Steen v. Rustad, 132 M 96, 313 P2d 1014 (1957).

Intention of Parties:

A court in interpreting a written instrument will not isolate certain phrases of that instrument in order to garner the intent of the parties, but will grasp the instrument by its four corners and in the light of the entire instrument ascertain the paramount and guiding intention of the parties. Steen v. Rustad, 132 M 96, 313 P2d 1014 (1957).

In the construction of a contract the intention of the parties at the time of contracting must be pursued if possible, which intention must be gathered from the entire instrument and not from particular words or phrases or disjointed parts of it, and in the ascertainment of such intention the subject matter of the contract and the purposes of its execution are material. St. v. Rosman, 84 M 207, 274 P 850 (1929).

The intention of the parties to a deed is to be ascertained from the language thereof, viewed in its entirety, and not as it is presented in particular sentences or paragraphs. R. M. Cobban Realty Co. v. Donlan, 51 M 58, 149 P 484 (1915).

Lease With Option to Buy: Plaintiff's option to buy was exclusive and not conditioned upon defendant's decision to sell where instrument did not use the term "first option to buy" and the entire language of the agreement showed that plaintiff was given an exclusive option to buy the property described under the lease. His method of exercising his option was by tendering $1,500 to the defendant, as called for by "Plan No. 2". Steen v. Rustad, 132 M 96, 313 P2d 1014 (1957).

Farm Leases: Under this section farm lease contracts are to be read as a whole and not by particular paragraphs or sentences, and under 28-3-206 and 28-3-306 any ambiguities in such a lease should be construed against the lessor. Tenant was entitled to compensation for summer-fallowing he did during the last year of his holding where he did not renew and the lease was given to another; and where lease required 80 acres to be summer-fallowed, but tenant found only 74.5 acres of tillable land, he substantially complied. Letz v. Lampen, 110 M 477, 104 P2d 4 (1940).

Verbal Clarity: In the construction of a contract its language is to be resorted to in the first instance, but the conclusion to be reached depends not upon the verbal clarity of the particular sentences or paragraphs but upon the view to be taken of it in its entirety. Roecher v. Commercial Nat'l Bank, 87 M 570, 289 P 388 (1930).

28-3-203. When several contracts taken together.

GENERAL

Contradicting Clauses in Separate Contracts Construed Against Drafter — Employee Waiver — Health Insurance: The plaintiff health insurance company filed a breach of contract action against the defendant, an employer providing health insurance for its employees. The contracts between the parties required the defendant to cover 75% or more of its employees; however, a subsequent contract allowed the defendant's employees to waive coverage. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant, finding that the two provisions in the contracts were ambiguous and the contract should be interpreted against the drafter. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the contracts must be interpreted as part of the same transaction and that giving effect to both contract provisions is not reasonably practical, that the ambiguity is construed against the drafter, that the newer specific contract controlled over the older general contract, and that the waiver provision was meant to modify the minimum employee participation provision. Mont. Health Network, Inc. v. Great Falls Orthopedic Associates, 2015 MT 186, 379 Mont 513, 353 P.3d 483.

Property Covenants and Settlement Agreement Substantially One Transaction: The plaintiffs sued the subdivision property owners over amendments to the covenants. Prior to trial, all but one of the subdivision property owners settled with the plaintiffs. The settlement included executing new covenants. The District Court then ruled against the remaining defendant and awarded attorney fees. The Supreme Court held that the settlement agreement and covenants should be viewed as one transaction. Houden v. Todd, 2014 MT 113, 375 Mont. 1, 324 P.3d 1157.

Express Lease Provision Required for Survival of Overriding Royalty: An overriding royalty applies only to the lease out of which it was created. In the case of an oil or gas lease or sublease, if a party wishes an overriding royalty to survive the expiration of the lease or sublease, an express provision must be included in the lease or sublease to accomplish survival of the overriding royalty. Ritter v. Bill Barrett Corp., 2009 MT 210, 351 M 278, 210 P3d 688 (2009), following Edward v. Prince, 221 M 272, 719 P2d 422 (1986).

Parol Evidence of Circumstances Under Which Bid Prepared Proper in Interpreting Uncertain Contract Provisions: Bid estimates on a road building project contained vague and ambiguous project requirements, and testimony at trial regarding the height of the finished road was conflicting. Thus, the District Court, in interpreting provisions of the contract that appeared ambiguous or uncertain, properly considered parol evidence of the circumstances under which the bid was prepared. The court found more credible the contractor's testimony that there was not agreement that a subroad would be constructed of pit run gravel 6 inches above field grade, and that determination was affirmed on appeal. DeNiro v. Gasvoda, 1999 MT 129, 294 M 478, 982 P2d 1002, 56 St. Rep. 521 (1999).

Duty of Escrow Holder to Clear Title: As a matter of contract law, it was the contractual duty of the escrow holder in this case to clear title to the parcel of land involved and then distribute the balance of the funds accruing from the sale of the land to the holders of underlying mortgages. First Mont. Title Co. v. N. Point Square Ass'n, 240 M 33, 782 P2d 376, 46 St. Rep. 1920 (1989).

Termination of Lease and Royalty Interest — No Error in Summary Judgment: The District Court did not err in granting a summary judgment when several contracts relating to the same matter and made as substantially one transaction clearly showed that a lease assignment incorporating by reference the exhibit which created an overriding royalty interest in defendant included language that the assignors were owners of the overriding royalty interest of which the defendant received a one-fourth interest and which terminated with the lease. Edward v. Prince, 221 M 272, 719 P2d 422, 43 St. Rep. 805 (1986).

Contract and Bond: Subcontractor's agreement with contractor and bond covering subcontractor were construed together in suit by contractor on subcontractor's bond. Carl Weissman & Sons, Inc. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 152 M 291, 448 P2d 740 (1968).

Contract to Purchase and Quitclaim Deed: Where contract to purchase land, being in effect an option to purchase, and a quitclaim deed to the same land were made at the same time, the deed and contract constituted a single transaction and must be construed together. Ryan v. Bloom, 120 M 443, 186 P2d 879 (1947).

Note and Mortgage: Under this section, declaring that several contracts relating to the same matter and made as parts of substantially one transaction must in their interpretation be taken together, in a mortgage foreclosure suit the mortgagor's note, the mortgage, and an assignment of rents and profits derived from the property during the time the indebtedness remained unpaid were constituent parts of one transaction, to be considered together for all purposes. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Burns, 90 M 402, 4 P2d 703 (1931).

Contract for Real Property Sale: Under this section all documents signed by the parties to a contract of a sale of real property, such as promissory note, mortgage, etc., are to considered as parts of one transaction and construed together. Adamczik v. McCauley, 89 M 27, 297 P 486 (1931).

No Mention of Other Document: Under this section, providing that several contracts relating to the same matter, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction must be taken together, stipulations embodied in a mortgage become a part of the note securing which it is given even though the note contains no mention of the mortgage. Vande Veegaete v. Vande Veegaete, 75 M 52, 243 P 1082 (1925).

Same Matter — Same Transaction: Several contracts relating to the same matter and made as parts of substantially the same transaction must be taken together for all purposes. U.S. Nat'l Bank of Red Lodge v. Chappell, 71 M 553, 230 P 1084 (1924).

Note and Mortgage — Absence of Signature: The defendants obtained a loan and executed a promissory note. To secure payment, they at the same time executed a mortgage on certain personal property. After default, defendant contended a stipulation in the mortgage permitting acceleration was not part of the bargain because she had not signed the mortgage. The court held that where two or more contracts are parts of the same transaction, are known to all parties, and are delivered at the same time to accomplish an agreed purpose, the agreements are treated as one and liability cannot be avoided by not signing one of the contracts. Union Bank & Trust v. Himmelbauer, 56 M 82, 181 P 332 (1919), affirmed, 57 M 438, 188 P 940 (1920).

Last Document Referring to Others: Where different writings have relation to the same subject matter, the last referring to the others, the intention of the parties must be ascertained by construing all of the writings together as one entire contract. Lyon v. Dailey Copper Min. & Smelting Co., 46 M 108, 126 P 931 (1912).

Lease and Bond to Pay Rent: A bond given to secure the payment of rent which was signed after the lease of the property had been executed was not nudum pactum where both instruments were executed on the same day and where the bond referred to and made the latter instrument a part of it. They must be construed as having been executed contemporaneously and as amounting to one instrument. Dodd v. Vucovich, 38 M 188, 99 P 296 (1909).

Same Transaction: Where a note, deed, and defeasance were all executed at the same time, had reference to the same subject matter, and were a part of the same transaction, the deed being intended as a mortgage to secure the note, the three instruments should be construed as one as provided in this section. Bartels v. Davis, 34 M 285, 85 P 1027 (1906).

Note and Contract of Purchase: Where a note sued on was given in consideration of the written contracts of the payee, made a few days before the date of the note, that he would on or before a certain day purchase or procure a purchaser for the maker's interests in certain mines at a stated price, and that if he failed so to do the maker would be absolved from all liability to convey such interests, these contracts were admissible under this section as relating to the same matters as the note in suit between the same parties and as parts of substantially one transaction. Talbott v. Heinze, 25 M 4, 63 P 624 (1901).

CONSTRUCTION OF AGREEMENTS

Potential Access Rights Merged With Deeds and Extinguished — Applicability of Contract Law Doctrine of Merger: Prior to Gehring's consent to sell 360 acres to APS Corporation (APS) in 1970, they entered an agreement that included a provision on access rights, whereby Gehring purported to grant future purchasers access to other land owned by Gehring for certain recreational purposes. After being told by the Gehring Ranch Corporation that they would not be allowed access to Gehring's land for recreation, the successors in interest to APS sought to enforce the agreement, alleging that they had been improperly excluded from the land and that the agreement created an easement over Gehring's land. The District Court granted summary judgment for the Gehring Ranch Corporation, noting that the agreement did not identify Gehring's other lands upon which an easement was purportedly created. The court also held that any agreement prior to execution of the deeds was merged with the deeds and that because the deeds transferring title did not provide for access, any access rights promised in the agreement were lost. The decision was appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The clause in the agreement was part of a larger agreement to transfer property in the future, and Gehring did not intend to create an easement, but at most intended to provide for potential access privileges if certain conditions, such as creation of a property owners' association and adoption of rules governing the use of the recreational privileges, were met. The Supreme Court cited Urquhart v. Teller, 1998 MT 119, 288 M 497, 958 P2d 714 (1998), in applying the contract law doctrine of merger, holding that the deeds contained all the rights of the parties and that because no access privileges were mentioned in the deeds, any potential access rights referred to in the agreement merged with the deeds and were lost. Richman v. Gehring Ranch Corp., 2001 MT 293, 307 M 443, 37 P3d 732 (2001).

Shareholders' Agreement Enforceable Independent of Stock Exchange — Different Intent Contained in Separate Agreements Separately Enforceable: Following his termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay, contending that an earlier merger transaction and the subsequent shareholders' agreement should be read together and citing Rumph v. Dale Edwards, Inc., 183 M 359, 600 P2d 163 (1979), for the proposition that when construing an agreement that is part of a larger transaction, the intention of the parties must be determined by examining the entirety of the larger transaction. However, Rumph was distinguishable here because all the agreements in question occurred at different times and did not reference or depend upon each other. Each agreement was clear and unambiguous. Under Gerdes v. Omaha Home for Boys, 89 NW 2d 849 (Nebr. 1958), a court may not avoid the language of a complete, unambiguous contract by consolidating it with another writing if the effect of doing so would be to avoid an essential part of the contract. The District Court properly concluded that the shareholders' agreement was enforceable independent of the stock exchange between the parties. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Five Agreements Constituting Integrated Sales Agreement With Condition Precedent — Overriding Previous Partnership Agreements and Providing for Attorney Fees: Daines argued that of the five agreements executed by the parties, the option agreement should have been read separately and interpreted as an option to buy conferring a privilege but not imposing an obligation and that on that basis, he could not be liable for not completing a purchase agreement. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had properly looked at the five agreements as a whole in interpreting the parties' intent and had correctly concluded that the agreements constituted an integrated sales agreement subject to conditions precedent. The Supreme Court further held that since the five agreements constituted a sales agreement, they superseded the previous partnership agreements. The respondents were not liable for capital contributions as partners, and the default provision in the option agreement providing for attorney fees did apply to the agreement created by all five of the documents executed by the parties. Daines v. Knight, 269 M 320, 888 P2d 904, 52 St. Rep. 8 (1995).

Merger of Prior Agreement Into Deed — No Presumption of Surrender of Covenants: Appellants contended that since there was no express language in deeds recorded in 1972 that the parties intended to merge the restrictive provisions of a 1971 agreement into the deeds, the commercial use restrictions in the 1971 agreement still applied, regardless of being left out of the deeds. The Supreme Court, recalling its decision in Story v. Montforton, 112 M 24, 113 P2d 507 (1941), noted that "whether or not there has been a merger depends on the intention of the parties". The court applied this principle in Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965), quoting Reid v. Sykes, 27 Ohio St. 285: "... evidence of that intention may exist in or out of the deed. There is no presumption that a party, in giving or accepting a deed, intends to give up the covenants of which the deed is not a performance or satisfaction." In the present case, the court found strong evidence that the deeds contained all of the restrictions on the lands that were intended by the parties and that the contract had merged in the deeds. Haggerty v. Gallatin County, 221 M 109, 717 P2d 550, 43 St. Rep. 674 (1986).

Documents Construed Together — Intent Not Gleaned From Isolated Words: When there is a close relationship between two documents, they must be construed together to determine the intent of the parties. The intent is determined by reading the two documents in full rather than dissecting them to take isolated words and phrases as the intent of the parties. Rumph v. Dale Edwards, Inc., 183 M 359, 600 P2d 163 (1979), distinguished in Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000), and followed in Richman v. Gehring Ranch Corp., 2001 MT 293, 307 M 443, 37 P3d 732 (2001).

Contrary Intention: The general rule is that where several instruments are executed at the same time by the same parties, for the same purpose, and in the course of the same transaction, they are treated as one instrument and are construed together. That is not the case where a contrary intention can be determined from the instruments. In this case neither the purchase order, a quotation, or a letter incorporated an indemnity provision, which is required to be stated in clear and definite language. Hoerner Waldorf Corp. v. Bumstead-Woolford Co., 158 M 472, 494 P2d 293 (1972).

Operation in General: This section does not in any way conflict with 28-2-905, which requires in part that outside evidence may not be used to vary the terms of a written contract, since facts relevant to the formation of the instrument, as defined in 1-4-102, may be introduced to settle ambiguities. Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965).

Sale of Real Estate: Corporation which sold apartments in a condominium was bound by the language in the sales contract to the first purchaser, so that even though restriction requiring the premises to be used for residential purposes was not employed in subsequent contracts, such equitable servitude still attached to subsequent deeds. Thisted v. Country Club Tower Corp., 146 M 87, 405 P2d 432 (1965).

Several Writings Comprising Contract — Conditional Sale — Increase of Animals: Where a promissory note containing a conditional sale contract would not have been executed without a contemporaneous agreement relative to the animals covered by the sale contract under which the seller agreed to purchase their increase under certain conditions, the two instruments together formed the contract and were to be read together. Apple v. Edwards, 92 M 524, 16 P2d 700, 87 ALR 179 (1932).

Single Document Not Determinative of Rights: Where a contract did not in itself determine all rights, duties, and obligations of the parties but specifically referred to other contracts that would be determinative, all the writings were considered together in determining the meaning of the contract. Great W. Oil Co. v. Lewistown Oil & Ref. Co., 91 M 146, 6 P2d 863 (1931).

Application for Loan: In constructing several contracts relating to the same subject matter and constituting substantially parts of one transaction (application for loan from a building and loan association, note, and mortgage), the intention of the parties must be gathered from the writings, read together, reviewing all their terms, since one clause may modify, limit, or illuminate another. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Gardiner, 87 M 586, 289 P 555 (1930).

Reference to Another Contract: A contract will not be held to incorporate stipulations embodied in another contract save insofar as the same are specifically set forth or identified by reference. St. Bank of Darby v. Pew, 59 M 144, 195 P 852 (1921).

Deed and Condition Subsequent: A deed was made upon a condition subsequently imposed by a separate writing, under the terms of which the grantee obligated herself to make a stipulated monthly payment to a third person, with reversion in favor of the grantor. The deed and written agreement were part of and constituted the same transaction, regardless of whether they were executed at the same time or not. Smith v. Hoffman, 56 M 299, 184 P 842 (1919).

Together for All Purposes: Stipulations in a mortgage are to be construed as entering into and becoming a part of the note secured thereby, and if the two are to be taken together, they must be considered together for all purposes. Union Bank & Trust Co. v. Himmelbauer, 56 M 82, 181 P 332 (1919).

PARTIES TO AGREEMENTS

Contracts Executed by Corporation and Owners of Corporation Not Construed Together: Plaintiff sold six lots to Griff and Caplan and sold seven lots to a corporation owned by Griff and Caplan. The corporation stopped making payments, after which the plaintiff refused payments offered by the individual. Plaintiff then brought suit, arguing that the two contracts were really one. The court found that the contracts speak for themselves. Neither makes the slightest reference to the other. The parties to the contract are not the same as the plaintiff contends, although there is some evidence to support the plaintiff. There is also substantial evidence to support the finding of the trial court. Wortman v. Griff, 200 M 528, 651 P2d 998, 39 St. Rep. 1916 (1982).

Issue of Fact as to Whether a Written Agreement Supersedes an Oral Agreement: Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment was properly denied where there was some question of fact as to whether one written agreement, signed by plaintiff as agent for his company, by the company vice-president and by defendant, entitling defendant to a salary advance, supersedes a prior oral agreement allegedly made between plaintiff and defendant in which plaintiff personally guaranteed a salary to defendant. Reviewing the relationship of the two agreements in the light most favorable to the defendant, the alleged oral agreement is collateral to the written contract, is distinct, involves a different party, and is able to stand independently of the other. Reaves v. Reinbold, 189 M 284, 615 P2d 896, 37 St. Rep. 1500 (1980).

Identical Parties Required: An alleged breach of employment did not constitute a breach of exclusive listing agreement when it was obvious that the two agreements were between different parties. McDonald & Co. v. Fishtail Creek Ranch, 175 M 53, 572 P2d 195 (1977).

Where Contracts Read Together Though Parties Not Same: The rule that where several instruments are made at the same time in relation to same subject matter they may be read together as one instrument and recitals in one may be limited by reference to the other may obtain even when parties are not the same, if the several instruments were known to all parties and were delivered at the same time to accomplish an agreed purpose. Doheny v. USF&G Co., 34 F. Supp. 888 (D.C. Mont. 1940), affirmed in USF&G Co. v. Doheny, 123 F2d 746 (9th Cir. 1941), certiorari denied, 62 S Ct 905, 315 US 817, 86 L Ed 1215 (1941).

Letter and Contract of Sale: Where two writings, one a contract of sale of livestock and the other a letter to the buyer, written by the agent of the seller, referring to the time of payment, were delivered at the same time, they were properly considered together in an action to recover the purchase price, irrespective of the fact that the letter was signed only by plaintiff's agent; the letter having constituted an offer with reference to the time of payment, which was accepted by defendant buyer, relied and acted upon by the latter, it constituted a part of the contract of sale. Orem v. Hansen Packing Co., 91 M 222, 7 P2d 546 (1932).

Deed to Mortgaged Property: Where preliminary agreements culminating in a deed to mortgaged property by the mortgagor to the mortgagee were made in consideration of the execution and delivery of the deed, the several transactions had at the same time must be taken together and considered as though all the promises, agreements, and obligations of the parties were contained in a single instrument signed by all the parties; hence the fact that the wife of the mortgagor did not sign one of the agreements did not render the deed invalid, she having been a party to the entire transaction, taking part therein with full knowledge of all the facts. Cooper v. Goble, 77 M 580, 252 P 362 (1926).

SEPARATE OR VOID TRANSACTIONS

Property Settlement: Agreements as to disposition of property between estranged husband and wife, which were obviously to become operative in the future when a divorce proceeding was instituted, with condition that resistance to divorce would render the property settlement nugatory, when construed together, facilitated divorce and were void as a violation of public policy. W. Life Ins. Co. v. Bower, 153 F. Supp. 25 (D.C. Mont. 1957), affirmed in Bower v. Bower, 255 F2d 618 (9th Cir. 1958).

Consideration for Separate Agreements: Provision of property settlement agreement under which husband relinquished right to change beneficiary of life insurance policy was severable from provisions facilitating divorce and was enforceable where wife presumably released certain property rights in consideration therefor. W. Life Ins. Co. v. Bower, 153 F. Supp. 25 (D.C. Mont. 1957), affirmed in Bower v. Bower, 255 F2d 618 (9th Cir. 1958).

When Construed Separately: The rule that more than one contract relating to the same subject matter between the same parties and made as parts of substantially one transaction must be construed together has no application in an action on a surety bond conditioned to pay the amount found to be due under the terms of a contract for the sale of state timber if the buyer failed to pay, the parties not being the same and the obligations thereunder being entirely separate and distinct. St. v. Am. Sur. Co. of New York, 78 M 504, 255 P 1063 (1927).

Loan Application on Life Insurance: An application to an insurance company for a loan "payable at the home office" of the company requesting interest coupons to be sent to a certain bank "and at my risk until payments made are actually received by the company at its home office" signed by the applicant was not a contract within the meaning of this section, providing that several contracts relating to the same matter are to be taken together, and therefore refusal to admit it to be considered in connection with the note and mortgage executed pursuant to the application was proper. Dehnert v. Union Cent. Life Ins. Co., 74 M 104, 239 P 773 (1925).

Special Bond: Where a contractor had obligated himself to construct a watertight basement in a building he had undertaken to erect for plaintiff by a bond separate and distinct from and without reference to the building contract or the plans and specifications furnished by plaintiff's architect, the bond being given about a month after execution of the building contract and a week later than the bond accompanying the latter contract, he was in no position, in an action on such special bond, to defend on the ground that its provisions should be construed with reference to the building contract, and that having followed the plans and specifications, he was relieved from liability thereunder. St. Bank of Darby v. Pew, 59 M 144, 195 P 852 (1921).

Conflicting Documents: Where a note is secured by a mortgage of even date the note and mortgage are parts of the same contract under this section, which must be read and construed together, thus rendering the fulfillment of the entire contract uncertain and the note nonnegotiable. Cornish v. Woolverton, 32 M 456, 81 P 4 (1905).

Case Notes

Total Compensation in Condemnation to Include Value of Condemned Property and Severance Damages: The city of Whitefish condemned 7,234 square feet of plaintiff's property, but conveyed to plaintiff 10,175 square feet of city property contiguous to plaintiff's lot. The conveyance was intended as severance damages to offset the harm of condemnation. The parties entered an agreement that plaintiff would grant possession of the condemned property to the city and that the city would pay plaintiff $130,000 to convey the 10,175 square foot adjacent lot. The agreement also stated that the parties were unable to agree on the value of the condemned property, the severance damages to plaintiff's remaining property, and the value of the conveyed property. Eventually plaintiff filed a complaint for inverse condemnation and breach of the agreement when the parties were unable to agree on the property values and severance damages. The District Court held that the only issue for the jury was to determine the amount that plaintiff was entitled to for compensation, and the jury was not asked to determine any severance damages owing to plaintiff. The court also disallowed any evidence of the $130,000 payment because that money was considered for severance damages only and could not be considered by the jury in determining plaintiff's compensation for the condemned property. The court further disallowed the city from presenting any evidence regarding the conveyed property because it had not yet been deeded to plaintiff, and absent unity of ownership, the conveyed property could not be considered when determining the fair market value of plaintiff's remaining property after the condemnation. Last, the court determined that plaintiff's "cost-to-cure" damages were noncompensable because plaintiff's access remained the same after condemnation. During trial, various experts presented differing values for the condemned property. The jury ultimately found for plaintiff and held that the city owed $161,000 for the condemned property. The District Court also awarded plaintiff $94,788.23 as litigation expenses. The city appealed, and plaintiff cross-appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court misinterpreted the agreement and improperly limited the issues presented to the jury. The court noted that total compensation in an eminent domain case involves both the value of the condemned property and severance damages, including depreciation suffered as a result of condemnation. In order for the jury to consider all circumstances surrounding the condemnation, a new trial was required, so the case was reversed and remanded. K&R Partnership v. Whitefish, 2008 MT 228, 344 M 336, 189 P3d 593 (2008).

Interpretation of Repugnancies in Partnership Dissolution Agreement: Plaintiff claimed that one paragraph of a partnership dissolution agreement conveyed all of the first partner's 50% interest to the second partner, while a later paragraph reconveyed the 50% interest back to the first partner. This interpretation would have rendered both paragraphs meaningless and repugnant. To resolve any repugnancy and give effect to both paragraphs, the District Court properly interpreted the first paragraph as conveying a present interest and the later paragraph as an executory promise to convey a future interest. Bretz v. Ayers, 232 M 132, 756 P2d 1115, 45 St. Rep. 936 (1988).

Amount of Rent — Essential Lease Term Requiring Certainty: Appellants signed a lease with an option to renew the lease. Although the appellants properly gave notice of intent to exercise the option, the renewal provision failed for lack of certainty regarding the amount of the rent because a determination of the amount of the rent upon renewal was based on bids from third parties. In this case, there was no such bid and therefore no means of determining the amount of the rent. The renewal provision of the lease was void for lack of certainty regarding the essential term of rent. Riis v. Day, 188 M 253, 613 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 1093 (1980), followed in Nentwig v. United Indus., Inc., 256 M 134, 845 P2d 99, 49 St. Rep. 1172 (1992), and GRB Farm v. Christman Ranch, Inc., 2005 MT 59, 326 M 236, 108 P3d 507 (2005).

General Intent: In a real property contract a provision which could be construed to mean that title insurance was not required until sometime subsequent to final payment was construed to be subordinate to the general intent of the contract and held to be a condition precedent. Brown v. Griffin, 150 M 498, 436 P2d 695 (1968). See also Montana-Dakota Util. v. Lower Yellowstone Rural Elec., 178 M 427, 585 P2d 626 (1978).

Nature of Section: This section is a rule of interpretation rather than of construction. Butte Water Co. v. Butte, 48 M 386, 138 P 195 (1914).

Case Notes

"Payable on Death" Designation Negates Joint Tenancy Language on CD Form: The deceased's personal representative was his granddaughter, who was also the person named as the payable on death (POD) beneficiary of the deceased on several certificates of deposit (CDs). The granddaughter obtained a ruling from the District Court that she was a joint tenant with the right of survivorship with respect to the CDs, based upon the language on the CD forms specifically stating that the persons named on the CD were joint tenants. The Supreme Court held that a joint tenancy must be created by specific unambiguous language and that the POD designation on the CDs created an ambiguity negating the joint tenancy language. The Supreme Court further held that the POD language meant that the granddaughter could not have a present interest in the CDs at the time that the CDs were obtained by the deceased and that they could not pass to her under the principles of joint tenancy. The Supreme Court ruled that the POD designation acted to transfer the CDs to the granddaughter outside of the probate estate as a nontestamentary transfer. In re Estate of Lahren, 268 M 284, 886 P2d 412, 51 St. Rep. 1311 (1994), following In re Estate of Shaw, 259 M 117, 855 P2d 105 (1993).

Indemnity Clause: Printed indemnity clause on back of purchase order was inoperative where typed portion of purchase order merely accepted offer of seller with specific reference to attached modifications and made no mention of indemnity clause. Hoerner Waldorf Corp. v. Bumstead-Woolford Co., 158 M 472, 494 P2d 293 (1972).

Insurance Policy: Stamped phrase "Double Indemnity" appearing on face of insurance policy must be interpreted in light of rider to policy to which phrase refers. Niewoehner v. W. Life Ins. Co., 149 M 57, 422 P2d 644 (1967).

Operation and Effect: Where a contract is partly written and partly printed and the two are inconsistent the former controls the latter. New Home Sewing Mach. Co. v. Songer, 91 M 127, 7 P2d 238 (1931).

Oil and Gas Lease: In an action to enforce the cancellation of an oil and gas lease and to recover damages for refusal to cancel, a written paragraph therein, providing that in the event a well was not commenced within the time limit mentioned in the lease the instrument should be null and void, was controlling as against a printed one under which, if the operations were not commenced within that time the lessor should pay $2 per acre for each additional year commencement of drilling was delayed, and demurrer to the complaint was improperly sustained. Duley v. Torrey, 69 M 599, 223 P 498 (1924).

2013 Amendment: Chapter 31 at end deleted "except that in the case of a contract between a public officer or body, as such, and a private party, it is presumed that all uncertainty was caused by the private party"; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2013.

GENERAL

Port Authority Insured Under County Insurance Policy — Extrinsic Evidence Considered — Policy Construed Against Drafter — Insurer Not Immune From Suit as Reinsurer: After a port authority building was destroyed by a fire, the port claimed that it qualified as an insured under a county insurance company policy that included county members and any other county entities that receive insurance through a county joint insurance authority. The insurance company claimed that the language in the policy did not extend to county entities such as the port. Additionally, the insurance company claimed that it was a reinsurer and therefore it was improper for the port to bring a direct claim against it. The Supreme Court held that the port qualified as an insured under terms of the policy and that a direct claim was proper. In reaching a conclusion that was contrary to the language of the policy, the court gave meaning to the entire contract, considered extrinsic evidence, and construed ambiguous language in the policy against the insurer as the drafter. In determining that a direct claim was proper, the court reasoned that the port dealt directly with the insurance company, and therefore the insurer was an excess insurance carrier, rather than a reinsurer. Lincoln County Port Authority v. Allianz Global Risks US Ins. Co., 2013 MT 365, 373 Mont. 60, 315 P.3d 934.

Ambiguous Employment Contract — Question of Parties' Intent Properly Submitted to Jury: West's employment contract contained two different provisions regarding how West would be compensated in the event of termination of employment. The District Court construed the ambiguous clauses against the employer who drafted the contract and submitted the issue to the jury. On appeal by the employer, the Supreme Court examined the contract language and affirmed. The employment agreement was ambiguous on the issue of whether West would be paid trailing commissions or bonuses if West were terminated for cause, so the District Court did not err in ordering that the parties' intent on the issue be submitted to the jury. West v. The Club at Spanish Peaks, LLC, 2008 MT 183, 343 M 434, 186 P3d 1228 (2008), following Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Ambiguity Required Prior to Application of Construction-Against-Drafter Principle: Plaintiffs asserted that because defendants drafted a number of the easements in a utility right-of-way contract, the terms of the contract should be construed most favorably toward plaintiffs. However, plaintiffs admitted that the contract language was unambiguous, and before a contract may be construed against the drafter, some ambiguity must exist. Thus, the trial court did not err by not interpreting the contract language in a light most favorable to plaintiffs. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

No Contractual Definition of Cause — Discretionary Termination of Professional Sports Team Coach Related to Legitimate Business Needs Warranted: Cole was fired as a professional hockey coach because of the team's poor performance. Cole's 5-year employment agreement contained a clause, drafted by Cole, providing that if Cole was terminated without cause, he would receive 1 year's salary and a bonus. Although the contract did not contain a definition of cause, the District Court found that the termination was without cause. The Supreme Court disagreed. Applying de novo review of the District Court's summary judgment to interpret the employment contract terms in their ordinary and popular sense and construing any uncertainty in the contract language against Cole, who drafted it, the Supreme Court held that discharging the coach of a poorly performing professional sports team was a discretionary decision related to the legitimate needs of the business and constituted cause, so the employer had a legitimate business reason to terminate the coach. Thus, Cole was not entitled to recover under the contract. Cole v. Valley Ice Garden, LLC, 2005 MT 115, 327 M 99, 113 P3d 275 (2005).

Dispute Over Contract to Deliver Log Home — No Requirement That Seller Provide Name of Third Party Boom Truck Operator — Rescission Proper Remedy for Material Breach of Contract: Anderson agreed to purchase a log home from Eschenbacher. The home was designed to be constructed on Anderson's homesite. Eschenbacher drafted the purchase contract, which provided that Eschenbacher would act only as a manufacturer, not as a building contractor, and also required Anderson to coordinate and ensure availability of a boom truck to assemble the structure at the site. Anderson contacted a third party to supply a boom truck instead of using Eschenbacher's truck. Eschenbacher then refused to deliver the logs unless Anderson supplied the name of the other boom truck operator. Both parties sued for breach of contract. The District Court concluded that Anderson was under no duty to provide Eschenbacher with the name of the boom truck operator, and the Supreme Court agreed. The contract clearly placed the responsibility for acquiring a boom truck with Anderson, but did not require Eschenbacher to use it, because other language required Anderson to pay any expenses incurred by Eschenbacher for waiting once the logs were delivered, if, for instance, the boom truck that Anderson provided was inadequate. Construing the contract most strongly against the drafter, Eschenbacher, the court found that Eschenbacher could easily have inserted provisions in the contract regarding specifications of an adequate boom truck, but he did not. Eschenbacher materially breached the contract by refusing to deliver the logs until the boom truck dispute was settled. The contract did not specify a remedy; thus, the District Court did not err in granting Anderson rescission of the contract. Eschenbacher v. Anderson, 2001 MT 206, 306 M 321, 34 P3d 87 (2001).

Waiver of Homestead Allowance and Right to Exempt Property by Agreement: An agreement wherein the beneficiaries of a will ambiguously delineated how property was to be divided did not specify that a homestead allowance or exempt property was to go to the decedent's wife. The trial court properly ruled that the wife waived her right to the allowance and property by agreement, despite her contentions that there was no fair disclosure of her rights since she was not aware of the allowance or exempt property. The Supreme Court noted that neither party was aware of the allowance or exempt property and that since the wife was represented by counsel at the time of agreement, the contractual ambiguity should be interpreted against her under 28-3-206. In re Estate of Flasted, 228 M 85, 741 P2d 750, 44 St. Rep. 1362 (1987), distinguished in In re Estate of Thies, 273 M 272, 903 P2d 186, 52 St. Rep. 970 (1995).

Insurance Policy Clause Unambiguous: Home owners' insurance policy clause clearly and unambiguously covered only vehicles that met both requirements set forth in the provision. Therefore, the clause was within the general rule that when a contract is reduced to writing, the intent of the parties is ascertained from the writing alone if possible. Payne v. Safeco Ins. Co., 222 M 198, 720 P2d 1197, 43 St. Rep. 1171 (1986).

Jury Instruction Regarding Ambiguities in Product Labeling and Instructions for Use — Issue of Fact: Herbicide manufacturer contended the District Court erred in instructing the jury that ambiguities in the wording on product labels and in application instructions were to be construed against the manufacturers, claiming that this rule of construction was a rule of law for the court to apply and not a proper subject for a jury instruction. Plaintiff argued that the instruction was justified because the manufacturer presented the meaning of the application instructions as a factual issue at trial. The Supreme Court agreed, concluding that the jury instruction was a correct statement of law under the facts of the case. Vandalia Ranch, Inc. v. Farmers Union Oil & Supply Co., 221 M 253, 718 P2d 647, 43 St. Rep. 790 (1986).

Issue of Authorship of Agreement Not Precluding Summary Judgment Where Agreement Not Ambiguous: Where the plaintiffs brought an action for default of a mining lease, arguing that summary judgment for the defendants was precluded by the ambiguity of the lease and a dispute as to its authorship, the Supreme Court held that the provisions governing royalty payments were not ambiguous, that authorship was therefore irrelevant, and that summary judgment was properly granted. The plaintiffs' interpretation of the agreement was absurd because that interpretation required payment of royalties before net smelter returns were received or before the royalties themselves could be calculated. The time and method of calculation of payment by the defendants were entirely consistent with the terms of the parties' agreement. Reading the agreement as a whole, there was no factual issue to preclude summary judgment. Lewis v. St., 199 M 368, 675 P2d 107, 41 St. Rep. 9 (1984).

Interpretation of Employment Contract — No Error of Law: Claiming that ambiguities in his employment contract were interpreted incorrectly, an employee appealed the District Court's affirmance of a decision of the Labor Standards Division. Even when the contract was interpreted most strongly against the employer, the District Court order was neither clearly erroneous nor based on an error of law. Landon v. Labor Standards Div., 200 M 153, 649 P2d 1341, 39 St. Rep. 1641 (1982), followed in Travelers Ins. Co. v. Holiday Village Shopping Center Ltd. Partnership, 280 M 217, 931 P2d 1292, 53 St. Rep. 1372 (1996).

Personal Guardianship and Property Conservatorship No Bar to Trust Revocation — Construction Against Party Supplying Trust Form: A trustee appealed from a declaratory ruling of the District Court holding that a personal guardianship and a property conservatorship did not prevent the trustor from revoking the trust. The trustee, also a beneficiary, argued in effect that the trustor had been legally incapacitated from revoking the trust because she was under a personal guardianship and her property was under a conservatorship and because the trust provided that it was irrevocable upon the "incompetency" of the trustor. However, the conservatorship and guardianship did not begin before revocation of the trust. Further, a conservatorship would not affect the power to revoke under 72-5-421. The guardianship had been appointed because the trustor had become physically incapable of caring for herself, not because of mental incapacitation. Construing the term "incompetency" strictly against the trustee because it had supplied the trust form and was a beneficiary, the Supreme Court upheld the trial court's holding that the trust revocation was valid. Mont. Conference Seventh-Day Adventist Church v. Estate of Miller, 192 M 468, 628 P2d 1100, 38 St. Rep. 846 (1981), followed in In re Estate of West, 269 M 83, 887 P2d 222, 51 St. Rep. 1409 (1994).

Letter of Credit: Ambiguous letter of credit issued by bank mentioning two different amounts and stating that the bank was guaranteeing "these funds" should be interpreted most strongly against the bank. Miller v. Walter, 165 M 221, 527 P2d 240 (1974).

Acceptance of Agreement: Defendants' demurrer was properly sustained in action on a written contract where complaint did not allege a written acceptance by the plaintiff and the agreement was to be effective only when it was accepted and when defendants were notified by letter of plaintiff's acceptance. Union Interchange, Inc. v. Allen, 140 M 227, 370 P2d 492 (1962).

Contractors' Bonds: Where defendant furnished contractors with surety bond providing that contractors would faithfully perform contract with Montana State Highway Commission (now Transportation Commission) for roadwork, and contract required contractors to carry public liability insurance to indemnify public for injuries sustained by reason of work on highway, defendant was liable for satisfaction of judgments, notwithstanding exclusion clause under which use of automobiles was excluded from coverage of policy. Doheny v. USF&G Co., 34 F. Supp. 888 (D.C. Mont. 1940), affirmed in USF&G Co. v. Doheny, 123 F2d 746 (9th Cir. 1941).

INSURANCE CONTRACTS

Contradicting Clauses in Separate Contracts Construed Against Drafter — Employee Waiver — Health Insurance: The plaintiff health insurance company filed a breach of contract action against the defendant, an employer providing health insurance for its employees. The contracts between the parties required the defendant to cover 75% or more of its employees; however, a subsequent contract allowed the defendant's employees to waive coverage. The District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant, finding that the two provisions in the contracts were ambiguous and the contract should be interpreted against the drafter. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the contracts must be interpreted as part of the same transaction and that giving effect to both contract provisions is not reasonably practical, that the ambiguity is construed against the drafter, that the newer specific contract controlled over the older general contract, and that the waiver provision was meant to modify the minimum employee participation provision. Mont. Health Network, Inc. v. Great Falls Orthopedic Associates, 2015 MT 186, 379 Mont 513, 353 P.3d 483.

Reformation of Insurance Policy Not Permitted — Clear and Explicit Language Used — Lack of Due Diligence in Discovering Error Not Justifying Reformation: An insurer attempted to reform an insurance policy on the ground that the policy should not cover property near a structure that was specifically exempted from the policy. However, the policy specifically included property within 1,000 feet of other insured property, including property around the exempted structure. The District Court applied 33-15-302 and determined that it was prohibited from reforming insurance policies. On appeal, the Supreme Court also declined to reform the contract, as the language was clear and explicit, due diligence would have uncovered the error, and the insurer failed to establish that its insurance policy expressed something other than what the parties mutually intended. Lincoln County Port Authority v. Allianz Global Risks US Ins. Co., 2013 MT 365, 373 Mont. 60, 315 P.3d 934.

Failure to Provide Workers' Compensation Insurance — Ambiguity of Insurance Contract Not at Issue: An employee leasing company failed to provide workers' compensation insurance for its client companies. The employee leasing company argued that the Workers' Compensation Court failed to apply Montana law regarding the interpretation of insurance contracts by strictly construing any ambiguity in the insurance contract in favor of the insured and against the insurer. The Supreme Court did not disagree that this is a correct statement of insurance law; however, that contract principle did not apply here because there was no question of ambiguity regarding the insurance contracts in this case. Rather, the applicable contract principle here was that for coverage by an insurance policy to apply, there must be a named insured. The employee leasing company was not an insured under the contracts; therefore, the Workers' Compensation Court did not incorrectly apply insurance law. Total Mechanical Heating & Air Conditioning v. Employment Relations Div., 2002 MT 55, 309 M 84, 50 P3d 108 (2002).

Parked Trailers Unattached to Insured Tractors — No Coverage Under Unambiguous Policy Provisions: The District Court found an insurance policy to be ambiguous regarding coverage for trailers that had been used to haul beer but that were parked and used for storage at the time they were accidentally run into and granted summary judgment for insurer based on that ambiguity. The Supreme Court found no ambiguity in policy language that clearly covered only trailers that were attached to an insured tractor. Citing its authority in Hereford v. Hereford, 183 M 104, 598 P2d 600 (1979), the Supreme Court reversed and granted summary judgment to the nonmoving party based on the fact that the unambiguous policy language created no genuine issue of material fact. Canal Ins. Co. v. Bunday, 249 M 100, 813 P2d 974, 48 St. Rep. 597 (1991).

Ambiguous Insurance Policy Provision — Summary Judgment Reversed: An insurance policy that did not clearly state whether it provided uninsured motor vehicle coverage when the driver was insured but the ownership of the vehicle was not was held to be ambiguous; therefore, under the rationale that an ambiguous provision is construed against the insurance company, the policy was interpreted to provide coverage. The District Court grant of summary judgment holding that the policy did not provide uninsured motor vehicle coverage was reversed. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co. v. Taylor, 223 M 215, 725 P2d 821, 43 St. Rep. 1667 (1986).

Conflict Between Contract and Certificate of Insurance: Decedent's employer provided him with group life insurance and paid the total premium. Employer kept the master policy, which stated that the benefit paid would be 300% of annual salary at the time of death, rounded to the nearest dollar. A certificate of insurance not containing this formula was issued to decedent and stated that his benefit would be $104,000. Employer paid premiums based on that amount. Decedent was not shown to have read the master policy. The certificate was issued pursuant to a statute requiring it. Decedent's salary upon his death was $14,700, and based on the policy formula, the correct benefit was $44,000. Insurer sent employer a corrected certificate showing the proper benefit 19 days before decedent died, but the certificate was not given to decedent or his wife until after his death, and neither was informed of the error and correction before death occurred. The master policy stated that the policy controlled in event of discrepancy between it and the certificate. On appeal from judgment that wife was entitled to a $104,000 benefit, the Supreme Court ruled that: (1) the certificate was part of the contract, and in view of the conflict the construction most favorable to the insured would be adopted and the policy provision that the policy governed would be disregarded; (2) insured contracted only indirectly, through his employer, with insurer and his certificate of insurance was his primary source of information regarding the policy and thus he was entitled to rely on the certificate to correctly state the coverage; (3) if the coverage stated on the certificate is incorrect, insured and beneficiaries are deprived of the chance to supplement coverage if they find it inadequate; (4) the amount of decedent's coverage was the essence of the policy; (5) insurer was the drafter of the policy and certificate and must bear the burden of the ambiguity it created; and (6) equity did not require reformation of the contract to correct the error as the certificate was a year old and due diligence would have resulted in discovery of the error before death. Martin v. Crown Life Ins. Co., 202 M 461, 658 P2d 1099, 40 St. Rep. 216 (1983).

Construction of Automobile Insurance Contract: In construction of an automobile insurance contract an ambiguity regarding nonowned vehicles was construed in favor of the insured. Thus partial summary judgment for the insured was proper. Fitzgerald v. Aetna Ins. Co., 176 M 186, 577 P2d 370 (1978).

Ambiguous Theft Insurance Policy: Summary judgment on a claim for loss by theft of a commercial carpet cleaner was improperly granted defendant insurer when the policy of insurance was ambiguous as to exclusions from coverage. The particular exclusionary clause was subordinate to the general intent of the contract. Alpha Real Estate Dev., Inc. v. Aetna Life & Cas. Co., 174 M 301, 570 P2d 585 (1977).

Insurance Policies Generally: Where dealer's trucks were insured for "actual cash value", this term was ambiguous and when properly construed in sense most favorable to insured it was not error to permit dealer to recover the retail market value of the destroyed property rather than the wholesale market value. Johnson v. Equitable Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 142 M 128, 381 P2d 778 (1963).

Fair and Reasonable Construction: Even though an insurance contract is to be construed liberally in favor of the insured and strictly against the insurer, contracts of insurance should be given a fair and reasonable construction. James v. Prudential Ins. Co. of Am., 131 M 473, 312 P2d 125 (1957).

Construction Against Insurer: In interpreting policies of insurance the courts shall resolve uncertainties and ambiguities in the policy against the insurer since it is responsible for the form of the contract. Johnson v. Cont. Cas. Co., 127 M 281, 263 P2d 551 (1953).

Ambiguities in Contract Resolvable Against Mutual Death Benefit Associations: The rule prevailing in litigation concerning insurance policies that any ambiguity in the policy shall be resolved against the insurer since the latter is responsible for the form of the contract under this section is applicable to contracts between mutual death benefit societies and their members. McDonald v. N. Benefit Ass'n, 113 M 595, 131 P2d 479 (1942).

Health and Accident Insurance: If there is any ambiguity in an insurance policy, in the instant case a health and accident policy, the policy form of which was provided by the insurance company, it must under this section be resolved against it; the word "period" was held to mean continuous during the indemnity period of loss of time, and not a period of 1 month where an exclusion clause limited indemnity to any period during which insured was under the regular professional attendance of a physician. Scinski v. Great N. Life Ins. Co., 110 M 106, 99 P2d 218 (1940).

Fire Insurance Contract: A contract of fire insurance must be construed as any other contract. The policy must specify the parties between whom the contract is made and the interest of the insured in the property insured if he is not the absolute owner. This information must be supplied to the insurance company by the applicant for the policy. Stevens v. Steck, 101 M 569, 55 P2d 7 (1936).

Insurance Covering U.S. and Canada: Since insurance companies prepare their own contracts and the insured has no voice in their drawing any ambiguity or uncertainty in them must be construed in favor of the insured. Where an automobile was insured against fire, theft, and collision in the United States and Canada, and another company insured it, by a separate instrument attached to the policy, against confiscation "by municipal, federal, or state authorities" without limiting its liability to confiscation within the limits of the United States, and the car was confiscated in Canada, by construing the two instruments together, the latter company was liable for the loss sustained and its contention that the terms "municipal", "federal", and "state" had no application to the Canadian government was without merit. Mont. Auto Fin. Corp. v. British Fed. Fire Underwriters, 72 M 69, 232 P 198, 36 ALR 1495 (1924).

Application — Representations Not Warranties: Under this section, answers to questions in an application for life insurance as to the prior health of the applicant were representations and not warranties. Pelican v. Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York, 44 M 277, 119 P 778 (1911). See Mut. Life Ins. Co. of New York v. Hilton-Green, 211 F 31 (9th Cir. 1914), followed in McDonald v. N. Benefit Ass'n, 113 M 595, 131 P2d 479 (1942).

REAL PROPERTY CONTRACTS

Sale of Lot Presumptively Including Access: It is a presumption, albeit disputable, that the complete use and enjoyment of a parcel of land includes access to that parcel. To overcome the presumption, the seller must offer evidence or some legal basis that would controvert the buyer's reliance on the presumption. Here, the Kester's sold the Erkers a house in Big Sky for approximately $310,000. The Kesters' attorney later discovered through the title company that a portion of the driveway, which provided sole access to the house, had not been conveyed by the deed to the lot and requested additional money for the deed to the driveway. There was no indication at the time of sale that any parcel was separate and distinct from the lot, nor did the Kesters reveal any intention to reserve the driveway from the purchase of the lot. Although the Erkers were charged with constructive notice of the contents of properly recorded instruments describing prior conveyances of the property, under Montana subdivision laws, the driveway was not an individual parcel of land at the time of purchase, so the Erkers could be charged only with knowledge that the purchase of the lot described in the common metes and bounds description included the driveway. Absent evidence to the contrary, the Erkers were entitled to the presumption that purchase of the lot included access to it and to summary judgment as a matter of law. Erker v. Kester, 1999 MT 231, 296 M 123, 988 P2d 1221, 56 St. Rep. 912 (1999), following Yellowstone Valley Co. v. Assoc. Mtg. Investors, Inc., 88 M 73, 290 P 255, 70 ALR 1002 (1930).

Contract Construed as Right of First Refusal and Not Option Contract — Ambiguity Resolved Against Lessee Drafters of Agreement: Lessor signed two documents giving the lessees certain rights in lessor's 800-acre ranch. The first document, granting a "first option" to purchase, required other offers to be in writing and gave the lessees 45 days from the day of notification of intent to sell to make payment. The Supreme Court held that this document created a right of first refusal. The second document granted a "first option to purchase [my] property . . . upon or before my passing . . ." and also granted 45 days for payment "[u]pon notification of intent to sell". The Supreme Court found that while some of the language in the second document was consistent with a true option, the insertion of the last sentence granting 45 days for payment upon notification of intent to sell indicated a right of first refusal. Because the lessees had drafted the second document, the Supreme Court construed the ambiguity against the lessees and held that the document created a right of first refusal and not an option contract. Because notice of intent to sell had never been given by lessor's estate, the right of first refusal did not come into effect. Lee v. Shaw, 251 M 118, 822 P2d 1061, 48 St. Rep. 1110 (1991). See also a subsequent appeal addressing waiver of the right of first refusal in In re Estate of Pelzman, 261 M 461, 863 P2d 1019, 50 St. Rep. 1408 (1993).

Subjective Standard Applicable to Term "Satisfactory": A real estate listing contract contained the following clause, typed in by the realtor: "This listing is subject to Fultz being able to satisfactory [sic] trade the above lands for lands in Big Horn Co. on a tax free exchange." The realtor argued that an objective standard for a satisfactory trade should be used. The District Court found that because the realtor drafted the contract, any ambiguities should be construed against him. The term "satisfactory" was found to be a subjective standard rather than a reasonable man standard. Because the trade arrangement set up by the realtor did not meet the requirement of a tax-free exchange, the arrangement was properly found to be unsatisfactory under the contract terms. Watson v. Fultz, 239 M 364, 782 P2d 361, 46 St. Rep. 1751 (1989).

Obligation to Veracity of Warrant by Party Drafting It: Real estate was conveyed to plaintiff by "special warranty deed", drafted by defendant, which warrant defendant claimed limited liability to defendant's own acts. It was argued that because defendant did not cause latent defects, liability did not attach. However, by warranting the house, defendant contractually obligated itself to the veracity of the warrant. Because plaintiff relied on defendant's misrepresentations to her detriment, defendant was held liable for the latent defects. Wagner v. Cutler, 232 M 332, 757 P2d 779, 45 St. Rep. 1092 (1988).

Lack of Ambiguity — Rule Inapplicable to Commission Contract: Where the plaintiff and defendant made a commission contract upon which the plaintiff brought an action to collect a commission for the sale of real property, the Supreme Court held that inasmuch as the District Court properly found no ambiguity in the contract, the rule requiring the construction of the contract against its drafter was inapplicable, as under the rationale of Parkhill v. Fuselier, 194 M 415, 632 P2d 1132, 38 St. Rep. 1424 (1981), the drafter must cause an uncertainty. Martin v. Community Gas & Oil Co., 205 M 394, 668 P2d 243, 40 St. Rep. 1385 (1983).

Specific Performance — Failure to Tender Purchase Price — Excuse: Plaintiff and defendants entered into a buy-sell agreement for a parcel of land. The agreement was prepared by defendants' real estate agent. The agreement failed to note a 60-foot roadway and utility easement. Defendants in the meantime sold an adjoining parcel of land, including an interest in the 60-foot easement. Plaintiff sued for specific performance of the buy-sell agreement. Plaintiff was excused from tendering the purchase price because defendants by selling the adjoining parcel subject to the easement indicated their refusal and inability to perform the agreement. Plaintiff is entitled to specific performance of that part of the agreement defendants are now able to convey, notwithstanding that it is the very same title plaintiff refused to accept in the first instance. Chadwick v. Giberson, 190 M 88, 618 P2d 1213, 37 St. Rep. 1723 (1980).

Grazing Permit: A real property sale included some grazing land owned by the United States on which sellers held grazing permits. The contract was ambiguous as to whether sellers were required to transfer the permit or merely execute a waiver on a forest service form. The ambiguity was construed against the promisor. Dooling v. Bright-Holland Co., 152 M 267, 448 P2d 749 (1969).

Option in Lease: Agricultural tenant was not entitled to exercise option to buy contained in lease of land after expiration of lease, even though holding over, in light of statute providing that uncertainties in contract be interpreted against plaintiff-promisor, causing uncertainty to exist. Miller v. Meredith, 149 M 125, 423 P2d 595 (1967).

Sale Agreement: If any uncertainty exists in the sale agreement and the deeds, it must be construed most strongly against the person causing the uncertainty. This was true in the case of a realtor, who in turn was vendor's agent. Voyta v. Clonts, 134 M 156, 328 P2d 655 (1958).

Lease — Improvements by Lessee: Where there is an uncertainty in a contract it is to be interpreted most strongly against the person who caused the uncertainty to exist. Thus where there was a question as to what were intended to be improvements as contemplated by the $1200 rent provisions of the lease and both the lessor and the lessee gave testimony, it was error for the court to disregard such testimony. Consideration of the improvements made by the lessee should be given by the lower court and the value of these items offset against the rents contemplated. Hempstead v. Allen, 126 M 578, 255 P2d 342 (1953).

CONSTRUCTION ADVERSE TO DRAFTER

Ambiguity in Plea Agreement in Defendant's Favor — Improper Denial of Motion to Withdraw Plea: The defendant entered into a plea agreement that expressly referenced 46-12-211(1)(b), which allows a defendant to withdraw the plea if the court rejects the plea agreement. However, the agreement also incorporated other statutory language that does not allow withdrawal of a plea. The District Court denied the motion to withdraw the plea agreement and sentenced the defendant. On appeal, the defendant claimed that his sentence was illegal because he should have been allowed to withdraw his plea given that the agreement expressly referenced law that would permit him to do so. The state argued that the plea agreement was ambiguous because the express language of the agreement conflicted with the citation to 46-12-211(1)(b) and that, under 28-3-206, the ambiguity should be construed against the defendant because defense counsel had drafted the agreement. The Supreme Court rejected the state's argument and, in a matter of first impression and relying on federal case law, held that an ambiguity in a plea agreement should be construed in favor of the defendant. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded with instructions to conduct another sentencing hearing. St. v. Langley, 2016 MT 67, 383 Mont. 39, 369 P.3d 1005.

Ambiguous Decline of Comparable Position Exclusion in Retirement Plan Construed Against Employer — Control Determinative of Independent Contractor Status: Eldredge brought suit against ASARCO for failure to pay him a retirement benefit; the company claimed no benefit was due because Eldgidge had earlier declined a comparable position. The Supreme Court found that the retirement plan stated no timeframe within which the decline of a comparable position would exclude an employee from a retirement benefit and, construing the plan against the company as the drafter of the plan, refused to apply the limitation to the much earlier offer to Eldredge. The court also found that despite ASARCO's attempt to paint Eldredge as an independent contractor, Eldredge was an employee and for that reason, all of his time working for ASARCO counted toward his years of employment for the purposes of the company's retirement plan. Eldredge v. ASARCO, Inc., 2011 MT 80, 360 Mont. 112, 252 P.3d 182.

Contract to Arbitrate Not Formed by Employee Handbook and Employee's Acknowledgment — Ambiguous Arbitration Provisions: When Hubner began working for defendant communications company, she signed an acknowledgment in an employee handbook that contained an arbitration provision. The arbitration clause provided that all controversies would be subject to binding arbitration, but the clauses in the handbook specified that the handbook did not constitute a contract of employment or create any relationship other than an employment-at-will relationship. When Hubner's employment was subsequently terminated, she brought a state claim for wrongful discharge, and defendant moved for a summary disposition compelling arbitration pursuant to 27-5-115. The District Court agreed with Hubner that there was no agreement to arbitrate and denied the motion, so defendant appealed. Defendant argued that because the arbitration clause was separable, it could be independently enforced. A state contract law defense that goes to the entire contract rather than specifically to an arbitration clause does not defeat a motion to compel arbitration; however, when a defense is aimed directly at the arbitration provision rather than the entire contract, state law contract defenses may be applied to hold that no enforceable agreement to arbitrate was made. Further, acceptance or consent by the party against whom a contract is sought to be enforced is required before a contract is enforceable. The language in the handbook was ambiguous and construed against the drafter. The ambiguity prevented Hubner from knowing and accepting that she was agreeing to binding arbitration by signing the handbook. Thus, no contract to arbitrate was formed by virtue of the handbook and Hubner's acknowledgment, even when the arbitration provision was considered separately from the rest of the handbook. The District Court was affirmed. Hubner v. Cutthroat Communications, Inc., 2003 MT 333, 318 M 421, 80 P3d 1256 (2003).

Arbitration Clauses Subject to Principles of Contract Interpretation: The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's holding that the defendant, by not stating what law would govern the arbitration clause, had created an ambiguity subject to the general rules of contract interpretation and that the ambiguity would be construed strictly against the defendant. Mueske v. Piper, Jaffray & Hopwood, Inc., 260 M 207, 859 P2d 444, 50 St. Rep. 1009 (1993), followed in Topco, Inc. v. St., 275 M 352, 912 P2d 805, 53 St. Rep. 175 (1996).

Ambiguity — Conformity to General Principles: Kevin Cumiskey leased a restaurant from Elizabeth Bradley. The lease provided that Cumiskey could make improvements and alterations to the premises that were to remain Cumiskey's property. Fixtures were also to be Cumiskey's. Cumiskey was to insure Bradley's interest, which he failed to do. The restaurant was severely damaged through suspected arson. The insurer brought a declaratory judgment action, and Bradley counterclaimed for damages or loss on the basis of the failure to insure. Damages were an issue at trial, but the trial court granted summary judgment for Bradley on the issue of liability. The Supreme Court, on appeal, held that the District Court had properly found the terms on fixtures and improvements in the lease ambiguous and used an appropriate rule of construction to interpret these clauses. The lease was prepared by an attorney for Cumiskey. Cumiskey testified he intended to use the lease to coerce Bradley into selling him the property. The court properly construed the ambiguity against Cumiskey, the person causing it, and found that the specific provision controlled the general provision and that such interpretation was in conformance with general landlord and tenant law in Montana. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co. v. Cumiskey, 204 M 350, 665 P2d 223, 40 St. Rep. 891 (1983), followed in Wyman v. DuBray Land Realty, 231 M 294, 752 P2d 196, 45 St. Rep. 621 (1988), and Nimmick v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 270 M 315, 891 P2d 1154, 52 St. Rep. 208 (1995). See also Frates v. Edward D. Jones & Co., 233 M 377, 760 P2d 748, 45 St. Rep. 1567 (1988).

Exception for Jointly Drawn Document:

Shortly after entering into a land purchase agreement, the parties changed the agreement into a tax-free land exchange agreement. The new agreement gave buyer 3½ years to acquire like-kind property to be exchanged for seller's ranch. The like-kind property was to be purchased with funds placed periodically by buyer in an escrow account. Several years later a dispute arose concerning the nature and timing of the payments. Buyer submitted the questions to the District Court in a declaratory judgment action. The District Court interpreted the contract in a manner generally favorable to seller, and buyer appealed, claiming that the District Court's decision was unreasonable, contrary to the parties' intentions, and improper under the rules of construction of contracts. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the District Court's interpretation had not been unreasonable since: (1) its decision on the timing of the rental payments was reflective of the parties' intentions as shown by their past performance; (2) its decision on the timing of the amortization payments was consistent with the rule of construction requiring that a contract be construed in such a way as to give effect to all of its provisions; and (3) its decision on the intention of the parties was supported by the evidence. Finally, this section did not entitle buyer to have ambiguities construed in his favor; even though buyer claimed that the nature of the agreement was changed solely for seller's benefit, the agreement was prepared by an attorney for both parties, not by one party alone. Lewis v. Murphy, 199 M 368, 649 P2d 740, 39 St. Rep. 1459 (1982).

The general rule is that a contract containing ambiguous language is construed most strongly against the party causing it. The general rule does not apply where both parties jointly draw up the terms and a transcription of the agreement prepared by only one of the parties is reviewed by the other party to confirm that it corresponds to their agreement since any ambiguity is jointly created. Rumph v. Dale Edwards, Inc., 183 M 359, 600 P2d 163 (1979).

Resolution of Uncertainty: Any uncertainty in a contract must be resolved against the person drafting it. Shanahan v. Universal Tavern Corp., 179 M 36, 585 P2d 1314 (1978).

Ambiguity in Partnership Dissolution Agreement: Since appellant drafted a partnership dissolution agreement that was held ambiguous the terms were construed most strongly against him. Lauterjung v. Johnson, 175 M 74, 572 P2d 511 (1977).

Party Drafting Agreement: If the provisions of contracts (promissory note and mortgage securing it) prepared by plaintiff in a foreclosure suit are uncertain, they must be most strongly construed against him under this section, he having caused the uncertainty to exist. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Gardiner, 87 M 586, 289 P 555 (1930).

Burden of Proof: The language of an undertaking on appeal must be interpreted most strongly against the sureties, and upon them rests the burden of explaining or removing whatever uncertainty exists therein. Kasun v. Todevich, 71 M 315, 229 P 714 (1924).

Employment Contract: Where defendant, in offering employment to plaintiff by letter and subsequently in employing him, stated orally that he would give him work "the year round" at a compensation of $75 a month, the burden of removing any uncertainty as to the meaning of the term "the year round" was upon defendant as the party who by its use caused the uncertainty to exist, and his failure to do so warranted the jury in finding that the employment was to be from the beginning to the end of the contract year. Weir v. Ryan, 68 M 336, 218 P 947 (1923).

Teacher Contract: When a school board had provided in its rules that in case a teacher resigns or is dismissed before the end of the school year her compensation shall be "for only the actual time in service", the language being that of the board, any uncertainty in it must be construed most strongly against the board in a controversy with it by a teacher on a claim for compensation. Finley v. School District, 51 M 411, 153 P 1010 (1915), distinguished in State ex rel. Priestly v. Croff, 95 M 498, 27 P2d 540 (1933).

Attorney as Drafter: Where after applying the ordinary rules of construction any uncertainty remains in the terms and expressions employed in a contract, they must be construed most strongly against the party who drew it up—in this instance an attorney at law. Lyon v. Dailey Copper Min. & Smelting Co., 46 M 108, 126 P 931 (1912).

Evidence to Support: Where the evidence tends to prove that the promisee wrote the agreement and selected the terms thereof, the presumption under this section gives way to the contrary one that the latter caused the uncertainty and the burden rests on him to remove it. Blankenship v. Decker, 34 M 292, 85 P 1035 (1906).

Part 3
Intention of the Parties

Part Case Notes

Misrepresentation Based on Mistake — Coverage Not Excluded Under Policy: The plaintiff sued the defendant, the insurer of the homeowner from whom she purchased a home. After closing on the home, the plaintiff had found the basement of the home flooded and later learned the homeowner had not disclosed that the basement had previously flooded. The defendant denied coverage to the previous homeowner, claiming that the homeowner had intentionally misled the plaintiff and that intentional misrepresentations were not covered by either the homeowner's home policy or rental policy. The District Court agreed and granted the defendant summary judgment. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed that the home policy expressly excluded coverage; however, it reversed and remanded the case to the District Court based on its conclusion that the renter's policy did provide coverage because the homeowner had stated that his misrepresentation to the plaintiff was based on mistake. Huckins v. United Serv. Auto Ass'n, 2017 MT 143, 387 Mont. 514, 396 P.3d 121.

Ambiguous Decline of Comparable Position Exclusion in Retirement Plan Construed Against Employer — Control Determinative of Independent Contractor Status: Eldredge brought suit against ASARCO for failure to pay him a retirement benefit; the company claimed no benefit was due because Eldgidge had earlier declined a comparable position. The Supreme Court found that the retirement plan stated no timeframe within which the decline of a comparable position would exclude an employee from a retirement benefit and, construing the plan against the company as the drafter of the plan, refused to apply the limitation to the much earlier offer to Eldredge. The court also found that despite ASARCO's attempt to paint Eldredge as an independent contractor, Eldredge was an employee and for that reason, all of his time working for ASARCO counted toward his years of employment for the purposes of the company's retirement plan. Eldredge v. ASARCO, Inc., 2011 MT 80, 360 Mont. 112, 252 P.3d 182.

No Duty to Defend Property Damage or Fraud Claim When No Property Damage or Fraud Asserted: Defendant contended that plaintiff insurer had a duty to defend and provide coverage under defendant's commercial general liability policy, which provided coverage for property damages. However, the claim did not seek compensation for property damages for physical injury to tangible property, but rather for sums fraudulently paid to defendant based on a breach of contract. Because allegations in the complaint did not set forth facts that brought the event within the policy provisions and specifically excluded coverage for a fraud claim, the insurer had no duty to defend the claim. Generali-U.S. Branch v. Alexander, 2004 MT 81, 320 M 450, 87 P3d 1000 (2004), following Graber v. St. Farm Fire & Cas. Co., 244 M 265, 797 P2d 214 (1990).

Real Estate Listing — Vagueness to Be Raised at Trial Level: Plaintiff and defendant entered into a real estate listing agreement. Defendant was a cotenant with her husband. Defendant contended that the listing contained an erroneous asking price, did not adequately describe the property, and was signed only by the defendant. Defendant contended the contract should be declared void due to vagueness. Defendant participated in the contract throughout its entire existence without any objection of vagueness and did not raise the issue at trial. The surrounding circumstances and positions of the parties clearly indicate their intent to enter into and perform an agreement. When reviewing a conflict in testimony regarding ambiguity, the trier of fact is entitled to determine the meaning of the contract in its own right. The reviewing court looks only to determine whether there is substantial credible evidence supporting the verdict. The vagueness issue was not raised in the District Court, thus it could not be considered on appeal. Barrett v. Ballard, 191 M 39, 622 P2d 180, 37 St. Rep. 2038 (1980).

Interpretation of Contract — Time of Performance: On appeal, the seller of a log cabin urged that the agreement required the buyer to remove the logs from the seller's property as soon as possible. The Supreme Court found that the negotiations were quick and informal and that nothing specific was said about the time in which the cabin was to be removed. Noting the seller's testimony that he was in the process of refurbishing his motel and wanted the cabin removed as soon as possible so that he could take advantage of the good building weather to expand the motel and that the cabin was old and had not been used for years and contributed nothing to the value or appearance of the property and little value to the motel, the Supreme Court held that there was substantial evidence to support the trial court's finding that a condition of the sale was that the logs were to be removed as soon as possible. Jeffery v. Neville, 190 M 300, 620 P2d 1218, 37 St. Rep. 1983 (1980).

Contract for Sale of Timber After Severance Not Interest in Real Property — No Breach for Sale of Land to Third Party: A contract under which appellant had a right of first refusal to purchase timber if and when appellee decided to sell timber did not convey an interest in real property and was not breached by appellee's sale of the land to third party without notice to the appellant. Yellowstone Pine Co. v. Big Sky of Mont., 185 M 176, 605 P2d 172 (1980).

GENERAL

No Breach by Defendant When Lawsuit Commenced — Still Sufficient Time to Remedy Issue but for Plaintiff's Interference: The District Court did not err in concluding that when a lawsuit commenced, the defendant had not breached the parties' agreement concerning a pivot irrigation system. It was undisputed that, at the time the parties entered into an agreement concerning the pivot irrigation system, it was the intention of the parties to provide the plaintiff with green fields on which to hunt. The record reflected that the plaintiff's sole purpose in acquiring land from the defendant in the first place was to enjoy the hunting that he thought the area could be manicured to offer. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court's finding that the defendant had not breached the parties' agreement as of the time that the plaintiff directed that a contractor not undertake any more work on the pivots, because there was still sufficient time for the defendant to repair the pivot irrigation system and cultivate green fields for hunting prior to the start of hunting season but for the plaintiff's interference. Welu v. Twin Hearts Smiling Horses, Inc., 2016 MT 347, 386 Mont. 98, 386 P.3d 937.

Parties' Failure to Follow Arbitration Agreement — Procedural Arbitrability: Alleging wrongful discharge, the plaintiff employee association sought declaratory judgment requiring the city of Bozeman to submit to arbitration. Each party argued that the other failed to follow arbitration procedures. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the dispute should be determined by an arbitrator because time limits and conditions precedent invoke procedural arbitrability. Mont. Pub. Employees Ass'n v. Bozeman, 2015 MT 69, 378 Mont. 337, 343 P.3d 1233.

Port Authority Insured Under County Insurance Policy — Extrinsic Evidence Considered — Policy Construed Against Drafter — Insurer Not Immune From Suit as Reinsurer: After a port authority building was destroyed by a fire, the port claimed that it qualified as an insured under a county insurance company policy that included county members and any other county entities that receive insurance through a county joint insurance authority. The insurance company claimed that the language in the policy did not extend to county entities such as the port. Additionally, the insurance company claimed that it was a reinsurer and therefore it was improper for the port to bring a direct claim against it. The Supreme Court held that the port qualified as an insured under terms of the policy and that a direct claim was proper. In reaching a conclusion that was contrary to the language of the policy, the court gave meaning to the entire contract, considered extrinsic evidence, and construed ambiguous language in the policy against the insurer as the drafter. In determining that a direct claim was proper, the court reasoned that the port dealt directly with the insurance company, and therefore the insurer was an excess insurance carrier, rather than a reinsurer. Lincoln County Port Authority v. Allianz Global Risks US Ins. Co., 2013 MT 365, 373 Mont. 60, 315 P.3d 934.

No Modification of Original Construction Agreement: In a construction contract dispute, the general contractor submitted a Subcontract Agreement (Agreement) to the subcontractor 2 weeks after the subcontractor had begun work. The Agreement expanded the scope of the work the subcontractor had agreed to perform without additional compensation. The general contractor argued the Agreement modified any contract with the subcontractor because the subcontractor: (1) orally agreed to the Agreement; (2) submitted a payment application in compliance with the Agreement; and (3) admitted to having signed the Agreement. The Supreme Court concluded no modification occurred. The parties had not fully executed the alleged oral agreement; therefore, it could not operate as a modification. Compliance with the payment process did not rise to the requisite level of assent to modification. Pursuant to 28-2-906, a written contract must be delivered before it becomes effective. Since the subcontractor never returned the Agreement to the general contractor, no modification occurred. AAA Constr. of Missoula, LLC v. Choice Land Corp., 2011 MT 262, 362 Mont. 264, 264 P.3d 709.

Covenants Intended to Remain in Effect Until Rejected by Property Owners — Failure of Sufficient Tract Owners to Vote to Amend Covenants: Subdivision property owners entered covenants that would automatically extend for "successive period" of 10 years. The covenants could also be amended by a two-thirds vote of the owners of the original tracts. Some of the owners contended that the covenant extension language was ambiguous because it was not clear if the covenants would be renewed only for a single 10-year period or for successive 10-year periods. The District Court held that the language was not ambiguous, but rather contained a typographical error, and that successive 10-year periods applied. Plaintiffs appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Taken as a whole the covenant language intended that the covenants remain in effect until affirmatively rejected by the property owners. In this case, five of the eight original tract owners voted to amend the covenants, so without the required two-thirds vote, the covenants remained unamended. Brewer v. Hawkinson, 2009 MT 346, 353 M 154, 221 P3d 643 (2009). See also Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006).

Genuine Issue of Material Fact Whether Dam Operation Damaged Lakeshore Properties — Summary Judgment Improper — Class Action Vacated: Flathead Lake landowners brought a class action suit against defendant operators of Kerr Dam for operating outside the scope of their easements in a manner that continuously eroded and damaged plaintiffs' lakeshore properties. The District Court rejected plaintiffs' argument that the dam operator was not allowed to affect plaintiffs' properties above an elevation of 2,893 feet, concluding instead that defendants' easements covered entire parcels. The court concluded that erosion, including wave action erosion, was within the scope of the easements and held that any duty defendants had to not cause unreasonable damage to plaintiffs' properties applied only to damage unrelated to use of the easement. Therefore, summary judgment was granted to defendants, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court first agreed that the District Court's contour line theory was correct. The "2,893 feet" clause did not establish the vertical limit argued by plaintiffs because although the dam operators' right to flood, subirrigate, drain, or otherwise affect the shoreline was not unlimited, it was not restricted to a maximum elevation of 2,893 feet at each parcel, but rather extended to whatever part of each parcel was affected when the lake was held at 2,893 feet above mean sea level as measured at the dam. The court also agreed that the right to cause some erosion was necessary to the enjoyment of the right to perpetually flood, subirrigate, and drain and was thus included by implication in the easements. However, further factual development and trial were necessary to address the question of whether the erosion was reasonable, necessary, and within the scope of the easements, which could not be resolved by summary judgment. Additionally, the question of whether defendants breached their obligation to not cause unreasonable damage to the shoreline properties and to not unreasonably interfere with plaintiffs' enjoyment also required further factual development and possibly trial. Therefore, the order certifying the case as a class action was vacated and the case was remanded for further consideration. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2009 MT 286, 352 M 212, 215 P3d 675 (2009).

On remand, the District Court decertified the class as to one defendant and denied the plaintiffs' motion for certification as to another defendant on the basis that the question of whether the erosion caused unreasonable damage to or unreasonably interfered with the plaintiffs' properties required an individual, property-by-property analysis that was improper for class certification. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, concluding that class certification to both defendants was proper because the reasonableness of the erosion presents a common question that is incapable of being resolved on a property-by-property basis since an aggregate of the benefits and burdens imposed on all of the shoreline properties must be considered together to determine reasonableness. Mattson v. Mont. Power Co., 2012 MT 318, 368 Mont. 1, 291 P.3d 1209.

No Ambiguity in Complete, Final Sales Agreement — Parol Evidence Inadmissible: The parties entered a sale agreement for a ready-mix concrete plant. Plaintiff subsequently filed an action alleging that defendant violated the agreement by breaching the covenant to not compete and the covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which constituted malice resulting in lost profits, sales, and goodwill. The District Court granted summary judgment to defendant and plaintiff appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly concluded that the sales agreement constituted a complete, final agreement and unambiguously did not include a noncompetition provision, but in fact provided that plaintiff would sell concrete to defendant for use in the area. The intention of the parties was ascertainable from the writing alone, and the agreement was presumed to represent all transactions regarding elements extrinsic to the agreement and was thus considered complete and final, so parol evidence was inadmissible. Richards v. JTL Group, Inc., 2009 MT 173, 350 M 516, 212 P3d 264 (2009). See also Lindey's, Inc. v. Professional Consultants, Inc., 244 M 238, 797 P2d 920 (1990), and Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest States, Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Ambiguity of Contract Raising Genuine Issues of Fact — Summary Judgment Improper: In a dispute over the sale of aircraft, the District Court considered summary judgment motions from both parties, granted summary judgment for plaintiff on claims of breach of contract and express warranty, and denied defendant's summary judgment counterclaim of breach of contract and express warranty. The Supreme Court examined the contract and found ambiguities regarding whether defendant accepted the aircraft "as is" at signing or maintained the right to inspect and reject the aircraft prior to closing, as well as the parties' extension of the closing date. The ambiguities raised genuine issues of material fact regarding breach of contract and express warranty that were not appropriate for summary judgment, and the Supreme Court reversed for trial on the issues. Corporate Air v. Edwards Jet Center, Mont., Inc., 2008 MT 283, 345 M 336, 190 P3d 1111 (2008).

Tort Claims Not Precluded by Contract Claims Arising From Same Event: In a dispute over the sale of aircraft, the District Court considered summary judgment motions from both parties and granted defendant summary judgment on plaintiff's tort claims on grounds that plaintiff had relied on a contract theory of relief and thus elected to be made whole under the contract. Plaintiff appealed on grounds that tort liability can exist with contract liability and that recovery on a contract theory does not necessarily preclude recovery on tort theories such as fraud. Defendant responded that summary dismissal of the tort claims was proper because plaintiff should not be allowed to make a double recovery and that because plaintiff's claims were commercial, tort damages are not available except in rare cases when a separate tort claim arises from the contractual relationship. Without ruling on the validity of the tort claims, the Supreme Court held that consideration of plaintiff's fraud-based claims was not precluded by the fact that plaintiff also made separate contract claims arising out of the same event. The tort claims were required to be considered individually and could not be dismissed under a blanket rationale that the tort claims and contract claims were mutually exclusive. The District Court's summary judgment was reversed, and the issue was remanded for further consideration. Corporate Air v. Edwards Jet Center, Mont., Inc., 2008 MT 283, 345 M 336, 190 P3d 1111 (2008).

Unambiguous Release of Claims Against Attorney for Malpractice — Parties Bound by Terms of Release: Rich was injured in two automobile accidents and retained attorney Ellingson to represent her in claims against her insurer. The first claim was dismissed when Ellingson failed to serve a timely summons on the insurer after filing the claim. Rich sued Ellingson for malpractice and received a settlement of $175,000 from Ellingson's malpractice insurer. As part of the settlement, Rich signed a release providing that Ellingson was released from any future malpractice claims arising from representation of Rich. Rich's second accident claim was subsequently dismissed when the statute of limitations had run, and Rich again sued Ellingson for malpractice. Ellingson contended that the suit was barred by the release. The District Court agreed and dismissed the claim, and Rich appealed. Considering the document as a whole, the Supreme Court held that the release clearly and unambiguously barred future claims arising from Ellingson's representation of Rich in the multiple actions against Rich's insurer. Rich's latent discontent with the release, without more, was an insufficient basis upon which to premise an alteration of the express, unambiguous agreement. The District Court was affirmed. Rich v. Ellingson, 2007 MT 346, 340 M 285, 174 P3d 491 (2007). See also Hanson v. Oljar, 231 M 272, 752 P2d 187 (1988).

Easement Limited to Historical Size and Location of Grant: In 1949, plaintiffs' predecessor in interest granted an easement to defendant's predecessor in interest to allow the construction of radio towers on a portion of a 160-acre parcel, conditioned on location and maintenance of the property. Defendant subsequently notified plaintiffs that he intended to expand the radio facilities beyond the original construction site. Plaintiffs sued, asserting that the expansion would encompass property not included in the original grant, while defendant contended that the easement encompassed the entire 160 acres described in the grant, so the facilities could be expanded onto other portions of the parcel or relocated elsewhere within the parcel. The District Court found for plaintiffs, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the rules of contract construction, the grant language clearly limited placement of the radio facilities on a portion of the 160-acre parcel to be chosen by defendant's predecessor in interest. Thus, the easement did not encumber the full 160-acre parcel, but rather was limited in size and location to the historical location of the radio facilities. The original grant also required that wires, ground radial antennas, conduits, and transmission lines be buried to a minimum depth of 12 inches, and the District Court did not err in ordering defendant to bury the equipment pursuant to the maintenance portion of the grant. Anderson v. Stokes, 2007 MT 166, 338 M 118, 163 P3d 1273 (2007).

Ambiguity Required Prior to Application of Construction-Against-Drafter Principle: Plaintiffs asserted that because defendants drafted a number of the easements in a utility right-of-way contract, the terms of the contract should be construed most favorably toward plaintiffs. However, plaintiffs admitted that the contract language was unambiguous, and before a contract may be construed against the drafter, some ambiguity must exist. Thus, the trial court did not err by not interpreting the contract language in a light most favorable to plaintiffs. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007).

Evidence of Circumstances Under Which Instrument Made Admissible for Determining Ambiguity: As a general rule, evidence of the circumstances under which an instrument was made may not be considered when the language of the instrument is clear and certain in its terms. However, objective evidence of those circumstances, including the situation of the subject of the instrument and the parties to it, may be shown and considered to aid the court in determining, as a preliminary matter, whether the instrument contains an ambiguity. If the court determines that no ambiguity exists, then the extrinsic evidence may not be considered further, but if the court determines that an ambiguity is present in the instrument, then the extrinsic evidence may be introduced at trial to allow the trier of fact to determine the intent of the parties in entering into the contract. In the present case, both parties agreed that language in a right-of-way contract was unambiguous, so the trial court did not err in refusing to consider the circumstances under which the contract was made. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007). See 11 Williston on Contracts, 33:39 (4th Ed. 1999).

Objective Determination of Whether Ambiguity Exists in Contract — Ambiguity Not Created by Disagreement Over Interpretation of Contract Language: The determination whether an ambiguity exists in a contract is made on an objective basis. A conclusion of ambiguity is not compelled by the fact that parties to a document, or their attorneys, have or suggest opposing interpretations of a contract or even disagree as to whether the contract is reasonably open to just one interpretation, nor does ambiguity exist just because a claimant says so. Rather, an ambiguity exists only if the language is susceptible to at least two reasonable but conflicting meanings. In the present case, plaintiffs' backup position was that language in a right-of-way contract was ambiguous, but the three circumstances proffered by plaintiffs, even when considered collectively, did not demonstrate that the contract language was susceptible to at least two reasonable but conflicting meanings. Thus, the trial court did not err in concluding that the language was unambiguous, which was in fact plaintiffs' primary position. Mary J. Baker Revocable Trust v. Cenex Harvest St., Cooperatives, Inc., 2007 MT 159, 338 M 41, 164 P3d 851 (2007), followed in Wills Cattle Co. v. Shaw, 2007 MT 191, 338 M 351, 167 P3d 397 (2007).

Validity of Forum Selection Language in Employment Contract: A clause in an employment contract provided that in case of disputes, venue for enforcement of the contract would be in the state District Courts of Lewis and Clark County, Montana, or in the district of choice set by the independent contractor. A dispute arose, and plaintiff independent contractor sought to enforce the contract in Lewis and Clark County. Defendant moved to dismiss for lack of personal jurisdiction, and the motion was granted on grounds that the contract's forum clause did not give the court personal jurisdiction over defendant, a resident of Illinois. Plaintiff appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. As held in May v. Figgins, 186 M 383, 607 P2d 1132 (1980), parties to a contract may agree in advance to submit to the jurisdiction of a given court, and as such, forum selection clauses are prima facie valid and should be enforced unless the resisting party shows that the agreement was not deliberately and understandably made and that the contractual language did not clearly, unequivocally, and unambiguously express a waiver of personal jurisdiction. In this case, the parties knowingly consented to personal jurisdiction in Montana and the forum selection clause was clear and unambiguous. The case was remanded for further proceedings in the Montana court. Milanovich v. Schnibben, 2007 MT 128, 337 M 334, 160 P3d 562 (2007).

Contract Interpretation Applicable to Restrictive Covenants — How Ambiguity Resolved — Restrictive Covenants Strictly Construed: General rules of contract interpretation apply to restrictive covenants, and any person having an interest under a restrictive covenant may seek declaratory relief concerning any question of construction arising under the covenant. When a restrictive covenant has been reduced to writing, the intent of the parties is to be ascertained, when possible, from the writing alone, and when the language of a covenant is clear, a court must apply the language as written. Restrictive covenants are strictly construed, and ambiguities in covenants are resolved to allow free use of property. The determination of whether an ambiguity exists in a restrictive covenant is a question of law for a court to decide, but mere disagreement between the parties as to interpretation of a restrictive covenant does not automatically create an ambiguity. Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006). See also Newman v. Wittmer, 277 M 1, 917 P2d 926 (1996), and Toavs v. Sayre, 281 M 243, 934 P2d 165 (1997).

No Ambiguity in Restrictive Covenant Prohibiting Placement of Trailers and Mobile Homes Upon Property — Development of Recreational Vehicle Park Precluded: A restrictive covenant provided that no trailers or mobile homes were to be placed upon the property conveyed by a deed. The District Court held that the term "placed upon" contemplated permanent placement, and that temporary placement was therefore not precluded. The court also held that the covenant disallowed only trailer houses or mobile homes used for residences. The court thus concluded that the covenant did not disallow development of the property as a campground for recreational vehicles and travel trailers. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that language in a restrictive covenant should be understood in its ordinary and popular sense. It is not the role of a court to insert modifying language into clearly written and unambiguous written instruments, and the unambiguous language in the covenant contained no words to indicate the parties' intent to allow temporary trailers or mobile homes not used as residences. The District Court erred in modifying the covenant language to allow trailers to be placed on the property, so the conclusion that a campground for recreational vehicles and travel trailers was allowable was reversed. Creveling v. Ingold, 2006 MT 57, 331 M 322, 132 P3d 531 (2006).

Ambiguous Settlement Agreement Language Regarding Maintenance Calculation — Gross Disposable Income Interpreted as Pretax Income: A settlement agreement provided that monthly maintenance payments be 15% of the husband's gross disposable income. In direct opposition to the husband's interpretation, the wife and her expert contended that the amount should be based on pretax rather than after-tax income, and the District Court agreed. The court found that the term gross disposable income was ambiguous because "gross" and "disposable" had mutually exclusive meanings in this context, so the court looked beyond the agreement language to the parties' intent. Because the term was ambiguous, the parties' proposed interpretations were equally proper, so under 28-3-306, the ambiguity was construed in the wife's favor because the maintenance provision was for her benefit. The court's allowance of testimony from the wife's expert was also within the court's discretion. In re Marriage of Mease, 2004 MT 59, 320 M 229, 92 P3d 1148 (2004).

Interest Owed on State Highway Right-of-Way Condemnation Agreement Pursuant to Clear Language of Stipulation: The Department of Transportation filed a condemnation action against defendants in connection with a highway construction project. As part of the action, the parties entered a stipulation granting the Department possession of the right-of-way in exchange for $35,780, $11,000 payable immediately and $24,780 still owing, plus interest, at 10% a year, on the final award or settlement from the date of service of summons until the date of withdrawal by defendants. A dispute arose over the amount of interest owed. The District Court applied 70-30-302 and determined that the Department owed interest on $7,187 of the total remainder, the amount of land-leveling costs, which the Department paid. Defendants appealed the order, contending that interest was actually owed on the entire $24,780 remaining settlement. The Supreme Court agreed. The language in the stipulation was clear and unambiguous and required the Department to pay interest on the excess of the final settlement award, which was $24,780. The District Court erred in applying the statute to the exclusion of the actual stipulation language to which the parties agreed. The clear language of the stipulation and the intent of the parties controlled. The case was remanded with instructions to order the Department to pay interest on the entire final settlement, with credit for amounts already paid. St. v. Asbeck, 2003 MT 337, 318 M 431, 80 P3d 1272 (2003).

Ambiguity Regarding Whether Settlement Contingent on Alternate Financing — Summary Judgment Improper: Plaintiff sought to foreclose on a loan made to defendant, alleging that defendant's liabilities exceeded the value of the collateral, resulting in default pursuant to the terms of the note. The parties made several attempts to settle the issue, resulting in defendant's payoff to plaintiff, but in an amount that the plaintiff claimed was insufficient. The District Court granted summary judgment to plaintiff and ordered enforcement of the settlement agreement. However, a letter memorializing the settlement agreement, when considered with the parties' other correspondence, created an ambiguity regarding whether the settlement was contingent on alternate financing. Because there was more than one reasonable interpretation regarding the parties' intention, the parties' affidavits and testimony were admissible to determine intention and raised an issue of fact that precluded summary judgment. The case was remanded for further proceedings. Stockman Bank v. Potts, 2002 MT 178, 311 M 12, 52 P3d 920 (2002).

Fundamental Right to Choose Independent Contractor Status — Presumption of Employee Status Not Violative of Right to Contract: The Department of Revenue classified a worker as an employee, despite the worker's contention that he was an independent contractor. The worker contended that he had a fundamental right to choose independent contractor status and that the Department's classification deprived him of the right to contract. The District Court cited Phoenix Physical Therapy v. Unemployment Ins. Div., 284 M 95, 943 P2d 523 (1997), for the proposition that the ability to contract is not absolute and that a party's intent does not control whether the party is classified as an employee or independent contractor, but rather that the status must be proved as a matter of fact. Although the worker in question had a fundamental right to choose employment status, the worker was nevertheless required to prove that he was an independent contractor as a matter of fact, and the fact that he failed to do so was supported by substantial evidence in the record. Thus, the Department did not exceed its statutory authority in classifying the worker as an employee. Spain v. Dept. of Revenue, 2002 MT 146, 310 M 282, 49 P3d 615 (2002).

Potential Access Rights Merged With Deeds and Extinguished — Applicability of Contract Law Doctrine of Merger: Prior to Gehring's consent to sell 360 acres to APS Corporation (APS) in 1970, they entered an agreement that included a provision on access rights, whereby Gehring purported to grant future purchasers access to other land owned by Gehring for certain recreational purposes. After being told by the Gehring Ranch Corporation that they would not be allowed access to Gehring's land for recreation, the successors in interest to APS sought to enforce the agreement, alleging that they had been improperly excluded from the land and that the agreement created an easement over Gehring's land. The District Court granted summary judgment for the Gehring Ranch Corporation, noting that the agreement did not identify Gehring's other lands upon which an easement was purportedly created. The court also held that any agreement prior to execution of the deeds was merged with the deeds and that because the deeds transferring title did not provide for access, any access rights promised in the agreement were lost. The decision was appealed, and the Supreme Court affirmed. The clause in the agreement was part of a larger agreement to transfer property in the future, and Gehring did not intend to create an easement, but at most intended to provide for potential access privileges if certain conditions, such as creation of a property owners' association and adoption of rules governing the use of the recreational privileges, were met. The Supreme Court cited Urquhart v. Teller, 1998 MT 119, 288 M 497, 958 P2d 714 (1998), in applying the contract law doctrine of merger, holding that the deeds contained all the rights of the parties and that because no access privileges were mentioned in the deeds, any potential access rights referred to in the agreement merged with the deeds and were lost. Richman v. Gehring Ranch Corp., 2001 MT 293, 307 M 443, 37 P3d 732 (2001).

Shareholders' Agreement Enforceable Independent of Stock Exchange — Different Intent Contained in Separate Agreements Separately Enforceable: Following his termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay, contending that an earlier merger transaction and the subsequent shareholders' agreement should be read together and citing Rumph v. Dale Edwards, Inc., 183 M 359, 600 P2d 163 (1979), for the proposition that when construing an agreement that is part of a larger transaction, the intention of the parties must be determined by examining the entirety of the larger transaction. However, Rumph was distinguishable here because all the agreements in question occurred at different times and did not reference or depend upon each other. Each agreement was clear and unambiguous. Under Gerdes v. Omaha Home for Boys, 89 NW 2d 849 (Nebr. 1958), a court may not avoid the language of a complete, unambiguous contract by consolidating it with another writing if the effect of doing so would be to avoid an essential part of the contract. The District Court properly concluded that the shareholders' agreement was enforceable independent of the stock exchange between the parties. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000).

Interpretation of Latent Ambiguity in Marital Property Settlement Agreement — Wife Entitled to Value of Improvements to Real Property Made Between Time of Dissolution and Time of Sale: A property settlement agreement provided that the wife would receive the family home subject to the debt owed upon it (although no debt was owing) and that when she sold it, she would return one-half of the proceeds of the sale of the house to the husband. The wife's subsequent improvements to the home increased its value from $55,500 at the time of dissolution to $75,000 at the time of sale. The wife requested an interpretation of the settlement agreement to address the division of proceeds in light of her substantial improvements to the property, as well as her payment of all property taxes since the date of dissolution. The District Court concluded that the property settlement agreement created a latent ambiguity by failing to address what would happen to the expenditures of one party that were for neither maintenance nor repairs. The court concluded that the agreement contemplated that the wife would maintain the value of the home at the time of dissolution and divide that value when the house was sold and that the property taxes were an item of maintenance that the wife was responsible for pursuant to the agreement. The Supreme Court affirmed. In light of the latent ambiguity in the agreement, the District Court did not introduce an additional provision to the agreement that deprived the husband of his contractual rights, but merely interpreted the agreement to clarify what was meant by "one-half of the proceeds of the sale of the house" in the context of nonmaintenance expenditures. Upon finding a latent ambiguity, the District Court properly admitted parol evidence to interpret the agreement and correctly allowed the wife to retain the proceeds from the sale of the house attributable to her expenditures for improvements beyond maintenance and repairs. In re Marriage of Holloway, 2000 MT 104, 299 M 291, 999 P2d 980, 57 St. Rep. 418 (2000).

Assignment of Retail Installment Contract — Breach of Warranty — Abrogation of Waiver of Recourse: Arcadia Financial, Ltd. (Arcadia), is a Minnesota corporation that purchases retail installment contracts from automobile dealers, including Prestige Toyota (Prestige) in Billings, after the dealers have entered into installment contracts with automobile buyers. Knight purchased a Toyota from Prestige, and Knight's contract contained a provision assigning the contract to Arcadia under one of four options. The same day that Knight purchased the automobile, Prestige assigned the contract to Arcadia "without recourse", which meant that only the contract warranties applied, one of which was that Prestige had a valid certificate of title and would send it to the appropriate officials within 10 days of sale to ensure Arcadia's interest in the vehicle. The contract also provided that Prestige unconditionally guaranteed full performance of the contract in the event that it breached any of the warranties. Prestige failed to send a valid certificate of title as required. Knight later defaulted and filed for bankruptcy protection. Arcadia demanded that Prestige repurchase the Knight contract. Prestige admitted breaching the warranty but claimed that it was not required to repurchase the contract and refused to do so, asserting that Arcadia's damages were limited to the amount that the bankruptcy trustee received from sale of the automobile. The District Court awarded Arcadia the principal amount due on the Knight contract, plus interest, attorney fees, and costs, concluding that under the clear language of the contract assignment provisions, Prestige had guaranteed payment of all sums due when it failed to deliver the valid title within the time required. The Supreme Court agreed, noting that the contract was converted into a full recourse contract when Prestige failed to deliver the valid title, so Prestige was required to repurchase the contract for the amount of principal remaining due. The detriment proximately caused by Prestige's failure to repurchase the contract was the principal amount owing on the contract. Further, the District Court properly awarded attorney fees to Arcadia as the prevailing party pursuant to 28-3-704. Arcadia Financial, Ltd. v. Prestige Toyota, 1999 MT 273, 296 M 494, 989 P2d 831, 56 St. Rep. 1111 (1999).

Ability to Contract Not Absolute — Public Policy Legislation May Not Be Avoided: Phoenix Physical Therapy argued that the intent of the contract for services entered into with an individual was to create an independent contractor relationship and that therefore it was not liable to pay unemployment insurance premiums. The Supreme Court ruled that the right to contract is not absolute, the purpose of the Unemployment Insurance Law is to protect the general welfare of the citizens of the state, and parties may not privately contract to waive public protection statutes. Phoenix Physical Therapy v. Unemployment Ins. Div., 284 M 95, 943 P2d 523, 54 St. Rep. 791 (1997).

Five Agreements Constituting Integrated Sales Agreement With Condition Precedent — Overriding Previous Partnership Agreements and Providing for Attorney Fees: Daines argued that of the five agreements executed by the parties, the option agreement should have been read separately and interpreted as an option to buy conferring a privilege but not imposing an obligation and that on that basis, he could not be liable for not completing a purchase agreement. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had properly looked at the five agreements as a whole in interpreting the parties' intent and had correctly concluded that the agreements constituted an integrated sales agreement subject to conditions precedent. The Supreme Court further held that since the five agreements constituted a sales agreement, they superseded the previous partnership agreements. The respondents were not liable for capital contributions as partners, and the default provision in the option agreement providing for attorney fees did apply to the agreement created by all five of the documents executed by the parties. Daines v. Knight, 269 M 320, 888 P2d 904, 52 St. Rep. 8 (1995).

Consideration of Nature of Dealings Between Attorney and Client: When the determination of duties owed to an insurance company by its attorney involved a question of fact, the District Court did not err in examining past legal dealings between the parties or in ascertaining the exact duties expected of the attorney from an examination of the parties' conduct. Based on that conduct, the court properly concluded that the attorney had fulfilled his required advisory duties and was not liable for any negligence or breach of contract. Aetna Fin. Co. v. Ball, 237 M 535, 774 P2d 992, 46 St. Rep. 1031 (1989).

Adjusting Appraised Value to Enforce Agreement Proper: On appeal of an order granting specific performance of a settlement agreement between the parties to a dispute over operation of a family farm, Hass claimed that the District Court had erred in finding the value of the farm corporations to be higher than that agreed upon by the appraisers appointed by the parties. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that since a court has a duty to enforce an agreement that is clear, as this one is, it was proper for the District Court to increase the appraised value by the value of debts owed to the corporations by the parties. Hass v. Hass Land Co., 217 M 246, 704 P2d 63, 42 St. Rep. 1170 (1985).
